Thrilling Incident.—The Cincinnati Atlas relates the following as having occurred at the burning of the A. N. Johnson: Mr. S. S. Saunders, unable from the number of passengers on board, to procure a berth, was sleeping upon a table in "Social Hall," directly over the boilers. At the moment of his first consciousness, he found himself lying on the lower deck, scalded and bruised, with a piece of timber lying across his legs, which confined him to the spot. The fire was raging in the fragments of the boat on the side towards the shore; the horses, already maddened with the scalding steam, were now rearing and plunging in increased agony, as the flames came upon them; and most horrible of all, among them, covered to the waist with fragments of the wreck, lay two men stretching out their hands and calling in hopeless agony for help.

Mr. Saunders saw no relief for himself or others, and endeavored to compose his thoughts for death. The flames had almost reached him, when some of the horses in their struggles moved the timber that held him, and he was free! He ran to the outer side of the boat. The current was swift, and the ice floating fast. He knew that, injured as he was, he would not be able to escape by swimming. Turning back again, he fortunately found a wet blanket, threw it around him, rushed through the flames on the other side of the boat, and got safely ashore. Mr. S. is yet, we believe, at Maysville. He is badly scalded and bruised, but it is thought not dangerously. The loss of life on this boat has been, we regret to announce, greatly under-estimated. It now appears that instead of eighty lives being lost, in all, one hundred and fourteen persons were destroyed. This is truly terrible, and we hope that no efforts will be spared to trace out the cause of a calamity so horrible.

Printing in China.—According to the best authorities, the art of printing was known in China upwards of 900 years ago. In the time of Confucius, B. C. 500, books were formed of slips of bamboo; and about 150 years after Christ, paper was first made; A. D. 745, books were bound into leaves; A. D. 900, printing was in general use. The process of printing is simple. The materials consist of a graver, blocks of wood, and a brush, which the printers carry with them to every place. Without wheel or screw, a printer will throw off more than 2,500 impressions in one day. The paper can be bought in China for one fourth the price that it can in any other country. The works of Confucius, six volumes, 400 leaves, octavo, can be bought for ninepence. For a historical novel, twenty-one volumes, one thousand five hundred leaves, half a crown is the price amongst the Chinese. [Martin's China.

Rev. John Angel, James of Birmingham, Eng., supports a Chinese colporteur at Shanghai as "his representative" in the labors for evangelizing China. Beside this one, the London Tract Society have now one colporteur at Canton and one at Hong-Kong.

VARIETY.

Van Helmont tells us, that Adam was created without a beard, but that after he had fallen and sinned, because of the sinful propensities which he derived from the fruit of the forbidden tree, a beard was made part of his punishment and disgrace, bringing him thus into nearer resemblance with the beasts towards whom he had made his nature approximate. The same stigma was not inflicted upon Eve, because even in the fall she retained much of her original modesty, and therefore deserved no such opprobrious mark. Van Helmont observes, also, that no good angel ever appears with a beard; and this, he says, is a capital sign by which angels may be distinguished.

A dashing fellow, who seemed to think he manifested his superiority by the disdain he exhibited of anything like courtesy to the humbler classes of society, was driving his gig, one rainy day, when he came to a toll-bar, and haughtily asked what was to pay. "Eightpence, if you please," said the civil gate-keeper. Instead of handing the money to him, our grandee threw a shilling carelessly on the wet and muddy ground, saying, "Take your change out of that." The keeper stooped for the silver, and, putting the coppers exactly on the same spot, walked coolly into his house.

A sensible woman of the Doctor's acquaintance, (the mother of a young family,) entered so far into his views upon this subject, that she taught her children, from their earliest childhood to consider ill-humor as a disorder which was to be cured by physic. Accordingly, she had always small doses ready, and the little patients, whenever it was thought needful, took rhubarb for the crossness. No punishment was required. Peevishness or ill-temper and rhubarb were associated in their minds, always as cause and effect.

A good joke is told of Horn Took, whom the Tories in the House of Commons thought to crush, by imposing on him the humiliating task of begging the House's pardon on his knees. Horn Took went on his knees, begged pardon for the offensive expression he had used, but in rising up he knocked the dust off his knees, and exclaimed loud enough to be heard by the whole house, "It's a dirty house after all." Roars of laughter followed this exclamation, and the tories saw clear enough that they had failed in their object.

The records of the Smithfield market, in London, prove that within one hundred years, the average weight of the cattle killed for that market has nearly doubled, raising from four and five hundred to between seven and eight hundred; the greater part of this increase has been in the last forty years. It is calculated that the cattle offered at the Brighton market average at least 50 per cent more than they did twenty years since. This improvement we owe to the knowledge brought to bear on the breeding of cattle, and agriculture generally.

A Committee of the British House of Commons report the entire value of imports into China as $43,305,784, of which $23,000,000 is paid for opium. Large quantities are used in other countries, Siam, Hindoostan, etc. Its horrid effects are seen in "the sallow, sunken cheeks, the glassy, watery eyes, the idiot look and vacant stare," and all the loathsome ruin that vice can bring on the human body and soul. Alas, that Christian nations should be in a great degree responsible for all this sin and woe.

A gallant old Scotch officer was narrating the unfortunate history of an early friend, who had been jilted by a fickle beauty in favor of the Duke of A——; and he concluded his story thus, in a tone of much emotion—'Poor fellow, he never got over it; no, sir, it was the death of him;' and then, after a pause of much pathos, he added with a faltering voice—'He did not live above fifteen years after it.'

It has lately been discovered that the flesh of animals which are killed in the middle of the night, will keep much longer than it will when they are killed in the day time; and it is, for this reason, preferred by those who prepare potted meats. This circumstance proves that the flesh is fittest for keeping when taken from the animal at the time when the respiration is slowest and the temperature of the animal lowest.

As the Rev. Mr. Field, formerly at Westminster, Vt., went to give his vote at an election, a man of opposite politics expressed surprise at seeing him there, and to confirm his objection, quoted the remark of the Saviour, that his "kingdom was not of this world." "Has no man a right to vote," rejoined the witty clergyman, "unless he belongs to the kingdom of Satan?"

"Mark that text," said Richard Adkins to his grandson Abel, who was reading to him the thirty-second psalm; "mark that text, 'He that trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about.' I read it in my youth, and believed it; and now I read it in my old age, thank God, I know it to be true. O! it is a blessed thing, in the midst of the joys and the sorrows of the world, Abel, to trust in the Lord."

The American Baptist Missionary Society, a few months since, had ten Chinese colporteurs successfully distributing books among their countrymen, partly at the expense of the American Tract Society.

The Times published an advertisement for a lost dog, which "readily answers when spoken to in German." We have heard of dog Latin, but this is the first instance we have heard of dog German.

The Semeur, a religious paper at Paris, gives a statistical table, showing that in six of the States of Europe, there has been a diminution of no less than 855,000 Romish Priests, Monks or Nuns, within fifty years.

Kendall speaks of prickly pear trees growing in Mexico, with trunks two feet in diameter, growing two feet high without a limb, and then branching off in every direction.

It is reported that some of the fashionable shop-keepers in Broadway, hire several ladies to call three or four times a day, to give the appearance of business.

The yearly charities of Queen Adelaide amount to the large sum of $100,000.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. I speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

FEELINGS AND OPINIONS.

"We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and be carried to Abraham's bosom; but if we die without love, what will knowledge avail us? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels. I will not quarrel with you about any opinion; only see that your hearts be right towards God—that you love the Lord Jesus Christ—that you love your neighbor—walk as your Master walked, and desire no more. I am sick of opinions; I am weary of hearing them—my soul loathes their frothy food."

These are the words of John Wesley. They may be so construed as to inculcate a sound and healthful sentiment, or they may be made to countenance a sentiment which we deem exceedingly pernicious. If they are understood to teach simply that love to God and man is essential to Christian character, and that no man can be a Christian without it, whatever opinions he may entertain, we fully agree with them. But if they are meant to teach—as they are often understood to teach—that it matters but little what opinions a man entertains, provided he feels right, we dissent from them entirely. The world has now, and always has had, quite enough of the religion of feeling, but altogether too little of the religion of principle. There is reason to fear, that such will continue to be the case so long as eminent theologians are believed to give the weight of their influence in favor of the former and against the latter.

It is instructive to look somewhat critically at the results of adopting this notion that religion consists mainly in the exercise of good feelings. Here is a man who professes a high degree of love for God; and truly, if deep emotion, earnest exhortations, and fervent prayers, may be taken as proof, his is not a mere profession. He is always prompt in attending upon the devotional meetings of the neighborhood in which he resides, and never lacks for words to speak of God's love to him, and his desire to live in the exercise of love to God. But suppose that in these circumstances some practical duty is urged upon him, such, for instance, as the duty of submitting to the unpopular ordinance of baptism by immersion, or keeping the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. He does not hesitate, perhaps, to admit, that these duties appear to be scriptural and reasonable; but still he does not feel inclined to perform them. He begins to raise objections—thinks they can not be very essential while so many good men neglect them—that God will not exclude a man from heaven for failing to perform such outward acts—and that those who have the love of God in their hearts will find pardon, even if their obedience is not perfect. You urge upon him, perhaps, the consideration, that "this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." You quote to him the language of Jesus, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." But it is all to no purpose. He is sure that he loves God, and you are perhaps equally sure that he hates you for urging upon his attention your opinion of what God requires.

Again, this feeling individual claims to be a lover of man as well as of God. If his claim is to be judged of by the language which he uses in relation to the lost condition of sinners, and their need of a Saviour, you must pronounce it good. But suppose there comes along an agent of some missionary organization, who exhibits the condition of the millions perishing in heathenish darkness, and asks for aid to send them the Gospel. Does the man whose case is under consideration, and who professes to feel so much love for his fellows, enter heartily into the plans for evangelizing the world, and contribute accordingly. In some cases he may; but far more frequently he leaves such work for others to do, although he acknowledges that to him applies the command to "go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Or, suppose there comes along a friend and advocate of the slave; can he rely upon the countenance and support of this man of feeling, or must he look mainly to the men of religious principle for support? To the latter, of course, because they acknowledge their obligation not only to "feel for those in bonds as bound with them," but to "undo the heavy burdens, and let the oppressed go free."

Now we do not question that right and strong feelings are quite essential to the Christian character; hence we would be the last to decry them. At the same time we think right opinions are also important, and dare not speak against those who endeavor to inculcate them. Give us the feeling that accompanies correct opinions, and we have no fear that it will suffer from witnessing the discussions of the present day.

Daring Impiety and great Outcry.—Some of the religious papers, among which we notice the Vermont Chronicle and the New England Puritan, the "expounders of orthodox religion in New England," are making a great outcry about the impiety of John G. Palfrey in writing a letter to Robert C. Winthrop on Sunday. Both these gentlemen, our readers know, are members of Congress from Massachusetts. Just before the opening of the session, while the question who should be Speaker of the House of Representatives was in every body's mouth, Mr. Palfrey wrote a note to Mr. Winthrop to inquire what course he should pursue relative to war and slavery, if he should be elected Speaker. This note was dated on Sunday, and hence the papers are out upon its author, as a flagrant Sabbath-breaker, although a minister of the Gospel, and a Doctor of Divinity! Some people may think strange of this, especially when they consider that there is not one word in the Bible against doing any kind of work on Sunday, and farther, that these men who find so much fault with Mr. Palfrey are the first to decry Seventh-day Baptists as Judaizers for insisting upon obedience to the fourth commandment. But we have ceased to wonder at any of the inconsistencies which the discussion of the Sabbath question develops, and are not therefore surprized at this.

A MEMORIAL IN FAVOR OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

To the Honorable, the Legislature of New Jersey:

Your Memorialists, citizens of the State of New Jersey, respectfully represent to your Honorable Body, That the Seventh-day Baptists of this State, on behalf of whom petitions have from time to time been presented to the legislative bodies of this State for Equal Rights, are successors in the Sabbath observance of a long line of pious Christian men, who fled from the oppressions of the Stuart line of British Kings, to seek an asylum for their faith in the early colonial provinces of this country; and that they have ever been firm friends of free, constitutional, civil government. Many of their predecessors periled their lives in the revolutionary struggle for national independence and liberty. They however hold the law of Jehovah to be the supreme law of conscience; and believe that when human governments enact a law contrary thereto, they ought to say to its authorities, as Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego said to the King of Babylon, "Be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." They believe that Jesus Christ, the divine author of the Christian religion, and only Head of the Christian Church, has solemnly enforced the duty of observing every word and letter of the Decalogue of Jehovah, by saying, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for one tittle of the law to fail." When, therefore, the compulsory parts of the Sunday Statute of this State are pressed upon them by the civil authorities, they feel bound in conscience to reply, as Peter and John, apostles of Christ, replied to the authorities of Judea, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." Regarding God as the Supreme Ruler, they feel bound to render unto him supreme obedience. They believe there is no authority given by the Divine Head of the Christian religion, to any body or association of men, to compel their fellow men to regard any religious observance by penalties at civil law. Nor has he given any precept enjoining upon his disciples submission to any infringement of the rights of conscience. On the contrary, he ever acted and taught in accordance with the first precept of the Decalogue, which says, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." "Render unto Cesar the things that are Cesar's, and unto God the things that are God's," is the precept of Jesus Christ. "What have I to do to judge them that are without, [i. e., the church?] Do not ye judge them that are within? But them that are without God judgeth." (1 Cor. 5: 12, 13.) Such was the language of an apostle of Christ to a primitive church; such is the faith of Seventh-day Baptists. They believe that the Constitution of the nation, and of this State, are also in accordance therewith. They would therefore be obliged in conscience to object against any civil statute for compelling the observance of the seventh day of the week, as they do against the statute for compelling the observance of the first day, contrary to men's free will. They believe that God has wisely reserved this authority solely within his own power.

Your Memorialists desire farther respectfully to represent, That the said statute is not only obnoxious to the religious faith of such citizens as observe the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath of Jehovah, but very embarrassing to such in an honorable and upright discharge of official duties under the State government. The official oaths administered to persons on receiving certain legal commissions, require them to pay preëminent regard to the fundamental laws of the nation and of the State. At the same time, they are required faithfully to administer the statutes enacted by the State. But it is the deliberate opinion of your Memorialists, that the statute which establishes Sunday as a standing religious observance of the people of this State, and makes secular business done on that day Vice and Immorality, and a crime of a penal character, is a palpable violation of those provisions of the fundamental laws of the nation, and of the State, which prohibit the establishment by law of any form of religion, and of any one sect above another sect; and of those provisions which declare that no citizen shall, on account of his religious faith, be deprived of any privilege or immunity enjoyed by his fellow-citizens, or be rendered incapable thereby of filling any office of trust or profit; and therefore your Memorialists believe that to administer the aforesaid statute, or to sanction the same by any official act, would subject such persons to a charge of perjury. And, in one respect at least, it is obvious that the legislature which enacted it, took a similar view of it, or why did they except from its prohibitions and penalties the office-keepers and carriers of the United States mail?

Your Memorialists are zealous friends of morality and good order, and most solemnly believe that no possible injury can follow to the morals of the citizens of this State in consequence of the repeal of the compulsory part of the Sunday statute, and the separation of its protective provisions from the statute on Vice and Immorality. To believe otherwise, is virtually to charge the officers of the United States Post Office Department with vice and immorality; and the United States Government, and the Legislature of New Jersey, as accessories, by legalizing the post-office business on the first day of the week, and excepting those engaged therein from the penalties of the Sunday statute.

Your Memorialists believe that by granting the prayer of their petitions, now before your Honorable Body, no valuable interest would be injured or jeopardized, and no rights infringed upon, inasmuch as the statutes for the protection of religious liberty and worship, secure those precious rights alike to all, and on all days alike. On the other hand, a numerous class of deserving citizens would be relieved from burdensome restraints, painful embarrassments, and odious and unconstitutional distinctions, and the fundamental and statutory laws of the State made harmonious and honorable. By these considerations your Memorialists would respectfully urge the prayer of their petitions.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION—SEMI-ANNUAL MEETING.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association convened in Semi-Annual Session with the Second Alfred Church, on fourth-day, Jan. 5, 1848, at 10 o'clock A. M. Introductory Discourse by Eld. T. E. Babcock; after which the Association was called to order by Eld. N. V. Hull, and Eld. T. E. Babcock was appointed Chairman, and J. B. Cottrell, Clerk.

Reports of missionaries were called for. One was presented by T. E. Babcock, which was read.

The Treasurer's Report was called for and read. Brethren John A. Langworthy, Stephen R. Smith, and Maxson Green, were appointed an Auditing Committee, to whom the Treasurer's Report was referred, and instructions given to apportion to T. E. Babcock a reasonable compensation for his services.

Eld. N. V. Hull, Eld. J. H. Cochran, and J. A. Langworthy, were appointed a Business Committee; after which, the meeting adjourned to fifth-day at half past 10 o'clock A. M.

Fifth-day, Jan. 6, the session was opened with a discourse by Eld. N. V. Hull, and after a short intermission the Association proceeded to business.

The Auditing Committee reported an appropriation to T. E. Babcock of $14 25, which was adopted, and the Clerk instructed to give an order on the Treasurer for that amount.

An appropriation of $10 was made to Eld. Rowse Babcock, to assist in sustaining him in his labors with the churches of Scio and Amity.

The Report of the Business Committee was called for and read, which contained the substance of the following resolutions:—

1st, Resolved, That when this meeting is adjourned, it be adjourned to meet with the First Church in Genesee, to commence the evening after the second Sabbath in February next.

2d, Resolved, That such meetings be held monthly, or as often as practicable, with the different churches in the Association, when the business of our Missionary and Tract enterprises shall be presented, and collections taken in aid of those objects.

In accordance with the first resolution, the following appointments were made for the next meeting, to be held in Genesee:—Evening after the Sabbath, on the subject of Tracts, T. E. Babcock; First-day, at 11 o'clock A. M., on Home Missions, J. H. Cochran; Evening following, on Foreign Missions, N. V. Hull.

T. E. Babcock and J. B. Cottrell were appointed to revise the minutes and forward them for publication in the Sabbath Recorder.

Influence of Sects.—The Scotch traveler Laing, in his book on Norway, has these just reflections, the reading of which may benefit some of the croakers about sectarianism:

"A difference of opinion upon religious doctrines among a people, is a most powerful stimulus to the human mind to investigate, to obtain knowledge, to exert the mental powers. The spirit of religious controversy adds nothing certainly to their domestic happiness, but much to their intelligence, acuteness, desire for education, and value for religion. A land of universal conformity is necessarily one of universal apathy as to religious matters, or else of gross superstition. It is to expect effect without cause, to expect zeal or enlightened belief without inquiry and opposition, and the collision of mind against mind. There is something of this apathy and of this superstition in Norway; there is no stimulus awakening men from a passive and uninquiring state of mind."

"CHRISTIAN UNION NO. 1."

The first Anniversary of this Society was held in the Spring-street Church, N. Y., last week. The meeting was rendered interesting by the addresses of the Rev. Dr. Bond, Rev. S. Remmington, and Rev. Chas. J. Hopkins, who volunteered for the occasion. The music was under the direction of Prof. Nash, and was very fine. The object of the Society, as set forth by the Annual Report and speeches, seems to be a union of such members of all evangelical churches as may desire it, for the purpose of mutual assurance against sickness and other ills of human life. The initiation fee is three dollars; monthly dues, fifty cents; which entitles the member, in case of sickness, to the visits of other members, and the sum of four dollars weekly from the funds of the Society.

This Society, among other things, contemplates a union of Christians without uniformity. Upon this point the reverend speakers seem to have satisfied themselves, at least, that Christian union is a very different thing from Christian uniformity, and thus the two things are in no way dependent upon each other. An illustration of Dr. Bond was, that a grove of trees exhibited union; though there was no uniformity, there were leaves and limbs of various hues and forms, yet all in perfect union. We think the illustration imperfect, inasmuch as Christianity contemplates the exact conformity of its members to Christ and the TRUTH of God. Of course, the first aim is at uniformity; and uniformity of mind and soul in the truth will be followed by union of feeling and interest.

The fact seems to be apparent, that Christians of the present day are determined to maintain their denominational differences at all hazards, and to compensate for the sinfulness of their divisions by an artificial show of union, which appears to us quite Pharisaical, to say the least of it. We fully believe a want of uniformity among Christians to be SINFUL on the part of those who differ from the Word of God. Therefore any attempt to effect a union in any other way than by conformity to the truth, is in no small degree hypocritical, and tends much to degrade Christianity to a level with worldly and selfish associations. TROUBLE ABOUT A BISHOP.

There has been not a little excitement in England, for a while past, in relation to the appointment of a new Bishop of Hereford. It seems that the Queen, as head of the Church, has the right to nominate, and then issue permission to the Dean and Chapter of the Vacant See to elect. In this case, Lord John Russell, as representative of the Crown, nominated Dr. Hampden, late Regius Professor of Divinity in Oxford. Hereupon a majority of the Bishops of England issued their protest against his election, on the ground that he had taught and printed unsound doctrines. But he was elected, notwithstanding there protest; and his confirmation took place in Bow Church, London, on the 13th of January, amid a great crowd of people, by whom he was loudly cheered. An English paper says, "By a singular circumstance, the new Alderman, Mr. Salomons, of the Hebrew persuasion, appeared officially, as the Alderman of the Ward, in the corporation pew; and the whole ceremony terminated, after another ineffectual protest, which, it is said, is to be made the subject of an application to the Court of Queen's Bench."

Dr. Hampden, in a letter to Lord John Russell, setting forth his views and the grounds of objection to him, speaks as follows:—

"I have insisted, indeed, my Lord, constantly on the Supremacy of Scripture as our Rule of Faith. And what consistent member of the Church of England does not? But this very assertion of the Supremacy of Scripture has been taken up invidiously by some, as if I rejected altogether the authority of the Church, and undervalued its importance as a visible institution of Christ's religion. This, however, cannot by any means be justly said of me. I have ever taught that a deferential respect to the authority of the Church, as it is laid down and explained in the formularies of our Church, was most incumbent on Christians; though certainly not that high and transcendant respect which is due to the Inspired Word alone. But the fact is that many of those who are now objecting to me, will be satisfied with no view on this subject, that is not virtually the same as that of Rome,—ascribing to the Church, not only an authority of order, such as is claimed in our Articles, but an absolute authority for propounding matters of faith, and requiring its decisions to be received with unquestioning submission by its members. The Church, in their view, is not simply 'the witness and keeper of Holy Writ,' but the depository of revealed truth, the authoritative interpreter of Scripture, without which, Scripture is conceived by them to speak an uncertain sense.

"But what is this but to suppose, that the Church is endued with an infallible authority? For, unless it can pronounce infallibly, how can the Christian be required to receive its decisions as divine truths obligatory on his faith?

"This notion, however, of Church authority, will be found to be at the root of the objections of this class of theologians to the teaching of all who require that all doctrines should be drawn from Scripture. With them, the reference to Scripture is an 'heretical principle;' because it holds up the authority of Scripture over that of the Church in all questions of doctrine. Hence their animosity against all who thus establish the articles of faith, and their unchecked boldness in repeating charges of heresy against any confession of faith, however sound in itself, which claims to be simply scriptural in its authority. A person in their view is no believer, who does not hold their 'Church-principles'—that is, who does not build his faith on the Church in their sense."

Revival.—A letter from Bro. H. P. Burdick, dated Jan. 19, 1848, says: "Rev. O. B. Call is holding a series of meetings in Hartsville, in which all surrounding Christian denominations manifest a deep interest. Christians have been revived, backsliders reclaimed, sinners hopefully converted, and yet the work is going on."

The Devil's Press in London.—The London Patriot says that there are papers of an immoral stamp issued in London every Sunday, circulating 6,000,000 copies yearly. Four others weekly circulate 5,720,000 copies of a vicious tendency. There are besides seventy cheap periodicals, of which sixty are decidedly bad; one of these circulates 100,000. The sum total of this vicious circulation is not less than 29,000 000 of copies annually; nearly 5,000,000 more than the total issues of all the religious societies, papers, magazines, and reviews, in that kingdom. Every month's issues of this pernicious reading, exceed the yearly publications of the London Tract Society!

Progress of "Dissenters."—The London Patriot, speaking of the dissenting denominations, says: "There are well nigh 12,000 places of public worship in England, exclusive of the churches of the Establisnment, in which the gospel is proclaimed, and the Scriptures are expounded, every Lord's day. One of the best proofs that it is 'of God,' who has thus put honor upon his own institutions, is, that these same Protestant denominations, which have covered our fatherland with simple structures set apart for divine worship and Christian teaching, have also encircled the globe itself with a zone of missionary stations, and achieved, by the instrumentality they have sustained, the translation of the Word of God into all the languages of the earth."

A Revival.—The Christian Reflector publishes a report from Rev. J. Knapp of a revival in Rensselaerville, N. Y., a place about twenty-three miles from Albany. He says:—

"Some two hundred have been forward for prayers, more than half of whom are rejoicing in a crucified and risen Saviour. Universalists and infidels have been converted; rum-sellers, rum-drinkers, and gamblers, have been struck dumb, while the whole mountain of sin at one time seemed to be coming down in a mighty avalanche, and the kingdom of the devil all caving in. A large portion of the young gentlemen and ladies of the Academy have been converted. Persons of all ages, and in all circumstances, are among the converts. The merchant, the mechanic, and the farmer, including one prodigal physician, have all bowed together at the feet of Jesus."

The Revival among the Nestorians.—The Missionary Herald states that the fruits of the revival in Ooroomiah, in 1846, have not disappointed the hopes of our brethren. Eight months after the revival commenced, the genuine Nestorian converts were reckoned at not less than one hundred and fifty, of whom more than twenty inhabited the mountain villages. One third of the number were members of the two seminaries. The change in the moral and religious aspect of the large village of Geog Tapa, as the result of this work of grace, was surprisingly great. The blessed influence of the revival extended into Tergawer, a district in the mountains twenty-five or thirty miles west of Ooroomiah, and to Gawar, a district fifty miles still farther westward, within the limits of Koordistan. This region had not been explored by missionaries. The chief instruments employed by the Spirit to carry forward the work in the mountains were native converts.

Nor have the missionaries been without some tokens of the divine favor, particularly in the mountain districts, during the past year. A number of Nestorians have been hopefully born again; and the zeal and devotedness exhibited of late by the native preachers has been very animating.

The boys' seminary, now removed to Seir, contains forty pupils, and that for girls thirty-six; and there are thirty village free schools, containing four hundred and sixty pupils. An edition of the New Testament, with the ancient Syriac and a new translation into the modern Syriac in parallel columns, has been carried through the press.

Missionaries among the Chinese.—A letter from J. L. Shuck to the Tennesee Baptist, speaks as follows of the encouragements held out to missionaries in the various free ports of China:

"I have recently returned from a short visit to my old post at Canton. I am truly thankful for the orderings of that kind Providence, which now favor my location at Shanghai. Of all the five ports, Canton will be the most trying missionary position. It would be so especially to me at present. The hostility of the Canton populace towards all kind of foreigners, grows worse instead of better; and until the British authorities interfere, but little effectively can be accomplished in that city. The missionaries find it almost literally impossible to rent a dwelling among the people. The Cushing Treaty is a practical failure, as far as Canton is concerned. There are at present eleven male missionaries, of various denominations, preparing to take advantage of changes which we all hope and believe must, ere long, surely take place with reference to that city. Its millions of inhabitants MUST have the Gospel preached unto them.

"At Shanghai, the natives are most friendly disposed towards foreigners; houses are easily secured, and chapels can there be erected. Two chapels have already been opened, and have crowded Chinese audiences. Yong Seen Sarng and Mun Seen Sarng accompany us to Shanghai. Mr. and Mrs. Yates left for that city three weeks ago, and Mr. and Mrs. Tobey about a week since. I have engaged my passage up, and leave soon. The two American Methodist Missionaries have located at Foo Chowfoo. I sincerely wish our Board [the Southern] had Foo Chowfoo and Shanghai, instead of Canton and Shanghai."

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, last week, there was scarcely any business done but to discuss the Ten Regiment Bill. Speeches upon that subject were made by Messrs. Downs of Louisiana, Douglass of Illinois, Bell, Sevier, and others.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the subject of referring the different parts of the President's Message to appropriate committees, was under discussion nearly all the week, and was finally disposed of.

While the reference of the President's Message was under consideration, and a motion was before the House to refer so much of the Message as relates to the condition of the Treasury, and the means of raising money for the war, to the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Wilmot, of Pa., moved to amend, by instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to consider the expediency of imposing an annual direct tax of five millions of dollars during the continuance of the war, or until the payment of the national debt, on stocks, personal property, and money at interest; the said tax to be apportioned among the several States in proportion to population, as required by the Constitution. The amendment was accepted in Committee of the Whole, but afterwards rejected by the House.

Mr. Giddings of Ohio, offered a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee of five to inquire whether the Slave Trade should be carried on in the District of Columbia, and if so, by what particular authority; and whether any modification of the laws are necessary on this subject. It was laid over for debate.

LATER FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamship Acadia, which arrived at Boston last week, brought advices to Jan. 15, being two weeks later than those previously received. The accounts exhibit a decrease in the British revenue for 1847, as compared with 1846, of £967,540, omitting repayments of advances and the China instalment in the circulation. England's two-cent postage yielded a revenue of £864,000, being an increase of £48,000, in the last twelve months. Numerous and heavy commercial failures continue to distress the trading community and add to the numbers of unemployed workmen. Money, which very recently was in good request at 9 and 10 per cent, may now be had for 3.

The accounts from Ireland, generally, for a few weeks, had not been so bad as previously. There is, however, much suffering and insubordination yet. The distress in the South and West was becoming daily more severe and appalling. A Coroner's Inquest was held at Kenmure, County Kerry, on the bodies of four children who had died of starvation on the roadside, having been denied food by Captain Ommaney and the Kenmure Board of Guardians.

The European Times of the 15th says: "Reports of a collision between the people and the military at Milan are confirmed to-day. A sanguinary massacre has taken place, apparently with the acquiescence of the superior authorities. The number of inhabitants killed and wounded by the soldiery is variously stated from thirty to one hundred and fifty. Among the killed is the aged counselor of the Court Royale, M. Manganini, a man nearly seventy, and universally respected. He was murdered while peaceably and inoffensively entering his own house. The emeute arose out of some rough usage which was given to some of the military who had been smoking.

The young Queen of Spain was, at the last accounts, seriously ill. On the last day of the year she was taken with fits, said to be epileptic, and which created great alarm among those around her. It appears farther, that this is not the first time Her Majesty has been affected. By the last advices she had been for two hours insensible.

The Emperor of Russia is said to be seriously ill. The Cologne Gazette of January 5, says: "It is asserted that the Emperor of Russia is seriously indisposed with a billious fever, a complaint from which His Majesty has frequently suffered, and one which, as it is well known, is dangerous in Russia."

The Roman Pontiff has addressed the Diet of Switzerland, complaining of the sacrilegious acts which were committed in the Federal expedition, and of the dismissal of several religious orders, the existence of which in Switzerland was, he says, guarantied by compact.

Abd-el-Kader has finally surrendered to the Duc d'Aumele on condition that he should retire to St. Jean d'Acre. The French Government seem likely, however, to break the engagement.

Madame Adelaide, sister of the King of the French, died at the Tuilleries on the 31st December, in the 71st year of her age.

The Globe gravely announces that two new departments have been introduced into the Royal household—the one a "Millinery and Dressmaking Department," the other a "Florist and Artificial Flower-making Department." It adds that the Queen will save a great deal of money by the home manufacture of flowers and millinery.

On New-Year's day the Queen of England distributed to the poor of Windsor 1,684 lbs. of meat, 2,094 lbs. of bread, and 478 lbs. of plum-pudding, together with large quantities of blankets, winter cloaks, and calico.

J. Evans, aged 17, had broken a window in order that he might be sent to prison, as he was starving in London. He was so sent 14 days, to hard labor, but typhus fever carried him off in a day or two. The Daily News states that many starving wretches commit petty offences in order to get into Bridewell.

At the Bath-house for the laboring classes in George-st., London, since August, 1846, 154,221 males and 15,206 females have bathed; 45,124 women have washed for selves and families. A cold bath costs 2 cents, warm one 4; washers pay 6 cents for 4 hours, with many accommodations. At these prices the house pays.

Dr. Hampden, whose establisement in the See of Hereford has made so much noise, is a native of the island of Barbadoes.

The Oxford and Cambridge Review says that the practice of confession is obtaining to considerable extent in the Church of England.

One Alexander Williams and his wife, coffee-house keepers in London, severally cut their own throats within five minutes' time, on the 2d ult.

Dr. Wolff, the celebrated missionary traveler, preached in Birmingham on Christmas week.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECKS.—Intelligence has been received from Malta, of the total loss of H. M. steam-frigate Avenger, on the Sorelle rocks, off the Northern Coast of Africa. The Avenger had on board 270 persons, all of whom it is feared, were drowned, with the exception of a Lieutenant and three men. It appears, that, when the Avenger struck, two boats were lowered, one containing Lieut. Rooke, the Surgeon, the second Master and five seamen; but they were at once carried away from the ship, which they saw thrown upon her beam-ends, the sea making a clean breach over her. The boat reached the Coast of Africa at Bizerta, but was swamped in the attempt to land; only four persons, including Lieut. Rooke, gaining the shore. By the aid of some friendly Arabs they were enabled to reach Tunis. The Avenger was a first-class steamer, of 1,444 tons, and 650 horse-power.

The Ship Helena of Dundee, bound to that port with a cargo valued at $20,000, was wrecked on North Ronaldsha, on the 15th of December, and six of the crew drowned. The cargo will be partly saved.

INDIAN WAR.—War has broken out between the Delaware and Camanche Indians. One desperate battle has been fought, in which the Delawares were defeated, with a loss of 25 warriors. The alledged cause of the war was an incursion of the Delawares upon the hunting-grounds of the Camanches, and also favoring the whites in the war between the Indian tribes and Texas. The loss of their warriors had excited the Delaware nation to revenge, and they would probably have a considerable force to engage in future conflicts. A general Indian war was apprehended, and it was rumored that several tribes had volunteered to carry the war to the City of Mexico. A party of Camanches state that twelve horses were stolen from the camp of Capt. Gillett, on the Scio, a few months since. Lieut. Cozzens and twelve men followed them, and in nine days overtook and routed the Indians, killing seven. They recaptured the horses, and took others belonging to the Indians.

SUMMARY.

RUMORS OF PEACE continue to be plenty. There seems, however, but little room for doubt that the Mexican Government has offered to make peace on the terms demanded by our Government through Mr. Trist just previous to the taking of the City of Mexico, and that Mr. Trist has forwarded this proposition to Mr. Polk at Washington. If so, we can hardly allow ourselves to question that peace is at hand.

The N. Y. Tribune has received a number of the Nordlyset, (Northern Light,) a new paper in the Norwegian language, published at Norway, Racine Co., Wisconsin. It contains an unusual variety of matter, exhibiting a good deal of talent. There are now papers published in this country in seven different languages, namely, English, French, German, Spanish, Welsh, Norwegian, and Cherokee, to say nothing of the large number whose chief language is Billingsgate.

The Newburyport Herald says that the Stark Mills, of Manchester, ascertained on the 1st of January that they had lost $50,000, or more than one-twenty-fourth of their capital, during the last six months; and that the Amoskeag Company, one of the most successful in the country, is unable to make any dividend on the last six months' work. The Newburyport Mills have barely made enough to pay their work-people.

While the Cape Island stage was crossing the bridge over Menantico creek, between Millville, N. J., and Port Elizabeth, on the 24th ult., the horses becoming frightened, backed off from the bridge, in consequence of which a son of Mr. Edward Summers, of Millville, was drowned, together with both horses.

Thirteen miles of the New York and Erie Railroad have been completed since the last annual report, from Shawangunck summit to Port Jervis, on the Delaware, making in all 75 miles now in running order. The section from Port Jervis to Binghampton, 127 miles, is under contract, and the work is in such a state of forwardness that its completion is anticipated in the Fall of the present year.

Bell's Life in London states that "an artilleryman was shot on the 19th of Dec., for striking an assistant surgeon. Fourteen men of the 23d fired, but only one ball struck the unfortunate man, and that in the thigh, when the provost-sergeant shot him dead with a pistol. The whole of the firing party were in confinement for not doing their duty. Another man of the 6th Lancers was to be shot for throwing his cap in the face of his commanding officer."

The Concordia (La.) Intelligencer gives the particulars of a disaster which occurred near Grand Gulf on the 17th ult. Mr. Conger, son of a planter in Mississippi; and Mr. Alsop, an overseer, with two slaves, crossing the Mississippi in a skiff, were drawn into the Gulf eddy. Mr. Conger, seeing the danger, plunged into the water, but was overcome by the force of the current, and sunk when within twenty feet of the shore. The others remained in the skiff till it was drawn under, when all perished together.

Prof. Towney, of the University of Alabama, has lately made a tour of that State, and has found valuable and extensive deposits of coal, iron, limestone, millstone, freestone, marble of various kinds, and other substances, all capable of being turned to advantage, and adding immensely to the resources of that State.

The quantity of coal consumed in St. Louis during the past year amounted in the aggregate to 1,454,048 bushels, which sold at an average price of 14 cents per bushel. It is calculated that by means of a railroad from that city to the mines, the article could be delivered to the consumer at about half the above price, which would yield to the citizens a nett saving of about $106,785 36.

Few are aware of the immense quantities of wood consumed by the various railroad companies between Albany and Buffalo. The Utica and Schenectady consume about 25,000 cords of 2 feet wood per annum; the Auburn and Rochester road, about 15,000 cords; and the Tonawanda road, 8,000 cords. The other roads consume, probably, from 30,000 to 35,000 cords—making the whole amount upwards of 80,000 cords per annum.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, writing from Constantinople, says that "a decoration in diamonds of a Turkish Order of Honor, such as is given to Pachas of two tails, is actually in the hands of our Legation, for Professor Morse, from the Sultan, in return for the view of his Telegraph. It will arrive in America with a Royal diploma at the same time."

Edmund, Bishop of Chester, appointed his son Register of that Bishopric in 1769; the office required no talent, a couple of slender clerks did the duty; the income was about $20,000 a year. When the father in God bestowed the place on his boy he was but 14 years old. In 1830 he had held it 61 years, and drawn from the public, for services not worth $50 a year, just $1,216,734.

The Times and Keystone says that a man named Harrison killed another named Miller, a fortnight since, with a wagon-spoke, in Webber's Prairie, near Austin. Harrison has fled. What renders the affair remarkable is the fact that, three years ago, Miller killed another man with the same species of weapon.

An exchange says that an old man in St. Louis, silvered by the frosts of many winters, tottered to the calaboose, and said to the keeper, "I believe, sir, you keep this place." "I do, sir," was the reply. "Then, sir, lock me up, for I have been six weeks trying to get sober, and cannot."

A discovery has recently been made of Cannel coal near St. Louis, Mo., possessing the qualities of the celebrated English Cannel coal; and from a geological survey which has been made, it is supposed to be the largest known body of Cannel coal in the world.

Lieut. Burke, of the Bombay Engineers, has published a pamphlet, in which he states that one of the salt beds of Scinde contains an area of 3,000 miles of salt, of an average thickness of 3 feet, or a supply equal to the consumption of 100,000,000 of people for 1,600 years.

James Carlisle, at the late sitting of the Court of General Sessions for Darlington District, South Carolina, Hon. Judge Wardlow presiding, plead guilty to the charge of selling a negro slave, the property of Mr. P. W. Pledger, of Marlboro' District, and was sentenced to be hung on Friday, the 25th day of February.

From the Yazoo (Miss.) Whig we learn that on a recent bear hunt in that vicinity Dr. Isaac Hamberlin was so mutilated in a conflict with a bear, which he had wounded, that he died in four days after receiving his injuries. The bear was finally killed, and weighed, with his entrails out, three hundred and forty pounds.

The Governor of Massachusetts has commuted the sentence of death passed upon Geo. Hunnewell by the Supreme Court at Lowell, to imprisonment for life. The culprit was of a family long known in Cambridge for its riotous character, and had been subjected through life to the most degrading and vicious examples.

At a recent sitting of the Academy of Rhoims, it was stated that a surgeon had cured a carpenter of lockjaw, which supervened from a wound inflicted by a nail that had punctured his foot, by repeatedly causing him to inhale ether, which removed the symptoms as long as its influence lasted, and gradually rendered the attacks less dangerous, until at last a perfect cure was effected.

The Pope has lately granted a dispensation in case of marriage of a Catholic with a Jewess; and in doing it, suggests that though these marriages are uncanomical, yet when consummated by the civil authorities, they had better be winked at by the churches.

The Marshall Statesman (Michigan,) says that twice the number of murders have been committed in that State in a year and a half since the abolition of Capital Punishment, than were perpetrated in ten years previous to the passage of that law.

The St. Louis papers say that the steamer Planter burst both of her boilers on the 5th ult., at 12 Mile Island in the Illinois river. She had many passengers, 5 of whom were killed, and many others severely if not fatally injured, including the captain, first clerk, and first engineer.

The Norwich News states that a young lady lately died in Windham, Ct., from excitement produced by a letter from her mother, threatening abandonment unless she disclosed the father of her illegitimate child.

A towel dipped in hot water and applied to the part affected, will, it is said, afford an effective and immediate relief to the painful contraction of the muscles called the cramp.

Any free negro who remains in Kentucky for 90 days will hereafter be liable to be sold into slavery for one year. There is an old act to this effect, and it is about to be put in force.

There are 17 vessels now on the stocks at Cleveland, Ohio—two steamboats, one propeller, and 14 sail vessels.

A gentleman dropped his umbrella from the gallery of St. Michael's Church, London, which fell upon the head of a lady, causing her death the next day.

Pollock, the young "Middy," who attempted to kill Mr. Jewett of the Buffalo Commercial, by shooting three balls into him, has been pardoned by Gov. Young.

The steamboat Columbia went up to Albany on the 4th of February.

The annual report of D. V. Bell, Esq., Auditor General of Michigan, makes the total debt of the State for which she is liable without contingency, $2,290,768 51. Then there is a contingent indebtedness, so called, on account of $3,813,000 delivered to the U. S. Bank, but paid for only in part. Michigan acknowledges her indebtedness for the money received on them, with interest, together amounting, on the 1st of Jan. last, after deducting all payments made by the Southern and Central Railroad Companies, $1,700,480. This added to $2,290,768 51 mentioned above, makes the total admitted debt of the State $5,513,480 51.

The last number of the Massachusetts Cataract, contains an interesting letter from Mr. John B. Gough, giving account of his labors for the past year, in which he states that he has spoken 240 times, besides addressing children; traveled 7,319 miles; obtained 10,836 names to the pledge, besides children; and visited 162 cities, towns or villages. In all his travels of about 45,000 miles, by stage, steamboat and railroad, he has never met with any accident, nor been detained by any casualty.

The London Lancet for December has a letter from Dr. Coates, giving an account of the case of an old man, whom he found suffering with severe pain in one side of the face and head, which were highly inflamed and swollen. Fomentations, poultices, &c., were applied for two or three days without avail. One night a fit of sneezing forced out of the ear, which had discharged pus, a piece of bone that proved to be one of the wisdom teeth of the upper jaw. After that he soon recovered.

The Gardiner Fountain contains a statement of the amount of lumber manufactured in that village, and by the two mills on the opposite side of the river, in Pittston. The total amount of log lumber is 20,834 M; shingles, 16,302 M; clapboards, 1,905 M; laths, 4,050 M. The amount of money received for sales on the above lumber is $445,000. The logs cost in Gardiner about three-fifths of that amount, leaving the amount of $178,000 for profits and expenses of manufacturing.

Mr. Controller Fillmore has applied to the Legislature of New York for power to foreclose the mortgage given as security by the Atlas Bank at Clymer for $65,000. He urges that so large a mortgage could not be sold but at a large sacrifice, and that by foreclosing and cutting the property up into parcels, a much larger result could be obtained.

Dr. Troost, the Geologist appointed by the State of Tennessee to make an examination of its mineral resources, has discovered in Summer County a bed of granular silicious rock, which is remarkably well adapted to the manufacture of the finest of glass. He recommends the establishment of glass works in the neighbor hood of this strata.

The London Sun says: "The arrival of apples from the United States of America are beyond precedent in extent, and the quality is remarkably fine. In several instances vessels arriving from New York have brought as many as nearly one thousand packages of this fruit, of the excellent description of the Newtown pippin."

On the 24th ult., Mademoiselle Emma A., one of the first æronauts of France, made her fifth ascension from Bingamin Race-course, opposite New Orleans. She arose to a great hight, and descended in one of the streets of New Orleans, where she was received by her brother, who had followed her on horseback.

OUR OWN AFFAIRS.—It is nearly four years since the Sabbath Recorder was established in the city of New York, for the purpose of promoting the interests of the Sabbath and of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Thus far the enterprise has not been a source of pecuniary profit; on the contrary, the few individuals who associated themselves to sustain it have had occasion to draw to some extent upon their own resources. But of this they do not complain, because it was what they expected, and what they were willing to do for the sake of the cause. The time is at hand, however, when they wish to enter upon more extensive and permanent arrangements, which they hope will enable them better to serve the denomination without adding to their own burdens. In order to do so, it is necessary for them to settle up the accounts of the paper to the close of the present volume, and begin with clean books. They therefore request those indebted to the establishment, one and all, to make an immediate effort to liquidate such indebtedness. Brethren and friends, will you do it? The small sums which are due us make a large sum in the aggregate—a sum which we greatly need to enable us to meet our bills as they become due. We hope, therefore, that you will not allow this request to pass unheeded, but will give it immediate attention. To encourage promptness, and to secure as complete a settlement as possible, we propose to receive $2 per year on old accounts, if paid previous to the close of the present volume. All accounts remaining unsettled at that time will be kept separate from future accounts, and will be charged at the rate of $2 50 per year, according to our published terms. Next week we shall commence sending bills to those who owe us. If these bills are incorrect in any respect, we will cheerfully alter them on a representation of the case. If they are correct, we hope the money will be immediately forwarded, either through our agents or directly to us.

CHRISTIAN PSALMODY.

THE New Collection of Hymns with this title, prepared by a Committee of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, was published on the 10th day of Sept. last, and is for sale at this office. It contains over one thousand hymns, together with the usual table of first lines, and a complete index of particular subjects, the whole covering 576 pages. The work is neatly printed, on fine paper, and bound in a variety of styles to suit the tastes and means of purchasers. The price in strong leather binding is 75 cents per copy; in imitation morocco, plain, 87½ cents; ditto, gilt edges, $1 00; ditto, full gilt, $1 12½; in morocco, full gilt, $1 37½. Those wishing books will please forward their orders, with particular directions how to send, to GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

MOTHER, HOME, AND HEAVEN.

BY S. D. ANDERSON.

"The three sweetest words in the English language are Mother, Home, and Heaven."

Mother—
The first fond word our hearts express,
In childhood's rosy hours;
When life seems full of happiness,
As nature is of flowers;
A word that manhood loves to speak,
When time has placed upon his cheek,
And written on his brow,
Stern lessons of the world's untruth,
Unheeded in his thoughtless youth,
But sadly pondered now,
As time brings back, 'mid vanished years,
A mother's fondest hopes and fears.

Home—
Free from the tempter's snare;
A Paradise where kindred hearts
May revel without care;
A wife's glad smile is imaged here,
And eyes that never knew a tear,
Save those of happiness,
Beam on the hearts that wander back,
From off the long and beaten track
Of sordid worldliness,
To ask those purer joys that come
Like angels round the hearth at Home.

Heaven—
The end of all a Mother's prayers—
The Home of all her dreams;
The guiding star to light our path,
With hope's encheering beams—
The haven for our storm-tossed bark,
From out a world where wild and dark
The tempests often rise—
But still in every darksome hour,
This hope will rise, with holy power,
And point us to the skies,
Where Mother, Home, and Heaven are seen,
Without a cloud to intervene.

From the Louisville Examiner.

THE DUEL.

We copy the following from the Raleigh Register, of North Carolina:

"We regret to learn that Henry F. Harris, Esq., a member of the last Legislature, from Pitt county, was killed in a a duel, on Friday morning last, at the Half-way House, on the Dismal Swamp Canal, a short distance within the Virginia side of the line, by E. C. Yellowly, Esq., of the same county."

Mr. Harris was an impetuous, ill-disciplined, passionate man. He was the Whig representative, last year, from his district. Mr. Yellowly, who is amiable, yet resolute, opposed his nomination. Harris was returned by only fifteen majority, when the party could have given him hundreds. Stung by the smallness of the return, he said, after the poll was over, to Yellowly—

"You d———d scoundrel, you are the cause of this. If you had not opposed my nomination, I should have had the usual majority."

"I opposed your nomination," replied Yellowly, "as I had a right to do, but I supported you at the ballot-box."

Thereupon Harris struck him—they clinched—and were separated. Many supposed this would end the matter. But Harris retired to his room—armed himself with a double barreled gun—pursued Yellowly, swearing he would shoot him the first place he met him. The citizens here interfered, and bound both parties to keep the peace for twelve months.

But though the letter of the law was kept, its spirit was violated. Every day, and often by moonlight, Harris was out practicing, until he had perfected himself! When the year had expired, the parties met, and the aggressor fell! He died by the hand of his brother, and that in the midst of his long-engendered and bitter hate. He died, his last endeavor being to rob that brother of his life! The dead sleeps; the survivor, though innocent as the duelist ever can be, will mourn the blood he has shed, and know peace never more.

Is it not strange, that man should resort to so savage and barbarous a practice? Is it not a marvel that he should deliberately inflict a double murder—first upon his adversary, and, second, a more terrible one upon himself? And for what? An insult—breath hastily or hotly poured out. This, honor says, must be atoned for, and the price is blood, human blood, the life God has given, and which none but God has the right to take. Honor! There is not a step taken—from the first conception to the last act of the duel—not a line penned—not an arrangement made—which is not marked by dishonor, by meanness, by a species of trick and management which, elsewhere, and under any other circumstances, would be scouted as contemptible, and scorned as base, by all just-minded men.

Trace the history of a duel.

A challenge passes. What is the first step which follows, as a general rule? That the parties put themselves under immediate training. They get the best pistols. Friends go out with them; they take a sapling as a mark, they fire at that, until they can hit it easily—until they are considered "a good or sure shot." The opponents do not meet each other in the glow of passion, or ere the blood has cooled, and settle their differences at once. The crack of the pistol is not the immediate consequence of the insult offered or the injury done. But deliberately they go to work, and work hard and constantly, until they can rim a young tree no bigger round than a man's thumb. When this is accomplished, they have taken the first step.

The next is, to accustom the nerves to the shock of firing. A man may fire well when he is shooting alone! But the crack of a gun shot by another, may so startle him, as to drive him wide of the mark. To this crack he must be thoroughly accustomed. The first step is, consequently, to use cork balls in the practice. The ground is measured; mock seconds are put in proper places; a mock opponent stands opposite; the word is given; and they fire. This is kept up for days. It is kept up until the cool observer, or the experienced trainer, and the parties themselves, know that the eye and the ear are familiarly accustomed to every movement which will be made on the field of blood.

But as this bracing the nerves is an all-important matter, another course of training is resorted to, if the parties waver at all. Indeed, it is rarely omitted by regular duelists. Four or five friends stand round the parties; some before, some back, some in front of him; as the word is given—are you ready—prepare—fire—they all blaze away, and generally before he shoots. This is continued until the parties can aim as well amid the confusion and noise as if they were alone. Sometimes, when fears are entertained, that the nerves of the parties are not steady, muskets, or heavily charged guns, are fired in their faces—and fired until they are entirely unconcerned and firm. The physical man is thus trained to meet the emergency, trained to blunt—to deaden his sensibilities—so that he may more surely take the life of another, and save his own.

When thus prepared, the parties meet. And now comes an opportunity for the display of cunning and trick.

First, there is a good deal in choice of position. The sun may affect the sight at one point; a tree may be near, so as to give line to the pistol; the ground may be slightly rising, and if so the uppermost will be apt to overshoot—these, and twenty other important, or material advantages, are to be examined into by seconds, and turned to the best account by their principals.

Second, there is much in giving the word. A principal gets accustomed to his second's voice—its pauses—the length of them—and knows, after long practice, exactly what to do. For instance. One second is slow—another fast; or one begins deliberately, and quickens as he goes on; if the party gets his own second, he has an advantage equal sometimes to half, and, at others, to a full count. This any one may readily perceive by pronouncing the usual command—Are you ready—prepare—fire—one, two, three—in different tones, and with slower or quicker movement.

Third, there is a good deal in the dress. Every object, such as a button, or breastpin, or anything which makes a contrast, is carefully removed. The usual dress of the duelist is a large light morning wrapper, made as near the color of the earth as may be. This is starched. Thus, the adversary cannot fix his eyes upon a particular spot, and, as it bags out, he is liable to mistake the true position of the body. And then the parties are drilled to put the body in as small a compass as possible, so as to guard the vital parts as far as it can be done.

If neither party is hurt, after firing, they make up, and have a laugh over it. If one falls, the other escapes as if he knew he had done a felon deed.

This is a brief outline of this honorable practice! The reader has in the details given—more or less true of all Southern dueling—a picture of the course which honorable men pursue in endeavoring to slay each other! Could anything, in itself, be more degrading or contemptible? Is there any practice, weak or vain, more richly deserving the ridicule and scorn of all brave men. It is a map of human weakness and meanness—an insult to every manly feeling and religious principle, and should be hooted out of civilized society as the foul and irreligious blot of a rude and barbarous age.

INDUSTRY OF NAPOLEON.

No victory allured him into a moment's repose—no luxuries tempted him to cease—and no success bounded his impetuous desires. Laboring with an intensity and rapidity that accomplished the work of days in hours, he nevertheless seemed crowded to the very limit of human capacity by the vast plans and endless projects that asked and received his attention. In the cabinet he astonished every one by his striking thoughts and indefatigable industry. The forms and ceremonies of court could not keep his mind, hardly for an hour, from the labor which he seemed to covet. He allowed himself usually but four or five hours for rest, and during his campaign exhibited the same almost miraculous activity of mind. He would dictate to one set of secretaries all day, and after he had tired them out, call for a second, and keep them on the stretch all night, snatching but a brief repose during the whole time. His common practice was to rise at two in the morning, and dictate to his secretaries for two hours, then devote two hours more to thought alone, then he would take a warm bath and dress for the day. But in a pressure of business this division of labor and rest was scattered to the winds, and he would work all night. With his night gown wrapped around him, and a silk handkerchief tied about his head, he would walk backwards and forwards in his apartment from dark till daylight, dictating to Caulincourt, or Duroc, or D'Albe, his chief secretary, in his impetuous manner, which required the highest exertion to keep pace with; while Rustan, his faithful Mameluke, whom he brought from Egypt, was up also, bringing, from time to time, a strong cup of coffee to refresh him. Sometimes at midnight, when all was still, this restless spirit would call out, "Call D'Albe; let every one arise;" and then commenced working, allowing himself no intermission or repose till sun-rise. He has been known to dictate to three secretaries at the same time, so rapid were the movements of his mind, and yet so perfectly under his control. He never deferred business for an hour, but did on the spot what then claimed his attention. Nothing but the most ironlike constitution could have withstood these tremendous strains upon it.

RUSSIAN MARRIAGES.

Marriages in Russia are curious. The priest meets the parties at the door of the church. The relatives also enter, having received the benediction of the priest. They go with him to the altar, where he puts wax candles in their hands—a crown is placed on the bridegroom's head. The priest puts a ring upon one of their fingers, and it is passed round till it is placed on the finger of the bride. He goes round the altar, followed by the friends and the couple—he gives them his benediction. It takes place in the richest churches in Russia. The same ceremonies are performed on a marriage in the family of the Emperor, except that the crown is held above, not placed on their heads. Being once present at a marriage of the royal family, the crown was held up by boys, and it was amusing to see them stretching themselves to hold it up. The music was delightful. I have frequently heard the choir of the Pope, but it is nothing when compared with what I heard at that marriage. I never heard music so touching. Their dresses were beautiful. The bride had a train twelve feet long, made of rich velvet, and lined throughout with ermine, and it took five men to bear her train, who, as she moved round the altar, followed her. It was attached to her dress below the shoulder. There were many things about it very imposing. The Te Deum was sung most beautifully. There are many singular things connected with their private life. When making a dinner, the host and hostess do not sit, but, like Abraham, serve their guests. The gentlemen go up to the ladies and kiss their hands, and if they are intimate, the lady kisses his cheek. These are Asiatic customs, but there is no doubt that in a few years they will pass away, and European be introduced in their place.

NEW LANDS IN NEW ENGLAND.

Hon. Isaac Hill is reported to have made at Lebanon the other day the following remarks:

Prompted by an ardent curiosity to learn locations and duly estimate the value of that part of the north which has been passed by, as scarcely fit for settlement, I made my way through the northerly part of Vermont into the Canada townships to the Indian stream country, and down through New Hampshire, during the past winter. I was surprised at the extent and value of this whole country for farming purposes. I believe the belt of country for one hundred miles south of the 45th degree eastward of Lake Champlain, over Vermont and New Hampshire, through the whole extent of Maine to the Bay of Fundy and the sea, to be the most valuable tract of land in New England. The Canada townships of 10 miles square farther north are splended; Stanstead may be taken as a sample. The best township of Vermont is said to be Derby, lying side by side of it. The cattle and the productions of these two towns are all upon a larger scale than we find down south. Both in the Canada townships and within our own limits there are thousands on thousands of acres of beautiful lands, covered with the heaviest and most valuable timber, yet to be taken up. The climate here, most conducive to health and long life, should be regarded as no obstacle to the settler. The railroads are destined to make every standing tree valuable; the splendid growth need not be cut down, girdled, or wasted upon these lands. Upon this region the snow falling in November sometimes covers the ground till May. Contrary to my previous expectations, I am led to consider this annual covering a benefit rather than an injury; it gives a time for active business to all who have a desire to stir about; there the winter is the gayest and most desirable season. Clothed with its white covering, the ground is generally preserved from deep frost, and the spring opens as a continued summer for the growth of vegetation.

[Vt. Chronicle.

THE RUINS OF NINEVEH.

Mr. Azariah Smith, in a letter to Prof. Silliman, an extract of which is given in the last number of the Journal, remarks that it was his rare fortune to travel, a few weeks previously, in company with Mr. Layard, the English gentleman who, aided by a scientific Society of Great Britain, has been employed for the last year or two in making excavations about the ruins of Nineveh. His main work has been done at Nimrood, at or near the junction of the Zab and the Tigris, some twenty miles south of the excavations made by Mons. Botta, at Khorsabad. From inscriptions, partially deciphered, it would appear that one of the three palaces disentombed at Nimrood, and that at Khorsabad, were built by father and son, or other near relations; and from other inscriptions disentombed by Mr. Layard from the mound of Zoyumjonk—the mounds of long repute directly opposite the city of Mosul—it would appear that that also sustains a similar relation to the others. From this fact, the view formerly assumed that Nineveh was latterly made up of several collections of houses interspersed with gardens, receives additional support, and all doubt is now removed from those passages of sacred and profane history which make it an exceeding great city of three days' journey.

Among other most interesting stones, sculptured and carved, sent to England from the disentombed palaces of Nimrood, there is an obelisk of considerable size—containing, as appears from the partially deciphered inscription, a chronological list of the kings of Assyria—beginning with Ninus; and it would seem that it agrees with authoritative Egyptian Chronology. But space forbids farther detail. The public will soon have all the inscriptions, translated, before them.

A NEW YORK MERCHANT.—The late Gideon Lee, at one time Mayor of New York, used to remark—"No trade can be sound that is not beneficial to both parties, to the buyer as well as to the seller. A man may obtain a temporary advantage by selling an article for more than it it worth, but the very effect of such operations must recoil on him in the shape of bad debts and increased risks."

A person with whom Mr. Lee had some transactions, once boasted to him that he had, on one occasion, obtained an advantage over such a neighbor. "To-day," said he, "I have obtained one over you." "Well," replied Mr. Lee, "that may be; but if you will promise never to enter my office again, I will give you that bundle of goat-skins." The man made the promise and received the skins. Fifteen years afterward he walked into Mr. Lee's office. At the instant, on seeing him, he exclaimed—"You have violated your treaty; pay me for the goat-skins!" "Oh!" said the man, "I am quite poor, and have been very unfortunate since I saw you." "Yes," said Mr. Lee, "and you always will be poor; that miserable desire of over-reaching others, must ever keep you so."

FAMILY OF LEGH RICHMOND.—Mr. Richmond's first object was to make home the happiest place to his children; to render them independent of foreign alliances, in their pursuits and friendships; and so to interest them in domestic enjoyments, as to preclude the feeling, too common in young people, of restlessness and longing to leave their own firesides, and wander abroad in search of pleasure and employment. In this attempt to satisfy his family, and engage their compliance with his wishes, he so completely succeeded, that every member of it left home with regret, even on an occasional visit, and returned to Turvey with fond anticipation, as to the place of their treasures.

"Steam," said Mr. Webster, in a late speech, "is on the rivers, and the boatmen may repose on their oars; it is in the highways, and begins to exert itself along the courses of land conveyances; it is at the bottom of mines, a thousand feet below the earth's surface; it is in the mills, and in the workshops of the trades. It rows, it pumps, it excavates, it carries, it draws, it lifts, it hammers, it weaves, it spins, it prints."

VARIETY.

In the province of Andalusia, in Spain, there is a river called the Tinto, from the fringe of its waters, which are as yellow as topaz. It possesses the most extraordinary and singular qualities. If a stone happens to fall in and rest upon another, they both become, in one year's time, perfectly united and conglutinated. All the plants on its banks are withered by its waters whenever they overflow. No kind of verdure will come up where its water reaches, nor any fish live in its stream. It rises in the Sierra Morena mountains, and its singular properties continue until other rivers run into it and alter its nature.

The London Art Union last year received nearly $100,000 from its immense list of members. This amount was expended for works of art, to be distributed to them in turn. Each member received two handsome engravings from steel plates,—"The Last Embrace," and "A Neapolitan Wedding," and seven designs in outline. There were beside distributed 706 works of painting and sculpture,—which were assigned by lot among its 17,871 members. The successful members had the right to select such picture or statue as they might choose, from those in the British exhibitions or the year, excepting in certain specified instances.

An association for cleaning clothes and boots, has just been put in operation in Berlin. Employees of the Society are stationed in more than thirty public places and great establishments in the city, who speedily put the costumes of passengers in the streets into perfect order. The association has also set up an umbrella lending establishment. For the pledge of a Thaler (about seventy-five cents) any one can borrow an umbrella at any one of the stations, and receive back his pledge on returning it, either where he borrowed it, or at any of the stations, on the payment of some five cents for a whole day's use, or a less sum for a shorter time.

A monkey tied to a stake was robbed by the Johnny Crows (in the West Indies) of his food, and he conceived the following plan for punishing the thieves. He feigned death, and lay perfectly motionless on the gronnd, near the stake. The crows approached by degrees, and got near enough to steal his food, which he allowed them to do. This he repeated several times, till they became so bold as to come within reach of his claws. He calculated his distance, and laid hold of one of them. Death was not his plan of punishment. He was more refined in his cruelty. He plucked every feather out of the crow, and then let him go and show himself to his companions.

The London correspondent of the National Intelligencer, under date of December 16th, writes as follows:—An alarming piece of news is, that the cholera is undoubtedly in London, and has broken out with extreme virulence in Golden Lane, and other densely populated parts of the city. The police keep watch and ward there to interdict communication. The symptoms of the disease are of a very alarming nature, exhibiting itself in plague spots, and other fearful characteristics. This is truly a melancholy close to my communication. I hope the matter is made the worse of, but I have many fears.

A German, in giving testimony in the Common Pleas, as relates to the gold pencil-case suit, was asked how large the money drawer was in which Mrs. Fritz was said to have put the pencil-case found by the child. After some little hesitation, he spread his hands apart, as if to show the length, and finally said he thought it was "about a shoe and a half long," but finding the audience laughing, he reconsidered, and said he meant "a foot and a half."

The Dissenters of Jamaica have established an organ of their own, upon a broad basis. The name of the new journal is the "Messenger," and it is published weekly. Its principal object is the advancement of the cause of religion, and the circulation of missionary intelligence, without distinction of sect.

The elm tree is full grown in 150 years, but lives from 500 to 600 years. The oak is full grown in 200 years. The ash in 100. An oak in 3 years grows 2 feet 10 inches; the elm, 8 feet 3 inches; the beech, 1 foot 5 inches; the poplar, 6 feet, and the willow 9 feet 2 inches.

Major Noah says that the Jesuits, whose Church in Elizabeth-st., New York, was recently burned down, have applied to a Jewish congregation for the use of a newly erected building intended for a Synogogue, but not yet consecrated, until their Church can be rebuilt. The time was when a Christian would not have asked a favor from a Hebrew.

Another veteran Jerseyman of the Revolution has been taken from us—Aaron Chamberlain, of Monmouth county, who died on the 21st ult, aged near 100 years. It is remarkable that his brother, also a soldier of the Revolution, died at Manasquan, in the same county, a few years since, aged over 100 years.

The following recipe for the throat distemper, has been very much approved of in England:—"The pulp of a roasted apple, mixed with an oz. of tobacco, the whole wet with spirits of wine, or any other high spirits, spread on a linen cloth, and bound upon the throat at any period of the disorder."

It has been written of an absolute monarch, that the force of his power is not "in what he wills, but what he can." Prince Metternich is understood to have said, upon his recent failure in Italy; "The power is not in vat I-vill, but in Vat-i-can."

An old picture, founded on a solemn fact, represents a king sitting in state, with a label, "I govern all;" a bishop with a legend, "I pray for all;" a soldier with the motto, "I fight for all;" and a farmer drawing reluctantly forth a purse, with the superscription, "I PAY for all."

No man hath measured the power of kindness, for it is boundless; no man hath seen its death, for it is eternal. In all ages of the world, in every clime, among every kind, it hath shone out—a bright and beautiful star, a beaming glory!

A windy political orator, made a speech, in every sentence of which he had something to say about sound political principles. A bye-stander remarked, that if his principles were like his speech, they were all sound.

AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:
First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, }
IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

SUNDAY LAWS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

My acknowledgements are due to some unknown correspondent, for sending me a copy of the Charleston Courier of Jan. 25, containing a report of speeches before the highest tribunal in the State of South Carolina, in a suit carried up by the City of Charleston, to sustain its laws to prohibit Sabbath-keepers, as well as others, from pursuing their usual avocations on Sunday. Having been much interested in its perusal, I send it to you, and ask for it a place in your columns. I would take the liberty of commending it to the friends of compulsory sabbatizing, and especially to the members of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, who seem to have taken such matters in special charge. I have marked two sentences for italic; not because they are any more true than what others have said, but because they were spoken by men of eminent abilities and much legal lore—men who are above suspicion of ignorance on the subject, or of being moved by the influence of sectarian zeal. The course of such men contrasts strangely with that of those who in God's name utter sentiments widely different, putting falsehood for truth—darkness for light.

We have in New York about three thousand men who are restricted in their civil rights by just such laws as those under consideration. It might be well for the cause of truth if they should, by a proper regard to their own rights, provoke a similar suit, and so hasten the day when we shall sever entirely the adulterous connection of church and state.

Yours, &c., PAUL STILLMAN.

Benjamin ads. City Council.

This case, which was one of extraordinary interest, it being partly of a theological character, was argued before the Court of Errors last Wednesday and Thursday. It attracted, as cases involving questions of religion always do, a large number of highly respectable visitors to the Court, among whom were several of the reverend clergy. On ordinary occasions, the sittings of the supreme tribunal, and the recondite arguments of learned counsel on nice and complicated questions of the law of the land, do not gather together, from the engrossing occupations of business and study, many spectators and listeners; but whatever touches that tender thing, conscience, and that bold thing, liberty of conscience, is sure to awaken a deep interest among our intelligent thinkers of all classes. Not a little curiosity also exists among inquisitive persons to see how the gentlemen of the long robe, as they are called in England, will manage those knotty things, which are unquestionably, by a diviner right than that of monarchy, the peculiar province of the clergy, I mean theological points. In the United States, where a divorce was early effected, by the agency of Mr. JEFFERSON, between Church and State, but not absolutely and in all cases between Law and Divinity, it is sometimes amusing to witness with what love, with what profound veneration, with what holy zeal and fervor, approaching in intensity to the loving sentiments which a State Senator has asserted politicians feel for the banks,—I say it is amusing and delightful to see, with how much of this kindness and respect the dignitaries of the bar sometimes approach the dignitaries of the pulpit, and how piously they laud to the skies Christianity and its institutions. An English visitor, on these occasions, might almost suppose that some lingering regret was felt, even in republican America, that the holy alliance of church and State had ever been sundered;—that those who keep the strong-box of the government, or wield its powers, were not also, as in times of yore, the keepers of the people's consciences;—and that if we have no established religion, yet, that in the opinion of some at least of our wisest heads, we ought to have one, or ought never to have got rid of the one we once had in South Carolina. In all cases of this kind, there are, of course, two sides, and each side has its advocate or advocates, learned in the law; and, although the church, on both sides, is approached with respect and becoming deference, yet it is very evident, in the end, to the losing party, that a wolf, however gently it has approached, has certainly been in the sheep fold, and that its receding footsteps are marked with a stream of blood.

The present case was carried up, on appeal, from the decision of His Honor, Judge RICE, the Recorder, who had decided in the City Court of Charleston, that it was not unlawful for an Israelite to vend goods on the first day of the week, usually called the Lord's day, and that the ordinance of the City Council, declaring it (under such circumstances) to be so, was unconstitutional, i. e. contrary to the Constitution of the United States and that of the State of South Carolina, and therefore null and void and no law. The case was argued with much ability by WILLIAM D. PORTER, Esq., City Attorney, and JAMES L. PETIGRU, L. L. D., for the City Council, and by Colonel JOHN PHILLIPS, for the appellee.

Mr. PETIGRU expressed his regret that the question had been raised at all, and thought it would have been more becoming in the Jews, as good citizens, around whom the Constitution of the country had thrown its ample protection, to have acquiesced in the ordinance without murmuring, thereby paying due respect to the institutions of a country preëminently Christian. Yet, in an age and country like ours, where civil liberty, in its largest sense, exists, and the spirit of free inquiry, connected with much intelligence, prevails, it was probably impossible to prevent the agitation of this question in all its bearings; a question of the utmost magnitude, seriously affecting the rights, civil and religious, of a respectable portion of our fellow-citizens, and one over which the Christian world, confident in its usages, has strangely slept for centuries. The setting apart one day in seven as a day of rest, and of religious observance, is eminently proper for Christians living in a Christian land, both as a measure of State policy, and of religious obligation. Whether the Christian religion has positively designated any particular day for this purpose, and solemnly enjoined the keeping of it; whether the United States, or particular States of the Union, have done so likewise, making a spiritual observance of the day binding on all citizens, the Jews included; or whether the authority for keeping the day, in a certain way, rests wholly, as Arch-Deacon PALEY insists, on immemorial usage; the propriety and importance of the thing, and the analogy which such an institution bears to the Jewish Sabbath, positively ordained by God himself, and forming an emphatic part of those laws which are of universal obligation, are certainly grave and momentous questions. It is impossible to prevent men from mooting them. Probably they should have been propounded and discussed more in times past than they have been; but, now, when both religious liberty and civil rights are concerned in the discussion, a further waving of the inquiry becomes quite impracticable. No Christian need be apprehensive as to the result, but justice to all parties must be done.

Mr. PORTER opened the case in behalf of the City Council. He argued, that the State had given to the City Council power to pass all ordinances necessary and proper for the security and welfare of the community, and for the preservation of order and good government in the same, and insisted that the ordinance in question only carried out the power thus granted by the Legislature—that it was not in conflict with the Constitution of 1790, and had existed, unchallenged, for the space of forty years. The object of the constitutional provision, he said, was to secure the free exercise of religious profession and worship, and to declare that liberty of conscience should be enjoyed by all. The ordinance of 1801, did not prescribe any form of creed, or mode of worship. It only set apart one day in seven for relaxation and rest. The meaning of the Constitution of 1790, was to be determined by what preceded it. Now that of 1778, declared the Protestant Christian Religion to be the established religion of the State—required the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and Privy Council, to be of the Protestant religion, and every member of the Legislature also. The Constitution of 1790, meant to repeal the existing state of things which gave a preference to the Protestant Religion, but not to repudiate Christianity as the existing and recognized religion of the State. It repealed the tests and disabilities which existed before. Mr. PORTER said, the setting apart Sunday was a municipal regulation for rest, and the regulation of industry. He quoted the authority of BLACKSTONE, to the effect that one day in seven, as a day of relaxation and refreshment, as well as for public worship, was of admirable service for a State, and considered merely as a civil institution. Judge COOPER, he said, had recognized the same distinction. He admitted, however, that the church, in the early ages, did not enforce cessation from labor on the first day of the week. But the Constitution, Congress, and all the States in the Union, recognized Sunday as a holiday in fact. Neither House of Congress sat on that day. The Constitution recognized the day in that clause which allows the President ten days to consider a bill, exclusive of Sunday. No civil process, he said, could be served on Sunday. A verdict on Sunday is void. The Act of Assembly of 1837, enacted that no retail grocer should keep his store open on Sunday. In the ordinance of 1801, there was a provision to protect all religious assemblages, without distinction or preference, which indicated that there was no intention to make it a religious test. Mr. PORTER referred to a distinction between the Act of 1712, which required attendance on worship, and this ordinance, which only calls for cessation from business. That Act was the foundation of the ordinance, except so far as it was repealed by the Constitution of 1790. But it may here be asked, was it not wholly repealed by that Constitution?

Mr. PORTER further maintained, that Christianity was part and parcel of the common law—that Christianity had made the first day of the week a day of religious observance and of rest from labor—that the common law was the law of South Carolina, so far as it was consistent with the genius of our government, and had not been modified or varied by legislative enactments and judicial decisions—that, therefore, the observance of that day, as enjoined by Christianity, since Christianity entered into the common law as an essential and vital element, was binding upon all citizens, whether Jews or Christians, and whatever the creed they might profess.

Col. PHILLIPS replied in behalf of the respondent. His exordium was eloquent and impressive. He gave a graphic and spirited sketch of Jewish history, dwelling at some length on the national characteristics of God's favored people. The Jews, he said, were preëminently a religious people. The history of their religion, its rise, progress and wonderful preservation, from the earliest period, through a lapse of ages, was their nation's history. All their wars and contests had been wars waged and carried on in behalf of religion. They were holy wars. All their victories were religious triumphs. God, not man, was their great Governor in primeval times. They, too, had their statutes and ordinances. They were statutes and ordinances enacted and ordained by the Supreme Being himself. Could legislation, among any people, gather around it holier sanctions, or claim for itself higher authority than this? He thought it could not. He thought the Jews stood first upon the list of nations, both in respect to their laws and their religion. He would challenge all history to show that any government ever existed by divine right, in the fullest sense of the term, except that of the Jews. With this people alone, government existed jure divino. For them alone, a divine proclamation had been made of civil rights and duties. Other nations had made laws for themselves, God alone had made laws for the Jews. Was not this a great distinction? Did it not make their history, civil and religious, a very hallowed history? Did it not throw all other governments resting on mere human policy—a policy often frail and imbecile—into the shade? With the Jews alone, the obligations of law and religion were identical, for their law was their religion, and their religion was their law. Their synagogue and their government moved forward in the most perfect harmony together, and were, in fact, inseparable. The marriage tie was not so much so. Among no other people, not even in boastful England, was the union of religion and politics half so respectable, no where was it so preëminently sacred, for the institutions of the Jews were emphatically theocratic. Their ordinances were not those of a nation, a State, or a mere city, but they were God's ordinances, and had loftier and more momentous sanctions attached to them than any of the noblest edicts of the wisest human legislator. Indeed, they constituted the only measure of justice for all other nations, even Christian nations. The Jewish standard was the true standard of all law and all morality every where. The ten commandments never had been, and never could be, abrogated. The Almighty had himself declared that Heaven and Earth might pass away, but that not one jot or one tittle could ever pass away from that holy code—that it was to be observed verbatim et literatim—to be fulfilled and carried out in the very minutest particular. Those commands—that code, said Col. PHILLIPS, were of universal and binding obligation. They stood distinct and apart from the ceremonial laws of the nation—from those external observances which were adapted to a particular age, to a certain stage of progress or to peculiar circumstances. They were accommodated to every age and to every stage of progress, or, rather, every age and stage of progress were to be accommodated to them, as an invariable rule, from which there could be no departure, unattended with danger and destruction. Col. PHILLIPS considered that any nation whose laws for the regulation of human conduct, were not founded on that basis, i. e. the ten commandments, was signally anti-Christian; for it was on this common platform that Christianity and Judaism met, and were merged in each other, constituting one and the same rule of action. These laws constituted the only elements which could impart to any nation, or to any age, durability and permanence, or confer upon it lasting glory; and, in fact, all enlightened, and, he would add, all Christian legislation rested on them for support, or ought to do so. It was from this code,—above all others,—from this code divinely promulgated,—that men did and could best learn what were their rights as men, and what duties they owed to each other and to society. And he would, he said, pay this compliment to the Jews,—for he thought they deserved it,—that no people had ever observed the laws delivered by the Almighty, on Mount Sinai, with such scrupulous exactness as had the Jews. He could speak at least from the experience of a tolerably long practice in the Courts of South Carolina,—a State abounding with this people more than most of our States,—and could say, with much satisfaction, that the records of the Courts bore testimony to their orderly and upright conduct. He believed, not an instance was to be found of any criminal proceeding that had ever been instituted against any Jew in this State. No one of them had ever,—as far as he was aware,—been convicted by the Courts of any violation of the Decalogue. This was great praise, and, if it true, redounds greatly to their honor.

Col. PHILLIPS said, that by the fourth command of the Decalogue, the Jews were required to bear in memory the seventh day of the week, i. e. the Jewish Sabbath, and to observe it as a sacred season. On that day, they and all connected with them, their children, their servants, their visitors, and even their cattle, were to abstain from labor, because God, on that day, had rested from the labors of the creation. The ordinance was positive. They were bound, by their religion, to obey it, and they had always done so. They had always been accustomed to shut up their shops, (for the Jews were a trading people) and abstain from secular business of all kinds, on that day, and that, too, for the very reason assigned in the fourth commandment, viz:—that it was the Creator's resting time. They could ask for no higher authority for so keeping the day, than the Creator's example. Besides, he had commanded them to observe it for that reason, and that reason only. Human governments had sometimes thought that relaxation from secular toil one day in seven was essential to the mental and bodily health of the citizen—that it was an economical arrangement promotive of the best interests of society. This might be so—it was so, but the Jews had not cared to speculate on the subject in the spirit of modern statesmen and ethical philosophers. They considered themselves as bound by their law and by the reasons on which their law was founded and which were assigned when the law was enacted. They were commanded to rest on a certain day, and keep it holy. There could be no doubt about the day. It was the seventh day of the week. That was the day on which God had rested, and on which they were required to rest from their labors. It was a religious duty which they could by no means neglect, and which they had never neglected. But the law went farther—a great deal farther than this. Rest and recreation were to be only occasional. The great vocation of life was active industry. Men were not always to fold their hands in listless idleness. They were not always to be engaged in religious contemplation and worship. Life had duties to be performed, which required great energy and application, and constant exercise of the faculties both of mind and body. God had worked six days, within a divine power, and man was to work six days to the best of his ability, in imitation of the divine example. If religion required them to rest one day in seven, it equally required them to work six days out of the seven. If rest, on the seventh day, was a religious duty, labor, on six days, was equally a religious duty. There could be no doubt about the matter. The command was imperative. Its meaning was plain, and could not be mistaken. "Six days," said the law, "SHALT thou labor." They had no election between repose and labor for the space of six days. The whole of that time, by God's command (not man's,) was to be devoted to active effort. Nor was their work to be superficial. Whatever was necessary to be done for the support of themselves and families, was to be well and thoroughly done. "Thou shalt do all thy work," i. e. leave none of it unfinished. Thou shalt do it in six days. Then, and not till then, shalt thou rest from thy labors—rest for a single day—the seventh day, i. e. the Sabbath, and because God rested on that day from the labors of creation. Such were the absolute requirements of the Jewish religion, and if they were bound by them when the laws were first announced, they were equally bound by them now, since they had never been repealed. Notwithstanding the ordinance of the City Council of Charleston of 1801, prohibiting them, the Jews were still required by the laws of God, so long as they remained Jews, to work diligently, in their respective callings, the first six days of the week, and to rest on the seventh. That ordinance and the fourth commandment of the Decalogue were directly opposed to each other, as far as they respectively involved the rights and duties of the Jewish nation. Which should give way on this occasion?—the fourth commandment or the City Ordinance?—the human law or the divine? Besides, the Jews were protected in the free exercise of their religion by the Constitution of the country, State and Federal.

Col. PHILLIPS here quoted Art. 1 of amendment to the Constitution U. S., which declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. He said it was under a solemn consciousness of the danger arising from ecclesiastical ambition, the bigotry of spiritual pride, and the intolerance of sects, exemplified in our domestic and foreign annals, that it was deemed advisable to exclude from the national Government all power to act on the subject of religious tests. The situation of the different States equally proclaimed the necessity and policy of such exclusion. In some of the States, Episcopalians constituted the predominant sect; in others, Presbyterians; in others, Quakers; and in others again, there was a close numerical rivalry among contending sects. It was impossible that there should not arise perpetual strife and perpetual jealousy on the subject of ecclesiastical ascendency, if the national Government were left free to create a religious establishment. The only security was in extirpating the power. But this alone would have been an imperfect security, if it had not been followed by the declaration of the right of the free exercise of religion and a prohibition of all religious tests. Thus the whole subject was left exclusively to the State Governments, to be acted upon according to their own sense of justice and the State Constitution; and the Catholic and the Protestant, the Calvinist and the Armenian, the Jew and the Infidel, might set down at the common table of the national councils without any inquisition as to their faith and mode of worship.

Nor was the Constitution of South Carolina, he said, less liberal on the subject of religion, than that of the national Government. In proof of which, he quoted Art. VIII. Sec. 1, of our Constitution, which asserts, that "the free exercise of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever, hereafter, be allowed within this State to all mankind." He did not see, he said, how, under a Constitution like this, a Jew, whose religion required him to work, provided he worked honestly, on the first day of the week, could be prohibited from so doing, because it was the Christians' Sabbath, any more than Christians could be prohibited from so doing on the seventh day of the week, because it was the Jewish Sabbath. If Christians were annoyed by the Jews' keeping open shop and selling goods on Sunday, was not the Jew equally annoyed by the Christian's doing so on Saturday, and the Turk equally by both Jews' and Christians' doing so on Friday? Each had their religion, and the religion of each required them to set apart one certain day in seven for rest and religious worship, and to labor, in their respective occupations, the remainder of the time. Now, the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of South Carolina protected them all in the free exercise of their religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference. Men, of whatever country, and of every creed under Heaven, who became American citizens, were protected in the free exercise and unlimited enjoyment of their several religions, whether those religions enjoined labor or rest on certain days of the week;—they were protected, he said, by the fundamental laws of the land. Could an arbitrary ordinance of a dozen men, comprising the City Council of Charleston, set aside those fundamental laws? Could even a solemn act of the Legislature do it? No! Constitutional law, he was sure, rested on a firmer basis. Would it be said that Christians, among us, were more numerous than Jews,—that they constituted the bulk of our citizens, and that we lived in a country where, by the very genius of our government, the will of the majority did and must govern? He would admit that this was the case, when men acted fairly, under the Constitution, and in accordance with its requirements, but not otherwise. The people were very powerful in the United States—they could do a great many things, but they could not do every thing. Their power was limited by our Constitutions of government, State and Federal. It was the glory of those Constitutions, that they protected and enforced the rights, civil and religious, of minorities, as well as the privileges of majorities; and this, as he understood it, and as their Honors doubtless understood it, was not a question of popular sentiment, but of Constitutional right. The rights of the Jews had been assailed by a local ordinance. The question was, and it was a serious one, Should the country keep its faith with this people, solemnly plighted under the Constitution? Should it protect them in the enjoyment of their religious rights,—rights that were unquestionable, and clear as the noonday? Should it or should it not now say, that this ordinance was an odious, unconstitutional, and intolerable interference with their religious privileges? Even admitting that they had, as it appeared, slumbered, for a season, upon their rights, ought they, on that account, now that they were fully aroused to a sense of their danger, to be denied justice at the hands of their Honors? He hoped not. He was sure that they would receive justice at their hands,—that the upright and learned functionaries, who composed the highest judicatory under the State government, would, certainly protect them, and that they would go forth from their presence, clothed with the panoply of the Constitution, and with increased feelings of devotion to their beloved and adopted country.

Col. PHILLIPS next commented, at some length, on the position that had been taken, that Christianity formed part and parcel of the common law of England, and that the common law had been adopted in this State, as far as was consistent with the genius of our institutions. He denied that Christianity formed part and parcel of the common law of England. There was no good and substantial ground for any such assertion. He knew that it had been made, but he was sure that it ought not to have been made, for there was no sort of authority for it, except a dictum of Sir MATTHEW HALE, which had originated in a fraudulent mistranslation by FINCH of a case of quare impedit, cited in the Year Book, 34, H. 6, Fo. 38. But even admitting, for the sake of argument, what was not true, that Christianity formed part and parcel of the common law, it did not, therefore, follow, that the first day of the week was to be kept sacred, in all respects, as the Jewish Sabbath was kept, unless Christianity had so enjoined the keeping of it. He believed the general impression among Christians, who had not studied the subject, was, that the keeping of the first day of the week holy, was positively required by the Christian religion. It was not so. There was not a tittle of authority to be found in the New Testament, requiring Christians, or any body else, to keep the first day of the week sacred. This might be deemed by some a startling declaration, but he was bound to make it on this occasion, and was utterly fearless of any denial of it that would be maintained for a moment. Jesus Christ, the founder of our religion,—by maternal descent, a Jew,—kept the Jewish Sabbath. It was on that day, more than on any other, that he preached the Gospel in the Temple and performed some of his greatest acts of benevolence. He did not consider acts of goodness, requiring some effort, as inconsistent with the proper observation of that day of rest from mere secular toil. He did not prohibit action on that day, but only evil action. It was lawful, he said, on the Sabbath days to do good, and not evil. His immediate disciples, both men and women, who were Jews, in like manner kept the Jewish Sabbath, "according to the commandment." The Sabbath was a sign, a perpetual sign, between God and the Jewish nation. It applied to no other people. The Gentiles, though equally with the Jews, bound by the moral laws of the Decalogue, were not placed, by Christianity, under any obligation to observe the seventh day of the week as holy time. He had already said, that Christianity had not appointed any other day, and set it apart for religious purposes. It was vain to search the New Testament for any such authority. There was none. The obligation to keep the day sacred, rested on the immemorial usage of Christians for several centuries, and the propriety and utility of so keeping the day, and of abstaining from unnecessary labor. It had no other ground on which to sustain itself. Dr. PALEY, he said, had put the matter wholly at rest and quite exhausted the argument,—and he read some passages from Dr. PALEY to the Court, which were very striking and strongly reasoned. Governments, said Col. P., might do well to set apart one day in seven, to be devoted to religious worship and exemption from labor. In some of the States of the Union, the Legislatures had actually prohibited the citizens from laboring in their avocations on that day, but had expressly excepted the Jews and Seventh-day Christians from the operation of the act. He did not think any Legislatures, under the Constitution of the U. S., had the power to prohibit men from working on any day whatever, but State or municipal regulations, exempting the laboring classes from the obligation to labor on a day certain were eminently proper, and, in his judgment, quite constitutional. Col. PHILLIPS concluded his argument by saying, that, as far as the question of authority was concerned, the Jews had decidedly the best of the argument. Their religion required them to labor on the first day of the week, and the Christian Religion did not enjoin upon Christians a cessation from labor on that day. The Court, he said, was constitutionally bound to protect the Jews in the free exercise of their religion, and he would leave their cause and their rights, with great confidence, in its hands.

Mr. PETIGRU replied. He expressed his full concurrence in the very handsome tribute which Col. PHILLIPS had paid to the character and orderly deportment of the Jews in this community. He said it was deserved, and he was happy that any class of his fellow citizens were justly entitled to such praise. He alluded also, and with much apparent satisfaction, to the testimony which M. D'Israeli, in a recent work, had paid to the intellectual and literary character of the Jewish nation. They were, Mr. Petigru said, a great people, and their annals, through all past time, were as interesting as those of any people on the face of the earth. But, the present, he said, was not an inquiry into the character of the Jews, but had especial reference to the constitutional rights which they possessed in this country and in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. Petigru laid down three propositions, which he attempted to enforce in the course of his argument. They were, 1st. That Christianity was a part of the common law, and that Christianity had enjoined cessation from labor on the first day of the week. 2. That the Constitution of South Carolina, of 1790, recognized Christianity to be the law of the State, and only released citizens, not Christian, from certain civil and religious disabilities. 3. That there were statutory provisions, which prohibited certain secular acts from being done on Sunday, and that the ordinance of the City Council, of 1801, which was of a similar character, had been acquiesced in by the Jews, for near half a century, without objection on their part. In support of the opinion that Christianity formed part and parcel of the common law, he quoted King vs. Williams, 260, State Trials, and the views of Mr. Justice Bailey and Chancellor Kent on the same subject, and those of Chief Justice Marshall, 12th Wheaton, 344. By the Constitution of South Carolina, of 1778, the Protestant Religion, said Mr. Petigru, became the established religion of the State. The predominant religion, from the earliest times, had been Episcopacy, but the Protestant religion, here, as in England, embraced dissenters and all religious denominations, as well as Episcopalians. No civil disabilities attached to any Protestant Christian, under the Constitution of 1778. To Jews and Roman Catholics civil disabilities did attach. Their rights of person and property were protected, but they were not eligible to certain high offices, and to a seat in the Legislature. Under the Constitution of 1790, these civil disabilities, on account of religion, were removed, but there was nothing to show, that, in consequence of this removal of civil disabilities, the Christian Religion was repudiated. It was emphatically then, as it is now, the religion of the State, and, as such, Mr. Petigru said, it was recognized by that Constitution. He endeavored to establish this position by quoting and critically analyzing some of the provisions of the Constitution. He cited 3d sec. of the first article, which runs in the following language: "And, whereas, the ministers of the gospel, are, by their profession, dedicated to the service of God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their function; therefore, no minister of the gospel, public preacher, of any religious persuasion, whilst he continues in the exercise of his pastoral functions, shall be eligible to the office of Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or to a seat in the Senate or House of Representatives." Mr. Petigru maintained that in this clause of the Constitution, Christianity was distinctly recognized, the ministers of the Gospel being specially mentioned, and directly excluded from holding certain political offices in the State Government. He entered into a nice examination of the meaning of the word persuasion, employed in this connection. The inference, he said, might be drawn from reading the whole clause, that the words, "public preacher of any religious persuasion," might include the Jewish clergy. He wished to refute any such inference. The word persuasion, he said, was one peculiarly belonging to the Christian vocabulary. We never spoke of the Jewish persuasion, but only of the Jewish religion. It was only where a diversity of opinions existed under a common religion, giving rise to different sects, that the use of the word persuasion was proper. Such a word was applicable to the views of different denominations of Christians, but it did not apply to the Jews, who had only one religion. He quoted, for authority, Johnson's Dictionary. The word pastoral, in the phrase "pastoral functions," came also under review. The word pastoral, too, he maintained, was especially a Christian epithet. Who, he asked, had ever heard of a Jewish pastor? We only now-a-days hear of Jewish priests.

Mr. Petigru referred to various laws, called Sunday Laws, passed at different times by the Legislature—to Acts of 1712, 1740, 1807, 1812, the last of which exempts ministers of the gospel from paying toll at bridges and ferries. All these Acts were recognitions of the Christian religion, as forming a portion of the State policy. That religion was the great fountain of natural justice, above all other religions, and, as such, the laws of the land, in the United States and in all other Christian countries, were founded upon it.

He said the common opinion of writers, who had discussed the theory of society and the foundation of political compacts, was, that men surrendered a portion of their natural rights in order to secure social protection. He read some authorities to show that this was an erroneous notion. Men did not surrender any portion of their natural rights to government. Government simply recognized those rights, and protected them from aggression. There was no such thing as a State of Nature, about which political writers had speculated so much. It was a fiction. The moment men came together, they formed themselves into communities, and were governed by laws, either written or traditionary. And what constituted the great and fundamental principles of their union? They were the principles, he said, of natural justice—those principles which were announced to the world by Jesus Christ and were contained in the New Testament. All civil governments now-a-days recognized these principles, as well as the source from which they originated. And it was in this point of view, that Christianity became part and parcel of the law of the land—Christianity was the very atmosphere in which we breathed. Its power was everywhere felt. It was an universal light—a general solace. The Constitution did not ordain and establish Christianity, but it rested, as all just constitutions of government must rest, on Christianity, as a basis. The Constitution did not ordain that men were to see the light, or breathe the air of heaven. Were they not, therefore, to see the light, and breathe the air? Some things must be taken for granted. The Constitution of the Union—the Constitution of South Carolina, took Christianity for granted, and only alluded to it incidentally. They did not prescribe tests,—they did not found a religious establishment, but they recognized religion, and those great and cardinal elements of natural right and justice, which constituted the Christian Religion. TAX UPON CONSCIENCE.

A case of imprisonment for acting according to the dictates of conscience, has recently occurred in England, creating some stir both in that country and this. It seems that a Mr. John Simonds, of Murseley, a quiet and useful Baptist minister, whose ministerial labors are performed gratuitously, and who maintains himself and family by his industry, was taxed five-pence for the support of the Established Church of the parish in which he resides—a church in whose faith he did not believe, and in whose worship he could not join. When called upon for the five-pence, he answered, "In my conscience I can not pay; there is something in my mind that says, No." He was told that some one else might pay it for him. "No," was his reply, "that would be the same thing; but there is my house—there is my shop; you have a magistrate's order; take your authority, and, having added ten shillings to the amount by way of expenses, levy it upon my goods, if you are determined to do so." But his goods were not taken by distraint, which is the only proper remedy under the statute. On the contrary, he was brought three times before the magistrates; and, persisting in his refusal to pay the five-pence, he was lodged in Aylesbury jail. After lying there nearly a month, Mr. Simonds was brought before a court, charged with wilfully resisting an order from the magistrate for the payment of the church-rate. Having heard the evidence, and the speeches of able counsel, the court brought in a verdict of guilty, whereupon Sir Thomas Aubrey, who presided, addressed the prisoner in the following terms:—

"John Simonds! you have been convicted of a misdemeanor in disobeying an order of magistrates for the payment of church-rates. You state, and we hope it may be so, that you objected to pay on conscientious and religious grounds. There is, no doubt, a great difference of opinion existing upon the subject of church-rates; but the payment of them is required by law, and the law must be obeyed. You have already been in prison for a month. The sentence of the Court upon you, therefore, is, that you be further imprisoned for one week, without hard labor."

It had been shown in the course of the trial, that the prisoner was respectable, owned the neatly-furnished house in which he lived, and was much esteemed in the parish. In view of this, "Mr. Deering, M. P., moved that the prisoner should be confined with the first class of misdemeanants, which would enable him to wear his own clothes," and the motion carried.

—Such are the facts connected with this case of persecution for conscience's sake. They are sufficiently aggravated, no doubt, to justify the severe comments which have been made upon them by the religious press of England and America. It is bad enough to tax a man for the support of a form of worship in which he has no faith, and upon which he can not in conscience attend; but to imprison him because he will not pay the tax in the exact form which is preferred, is tenfold worse. We do not wonder, therefore, that editors in this land of "religious liberty and equality" cry out against it. One of them says: "Our English cousins think us a rude race on this side of the water, and often take occasion to taunt us about our infirmities and sins, but they have no opportunity of laying to our charge the imprisonment of Baptist ministers for crimes like the one here stated. Such things used to be on this side of the Atlantic, but they are gone by now." But stop, good brother; you forget cases of persecution and imprisonment for conscience's sake, equally aggravated, which have occurred in this country within a few years past. The circumstances connected with the German Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania ought not to be overlooked in comparing the religious freedom enjoyed in this country with that enjoyed in England. There was a community of upright, peaceable, and conscientious citizens, who believed it to be their duty to rest on the seventh day of the week and work on the first day. For acting according to this opinion, they were prosecuted; and, notwithstanding conscientiousness was pleaded in their behalf, and admitted by the court, the law had its way, and several of them were fined, and would have been imprisoned if the fines had not been paid. Nor are the Sabbath-keepers of Pennsylvania the only sufferers from laws which come into conflict with conscience, and give a preference to one religious sect over another. In nearly every State of the Federal Union there are laws against labor on Sunday, which, if enforced, would subject Sabbath-keepers to fines and imprisonment each week for doing what they feel in conscience bound to do. Now there is a great deal said about the taxes which English Dissenters are compelled to pay for the support of the Established Church of that country. But what are such taxes in comparison with those paid directly and indirectly by conscientious Sabbath-keepers in this country? In many of the States, Sunday is not only made a non-judicial day, but all bargains entered into and business transacted on that day, are declared to be void. Here is a tax upon conscience worth mentioning. For the sake of favoring the opinion of a majority that Sunday ought to be religiously observed, a conscientious minority is robbed by law of the privilege of transacting business on fifty-two days of the year. What is a five-penny church-rate in comparison with the loss of one-sixth part of a man's time? It is but as the dust in the balance. Now we are no advocate for church-rates; on the contrary, we execrate a law which compels a man to pay for the support of religious arrangements which he cannot in conscience approve. But we believe in carrying out principles to their legitimate results. Hence we insist upon the abolition of those laws which tax conscience indirectly, as well as those which tax it directly. And we see not how a person can consistently oppose a direct tax of a few pence to support a church which his conscience does not approve, while he advocates the Sunday laws, which impose a hundred-fold heavier tax upon those who are admitted to be conscientious in working upon that day.

The Difference.—In apostolic times, as would seem from the Inspired Record, there were not many of the mighty and noble called to be partakers of the Gospel. On the contrary, they appear to have stood aloof, and acted the part of oppressors, rather than friends. But things have changed wonderfully since then. We read in the New York Courier and Inquirer, that within the past year Chief Justice Spencer, Mr. Webster, and Mr. Clay, have all partaken of the communion in the Episcopal Church; and the writer of the article in which this fact is stated, goes on to say, that "this public testimony of three of the greatest intellects of the age, and all within the same year, to the truths of Christianity, is well worthy of note, and cannot fail to arrest the attention and consideration of all who pause in the midst of the present to reflect on the future, at the same time that the Episcopal Church may well be proud of being the channel through which such testimony has been added to the truth, the value, the want and necessity of practical faith." We have no means of judging whether the persons here named are characterized by such a degree of piety as to give the Episcopal Church much occasion to be proud of them. Perhaps they are, and perhaps they are not. But in either case we think such lauding of them is unnecessary if not ridiculous.

Letters from Our Missionaries.—Several weeks ago we stated that letters had been received from our missionary brethren, announcing their arrival and settlement at Shanghai, in good health. That notice was accompanied with a remark, that perhaps the letters, or extracts from them, would hereafter be published. A correspondent in Western New York says that some dissatisfaction is felt because this "implied promise" has not been fulfilled. A very little consideration would show that such dissatisfaction is groundless. The letters referred to were directed to the Executive Board of the Missionary Association, and of course there could be no propriety in publishing them before they had been presented to that body. Now the Board meets regularly but once in three months; and as the letters came to hand after its November meeting, they could not be presented until the February meeting, which was held on second-day evening of last week. At that meeting several communications were read, and the Corresponding Secretary was directed to prepare for publication such portions of them as he might deem of general interest—a work which he will probably commence next week.

Truly Cheering.—A letter from Eld. Alex. Campbell, dated at DeRuyter, Feb. 3d, says: "It affords me much pleasure to inform you, that God in his great mercy is blessing us in this vicinity with the refreshings of his heavenly grace. The Seventh-day Baptist Church in Lincklaen has been quickened by the Holy Spirit, and some eighteen or twenty have been hopefully converted to God, most of whom have been added to the Church by baptism. The Sabbath-keeping Church in Truxton is also sharing in this gracious outpouring of the Divine Spirit, and some eight or ten have been made the happy recipients of God's regenerating grace, most of whom have requested baptism."

Germans in New York.—Rev. Mr. Guldin, the Pastor of the German Mission Church, in Houston-st., has, by particular request, furnished important information to the Christian Intelligencer respecting the German population in this city, from which the following is an extract. Mr. Guldin says:—

"The whole number now in the city is not less than fifty thousand—about one-half are Protestants, the other half Catholics and Jews. Of immigrants lately landed in New York, we believe a majority are Catholics; with the exception of the German merchants, who do a considerable business in the lower part of the city.

"Those immigrants who bring with them any means, generally go west, so that mostly the poorer class stay in the city. This part of our immigrant population, is, of all others, as we believe, most deserving the attention of the American public, civil and religious. What is done for this people, in giving them the gospel, is most likely to be crowned with success."

Revival in Shrewsbury, Mass.—We are rejoiced, says the Boston Recorder, to chronicle a very interesting work of grace in this place. About 100 converts in the Congregational and Methodist churches, are the present fruits; about 50 each. Sixteen heads of families have been brought to Christ; husbands and wives together. O! what a blessed state of things. Sixteen new Christian families in Shrewsbury, will make it a very different place. The influence of this revival will be felt by future generations. The work is still progressing. In the Congregational church, no other means have been used but preaching one evening in the week, and prayer meetings the other evenings, with inquiry meetings. The work has spread into West Boylston, and much interest is there manifested, as also in Northboro'.

A Soldier's Life.—A letter from a soldier in Mexico, to his mother in Portland, Me., dated Oct. 23, says that in a march of 300 miles, in the hottest season, they went sometimes whole days without either bread or water. They were compelled to leave many on the road, who could go no farther. He also says: "Our company when mustered into service numbered 70. It is now reduced to 16. When we left Puebla we were 10,000 strong; now there is scarcely 3000 able to do duty. Besides those killed in the battles, many have died of sickness, and many have been killed in the streets and shops of the city."

Separation of Slave Families.—Among the cruelties of slavery, an execrable one is that of separating families, and sending the different members to parts where they never hear of each other. We are glad to learn that a move has been made in the Legislature of Alabama to prevent the separation of the families of negroes, and to exempt them from sale by legal process. An attempt was made to postpone the bill indefinitely, but it was lost by a large majority, indicating that the object contemplated has the favor of the Legislature.

An English Bishop in China.—An English paper says that it is intended, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, to found a new bishopric some where in the Chinese seas, probably at Victoria, Hong-Kong. Toward the funds for this purpose there is at present upward of £18,000 in hand, £5,000 of which is for a college. The remaining sum necessary is to be collected by voluntary subscriptions, about £20,000 being required before the consent of the Government for the foundation of a new See can be expected.

The Right Spirit.—Mr. Pohlman, the Dutch Reformed Missionary at Amoy, China, has written to this country, requesting three thousand dollars for the immediate erection of a Chinese Mission Chapel. The Christian Intelligencer says that an individual of this city, anxious for a quick response, has made the offer of $500, payable, as soon as the remaining $2,500 should be contributed.

Sunday Laws in South Carolina.—The article upon this subject, which we publish to-day, deserves a careful perusal. We are sorry to learn, that Judge O'Neal, who presided at this important trial, reversed the decision of the court below, thus sustaining the Sunday laws.

Dedication.—The Seventh-day Baptist Church at Pawcatuck, R. I., has recently erected a tasteful and commodious meeting-house, which is to be dedicated on fifth-day, Feb. 24.

Reciprocity.—It is said that a Foreign Missionary Society in the Sandwich Islands has sent to the American Home Missionary Society, a donation for planting the Gospel in our own West!

Fruits meet for Repentance.—The editor of one of our religious exchanges, says he recently received a letter containing payment in advance for two copies of his paper, one to be sent to the writer of the letter, and the other to a friend of his in Michigan. The letter says:—

"I was formerly a subscriber to your paper, the Christian Secretary, and thought very highly of it; but after a while my mind became choked with the cares of the world, and in an evil time I was tempted to stop it. For some time past I have been trying to get along in the divine life without it, but my experience testifies against the course I took, and I regret sincerely that I was left to take so unwise a step."

Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes: A Collection of several thousand Facts, Incidents, Narratives, Examples, and Testimonies, embracing the best of the kind in most former Collections, and some hundreds in addition, original and selected; the whole arranged and classified on a new plan, with copious topical and Scriptural Indexes. By Rev. K. Arvine, A. M., Pastor of the Providence Church, New York. With an Introduction by Rev. Geo. B. Cheever, D. D.

Such is the title-page of a work which Leavitt, Trow & Co., of 191 Broadway, propose to issue in eight numbers, at 25 cents each. The first No. contains 112 large pages, neatly printed. From our examination of it, we judge that the work will be both interesting and instructive; and do not hesitate, therefore, to commend it to public patronage.

RELIGION IN OREGON.

Rev. George Cary, one of the missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Oregon, recently returned to this city. At a meeting of the Board on the 19th ult., he made some interesting statements of the religious condition and habits of the people of Oregon. The following is a part of the report of his remarks, as published in the Evening Post:—

"The Indians entertain strong superstitions of the character and influence of the missionaries. They suppose that they possess power over the elements. The winter of 1846 was very cold, and an unusual quantity of snow fell. Many of the cattle died. The Indians demanded as many from the missionary as they had lost by the severity of the weather, declaring that he had caused the extreme cold. A house in the Indian settlement had taken fire on Sunday, and was burned down. They demanded compensation from the missionary, declaring that he had blown the horn to get them to meeting, and that that was the cause of the fire.

"Mr. Cary does not give a flattering account of the moral character of the population. He thinks that if they do not become an instructed people, they will be a very depraved community. There is and must be much leisure time, and if Science and Religion do not extend their influence, a residence there will not be very desirable. Intemperance prevails to a considerable extent. After the passage of the license law, in 1846, they seemed for a while to indulge more freely in intemperate habits. The question of temperance entered into the excitements of the last election for Governor. Mr. Abernethy, the temperance candidate, was elected by a very small majority. Sunday desecration has prevailed extensively, but there has been considerable reform during the three past years. In the midst of much profligacy, much respect is paid to the ministers of religion.

"There are now a number of clergymen of the Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist and Catholic Churches. These exert a healthy influence upon many of the inhabitants. The Sandwich Islanders, many of the Indians, and the persons employed by the Hudson Bay Company, attend the Catholic service. If these religious missions had not been established there, one half of the emigrants arriving there who had been attached to various religious communities at home would not have exhibited any evidence of their religious profession."

DECLINE OF THE CHRIST-IANS.

It seems from a statement by one of its own ministers, that the religious denomination usually called Christ-ians, is rapidly declining in numbers and influence. Rev. Charles Morgridge, who has, until quite recently, been stationed over the Christ-ian Church at Fall River, Mass., is reported by the Weekly News as having said:—

"There were, some years ago, five Christian churches in the City of New York. Now there was but one, and that a very small one, who worship in a house which cost but $4500. In Boston and Salem it was the same. In the latter place, of the five churches which once flourished there, not a single vestage now remains. And in Boston, where they formerly had some four or five large churches, there is now but a mere fragment, and that has long been supported by three persons, one of whom is now dead. Enough converts have been made by Christian ministers in those two cities to have filled five of the largest churches in New England; but they have all left and gone into other denominations, simply because they (the Christians) had not an educated ministry to lead and instruct them. But one single book on doctrinal subjects had ever been written by any member of the denomination, and that was written by himself. They had no schools or colleges, as other denominations have, in which to 'mould their young men and make them alike;' they had no creed, no discipline, no nothing, and in consequence of the lack of these, their churches, what few were left, were made up of a heterogeneous mass of notions and theories from all the other churches."

A Petition.—In the Ohio Legislature, on Wednesday, Feb. 2d, a petition was presented against the repeal of the Black Laws, and asking that a law may be passed preventing more negroes from coming into that State, and for the removal of those already there. We quote a part of the document, as a legal and literary curiosity:—

To the Honorable the general ossembly the State of ohio:

Wheareas greate exertions are making to repeal what is caled the Black Law we Conceive it our duty to express our opinion on that Subject. repeal the law which has stood the test more than forty years and you will bring a Curs on ohio wors if posable than the Banks it will Lead to amalgation insorection if not revolution it appears to be the desier of some to place the blacks on an equal footing with the whites, as much as to say the Creator did not do right when he made some white, and some black, for ever sane person knows the white and blacks never sprang from the same Creator and it is evident the distinction was made that the blacks should be man servents and maid servents for thay ware the verry heathans that was roundabout the Children of Isreal when they ware Commanded to "buy bond men and bond maids and they shall be taken as an in heritance for your Children after you to inherit them for a possession, they shall be your bondmen for ever."—Leviticus, 25.

Depot of Religious Books.—Rev. Mr. Damon, Seamen's Chaplain at the Sandwich Islands, requesting from the American Tract Society a supply of books in German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Danish and Swedish, relates the interesting circumstance of a visit of a Russian vessel engaged in the fur trade, the supercargo of which, an officer of the Russian Fur Company, manifested a deep interest in religion, and asked for German and English books. Giving him Pilgrim's Progress, in English, he next day expressed great delight with the book, and inquired for others, when he proceeded to select the most strictly evangelical books, to the amount of $20.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Senate.

The Ten Regiments Bill was the principal topic last week. It was debated by Messrs. Hunter, Miller, Underwood, Cass, Berrian, Niles, Turney, and others.

The Committee on Territories reported a bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon.

The bill extending the provision of the act granting half pay to the widows of volunteer militia dying of wounds received in battle, to widows of soldiers of the regular army, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Dix presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of New York, instructing the Senators and Representatives from that State in Congress to vote in favor of the application of the Wilmot Proviso to all territory hereafter annexed to the Union. They were ordered to be printed.

House of Representatives.

The principal subject of discussion in the House, was the Loan Bill, authorizing the government to borrow $18,500,000 to meet the expenses of the war.

Mr. King of Mass. moved that a memorial from the Society of Friends, praying the speedy termination of the War, be received and printed. The motion to print was rejected.

The joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, voting thanks to Gen. Scott and the Army in Mexico, and urging the presentation of a gold medal to the former, were presented.

Joint resolutions were presented by Mr. Stephens of Georgia, complimenting Gen. Taylor, and the army under him, for the victory of Buena Vista, and directing the presentation of a gold medal to Gen. Taylor, which was read three times and passed.

A bill appropriating $500,000 for discharged soldiers who disembark at New Orleans or other places, was read three times and passed.

Mr. Giddings, of Ohio, read and offered resolutions, thanking Hon. Albert Gallatin for his reasons against the war. On motion, they were laid on the table by a large majority.

A bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon, was, on motion of a member from Indiana, made the special order for Monday, 15th March.

FOREIGN NEWS—SEVEN DAYS LATER.

The steamship Sarah Sands arrived at New York last week with seven days' later intelligence from Europe. There had been a decided improvement in the money market, a slight decline in cotton, and the market for breadstuffs was about as heretofore. The news is generally regarded as favorable.

Ireland continues to be more tranquil. The Special Commission and the Coërcion Law are producing order among the people. At the adjourned Commission for Limerick there remained for trial twelve cases of murder and conspiracy to murder. Including this batch there are altogether in Limerick jail 93 persons awaiting the return of the Commission. The catalogue is both long and dark. There are 395 prisoners in Clonmel jail, of whom 20 are charged, with murder.

A letter received from Italy announces that a sanguinary collision had taken place at Pavia, between the students and the Austrians. A number of persons were wounded, and an Austrian killed. Subsequent to the affair the celebrated University of Pavia was provisionally closed, and most of the students had left the town. Other letters from Milan, of the 11th ult., mention that six or seven persons had been killed in the collision at Pavia, and upwards of 30 wounded.

The Trio, brig of 300 tons, from Montevideo to Plymouth, laden with wool and tallow, was wrecked on the rocks which abound on the coast of Brittany, near Morlaix. Out of the whole crew, consisting of the captain (Mr. Watkins,) eight men, and a boy, the latter alone was saved.

Lord Powis died on the 17th ult. from a gunshot wound accidentally received while shooting. He was a grandson of the celebrated Lord Clire, of East India memory.

The honorable career of Isaac D'Israeli, Esq., the celebrated author of "The Curiosities of Literature," has reached its close. He had attained the advanced age of 82 years.

At the Donside Factories the plan has been adopted of supplying the work people with meals on the premises, and, as all the cooking is done in one vast kitchen, a great saving is made in the cost as well as in the quality of the food.

The large silver star, sunk in the place of the "Star of Bethlehem," supposed to have been the site of the manger where Christ was born, has been stolen. The Latins and Greeks accuse each other of the robbery.

The sloop-of-war Snake was totally lost on August 26, off Mozambique. The crew were saved.

Father Mathew intends to visit Rome before proceeding to America.

The cholera has disappeared in Constantinople.

THE CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.—A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 3d of January, represents the cholera as being much less malignant than it was in 1831 and 1832, and as becoming weaker in its attacks as it advances northward. It was expected at St. Petersburg, and every preparation was made to meet it. At Moscow, from the 5th to the 11th ult., there were 119 cases, and 54 deaths. In the eastern portion of the empire, the governments of Kasan and Orenburg have suffered most. The Cossacks of the Oural have also been great sufferers. After acting for some time upon the above two provinces, the malady has extended to the north and west, and gained the center, in which last portion of the empire Toulr has suffered the most, having had 782 cases and 246 deaths.

At Kalouga there have been 78 cases and 37 deaths. At this time the disease is raging in the western provinces bordering upon Turkey Gallicia. It makes the same eccentric movements as in 1831. Thus, having once entirely ceased at Orel about the middle of November, it has again made its appearance there with fatal effects. Hitherto the eastern quarters have, next to the Caucasus, suffered the most cruelly. It is said that the Russian army in the Caucasus has sustained numerous losses, and even the mountaineers themselves have not been spared.

SUMMARY.

A remarkable case of somnambulism occurred at Easton, Pa. A lad of 16, who had been medically treated for a cold, rose from his bed, went through several apartments to the street, run the round of several streets, in a pelting rain, with only a shirt on, into a hotel where he saw a light, and being recognized was roused. He had been frightened by a dream that two persons sleeping in the same room were murdered. Strange to say, his health was improved by the excursion.

Mrs. Himes, a young married woman, was frozen to death in Leyden, Lewis county, New York. She went with her husband five miles to church; returning on foot, he stopped at the house of an acquaintance, while she passed on, lost her way, and was found on Wednesday, where she had made her bed in the snow, taken off her bonnet, and laid down to die. From the circumstance of a new pair of shoes being nearly worn out, it is supposed the poor woman walked from Sunday afternoon to Tuesday night.

We noticed the occurrence of a rencontre in the Louisiana House of Representatives, between two members of that body—Messrs. Ferrier and Brewer. A Committee was immediately appointed to inquire into the facts of the case, and on Friday a resolution that Mr. F. be imprisoned twelve hours in the parish jail, was reported and adopted.

A striking case of the use of chloroform is reported to have occurred at Washington. It was administered to a boy nine years of age, the small bone in whose leg was in a state of decay. It was completely removed by a surgical operation, the boy not having been sensible of any pain, and emerging from the insensible state without injury.

The Governor of New-Hampshire has pardoned Zebulon Paine of Conway, from the State Prison, to which he was sentenced in 1846, for eight years, for having set fire to a barn. He was convicted on the testimony of a boy who was admitted as State's evidence. It now appears, by a confession of the boy, that he was the guilty one, and that Mr. Paine was wholly innocent.

The advocates of cheap postage and free delivery, in Boston, held a meeting at the Tremont on Wednesday. They propose the following rates of postage and delivery: Newspapers, 1 cent. Letters not prepaid, 4 cts. Letters prepaid, 2 cts. A letter to weigh one half an ounce.

The Journal of Commerce says that Rev. Mr. Kendall of Verona, in this State—where, as we are told, he has a salary of $500—has lately received a call from the Spring Street Church in this City, with a salary of $1,500; and although very earnestly pressed to accept the City pulpit, has declined absolutely.

A lad skating recently on the dam at Augusta, Me., having broken through the ice, was saved from drowning by another boy, who, on perceiving the accident, instantly jerked his woolen comforter from his neck, tossed one end of it to the drowning boy, and drew him out.

Three drunkards of Boonton, Morris county, N. J., have been frozen to death by exposure during the Winter—another has died from delirium tremens, and a young man, Mahlon Taylor, after a drunken frolic on the night of the 22d ult. fell from the Canal bridge and was killed on his way home.

On the 29th ult., Mr. Joseph Long of Wolcottville, Conn., at work in the brass foundry there, had his arm and wrist crushed by the falling of a 780 lb. weight attached to a die. His arm was amputated without the least pain, while he was under the influence of chloroform.

It is said, by a correspondent of the "Christian Watchman," that Gen. Houston was compelled to divest himself of his slave property that he might be elected to the United States Senate; it being known that large numbers of German emigrants would vote against him as a slaveholder. Can it be true? If so, there is yet hope for Texas.

The small-pox has again appeared in Indianapolis. Mr. G. Chapman, of the State Sentinel, the gentleman who was told to "crow," has been attacked, and also Mrs. Palmer, of the Palmer House.

The Broome County Republican gives a full account of a disgraceful riot which occurred at Binghampton on the 5th. Several miserable groggeries had been established there, much to the annoyance of the inhabitants, some of whom, not content to wait for an action of the Grand Jury, commenced an assault upon the house of one Kelley, from which a drunken man, after spending his last sixpence, had been thrown into the street and beaten. The mob broke in the doors and windows, and destroyed all they could lay their hands on. On Sunday another shop of similar character was entirely demolished, though, it is believed, by a different gang, and a gentleman named Freeman assaulted and considerably injured.

A slave case of importance was reported in Congress from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. Brent, of S. C. It proposes to pay for a slave, the service of whom was hired by the General Government for the army. He either made his escape to the Seminoles or was taken prisoner by them. Upon the restoration of peace, he was sent with the Seminoles west of the Mississippi, and the proposition is to pay for this slave out of the Treasury.

The Rutland Herald, the editor of which has a brother—an officer—in the Mexican war, says: "Out of 80 members of the Vermont company—raised last summer for the Mexican war—forty-four have already died; and out of this number, only two have been killed in battle—the others having fallen victims to the diseases incident to the climate."

The Report of the Health Officer shows, that St. Louis (Mo.) is still troubled with small pox; there have been many cases, and vaccination is very properly recommended as the best of all known preventatives. Even for those who have had small pox, vaccination is the means suggested for destroying the susceptibility which sometimes, though rarely, leads to a second attack.

The whole of the line of railway between Darlington and York, in England, is being relaid with new rails, chains, and sleepers. The rail is of new invention and of a very superior make, and is considered as a great improvement upon the old description, as the surface of the rail being convex, it presents much less surface to the wheel, and thereby the friction is much reduced—a great desideratum.

Mr. O'Rieley has issued his proposals for the "Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Range—Second Division—West of the Mississippi." He proposes to extend his lines westward to the frontier of Missouri, at Independence, Weston, or Fort Leavenworth, with all practicable speed, as soon as adequate funds shall be collected, on the same terms as his other telegraphic sections have been constructed.

OUR OWN AFFAIRS.—It is nearly four years since the Sabbath Recorder was established in the city of New York, for the purpose of promoting the interests of the Sabbath and of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Thus far the enterprise has not been a source of pecuniary profit; on the contrary, the few individuals who associated themselves to sustain it have had occasion to draw to some extent upon their own resources. But of this they do not complain, because it was what they expected, and what they were willing to do for the sake of the cause. The time is at hand, however, when they wish to enter upon more extensive and permanent arrangements, which they hope will enable them better to serve the denomination without adding to their own burdens. In order to do so, it is necessary for them to settle up the accounts of the paper to the close of the present volume, and begin with clean books. They therefore request those indebted to the establishment, one and all, to make an immediate effort to liquidate such indebtedness. Brethren and friends, will you do it? The small sums which are due us make a large sum in the aggregate—a sum which we greatly need to enable us to meet our bills as they become due. We hope, therefore, that you will not allow this request to pass unheeded, but will give it immediate attention. To encourage promptness, and to secure as complete a settlement as possible, we propose to receive $2 per year on old accounts, if paid previous to the close of the present volume. All accounts remaining unsettled at that time will be kept separate from future accounts, and will be charged at the rate of $2 50 per year, according to our published terms. This week we shall commence sending bills to those who owe us. If these bills are incorrect in any respect, we will cheerfully alter them on a representation of the case. If they are correct, we hope the money will be immediately forwarded, either through our agents or directly to us.

DIED,

In Barnerd, N. J., Jan. 18, Mr. DAVID FITZ RANDOLPH, aged 64 years. He became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Plainfield, N. J., about five years since. He was a man of a meek and humble spirit, bore the infirmaties of age with patience and Christian submission, and while yet able to walk a short distance about his premises, which he had just done and returned to his house, he was called almost instantly from time to eternity. And though to die was gain to him, we trust, still his family and the church of which he was a member feel that they sustain a loss by that event. L. C.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the last day of October, 1847, of a lingering illness, LUKE COON, in the 75th year of his age. The subject of this notice had been a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church for many years, and died in hope of a blessed immortality.

In Shiloh, N. J., on the 7th inst., of a short but painful sickness, JOHN O. FRAZEUR, a deacon and beloved brother of the Seventh-day Baptist Church.

In Philadelphia, Pa., on the 10th inst., WILLIAM DAVIS, of Hopewell township, Cumberland Co., N. J.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

CONSCIENCE.

"How aptly and well are the melancholy regrets and the meekness and humility which our conscious short-comings must inspire, expressed in the gentle words of the poet."

It is not what my hands have done
That weighs my spirit down;
That casts a shadow o'er the sun,
And over earth a frown;
It is not my heinous guilt,
Or vice by men abhorred;
For fair the fame that I have built,
A fair life's just reward;
And men would wonder if they knew
How sad I feel with sins so few.

Alas! they only see a part,
When thus they judge the whole;
They do not look upon the heart,
They cannot read the soul.
But I survey myself within;
And mournfully I feel
How deep the principle of sin
Its roots may there conceal,
And spread its poison through the frame,
Without a dread that men would blame.

They judge by actions which they see
Brought out before the sun;
But conscience brings reproach to me
For what I've left undone;
For opportunities of good
In folly thrown away;
For time misused in solitude;
Forgetfulness to pray;
And thousand more omitted things,
Whose memory fills my breast with stings.

And therefore is my heart oppressed
With thoughtfulness and gloom;
Nor can I hope for perfect rest
Till I escape this doom.
Help me, the Merciful and Just!
This fearful doom to fly;
Thou art my strength, my peace, my trust;
O help me, lest I die!
And let my full obedience prove
The perfect power of faith and love.

ISLAND OF JUAN FERNANDEZ.

Capt. Gelston, on his passage out, when in South latitude 32° 30′, longitude West 79° 15′, writes thus:

We were now in the South Pacific Ocean, and as the sun was setting in as clear a sky as he ever left in the western horizon, a little to the left of where he was retiring to his ocean bed might be seen, in the far distant south-western view, a pyramid of rocks, then distant from us seventy good sea miles.

This was the last gaze we were taking of the Island of Juan Fernandez, the residence of that monarch described by Cowper, who "ruled over all he surveyed;" I mean the great Alexander Selkirk, placed by Defoe in the person of Robinson Crusoe, with his man Friday, on another Island in the South-Atlantic, called Ferdinand De Noronho. We are now rapidly leaving this place of story and of song, and I purpose giving you a brief sketch of a visit made by our missionaries to that place so famed in history.

About daylight of that day we first discovered the land, then about forty miles distant. The weather was pleasant and fine, and the wind was quite light, so that at 11 o'clock, I judged the land to be about 25 miles off. However, having a new boat, the passengers beset me to allow them an opportunity of setting foot upon the Island. The boat was soon got over the side, and five of our male passengers, with the mate and two men, sprang into her, no doubt supposing that in a couple of hours they would stand upon land again, having been then eighty nine days on shipboard. But landsmen make poor calculations at sea, as the sequel will show.

So anxious were they to reach St. Juan, that provisions were not thought of, although I had taken the precaution to fill a bucket with water, and have it placed in the boat. Off they started at half-past 11 o'clock in the morning, without dining, and they rowed hard to get to land. Soon after the boat shoved off, we took a light breeze, and at sunset the good bark Whiton was off Cumberland Harbor. At this time might be seen, close under the land, and not yet into the harbor, our ship's boat, still "toiling hard to get to land;" although the wind was not contrary, they had not reached the haven they sought.

And to wind up our story, Providence having favored us with a breeze, after they had made a short visit on shore they reached the vessel in safety about 9 o'clock at night, as we were then close in with the land, and they had not a long distance to pull to reach us. Poor fellows, they were almost exhausted, not yet having eaten anything, and the palms of their hands were in one blister, (for every man had to work,) so that up to this time I hardly think they could write a legible account of their voyage. I think they have learned, however, that pyramids of two thousand feet high, sometimes appear nearer at sea than they really are; and I have no hope of giving you another account of their excursions in a boat.

Upon the Island they found thirteen souls in all, in a state of deplorable poverty, without a particle of household furniture of any description, not even a chair, table, or bed. Two of these wretched creatures were females. These miserable Spaniards, made so by their own improvidence, were thus living upon an island that would reward labor as bountifully as any part of the world, and through their own slothfulness, suffering in the midst of the means of plenty, if only a proper effort was put forth to obtain the necessaries and comforts of life. The land is very rich, and yields plentifully, so that more than two hundred bushels of potatoes can be gathered from a single acre, and other things in proportion; yet these people had only a patch fifteen feet square.

Peaches are in plentiful abundance all over the Island, and strawberries also, in their season. Quinces also grow in large quantities. These luxuries were introduced by Lord Anson, and now abound there very plentifully. The wild goats, in countless droves, roam over the mountains, and are easily taken. Here, also, are to be found mules and horses in large numbers. The missionaries saw all these playing among the hills, and some of them in use by the Spaniards. But the thirteen are not all Spaniards. Three of them are Americans, who had run away from whale-ships; and these three performed all the work, while the lazy Spaniards reaped the benefit.

Fish may be procured in large quantities with a little trouble. One boat obtained, in a short space of time, enough to last our large family as many days as they would keep. They are excellent, and of various kinds, similar to our cod and rock bass. Lobsters are also very numerous, and easily taken. The goats are better than our veal, and are caught from the backs of horses by a rope called a "lasso," thrown around their necks. They are also shot. We obtained three, and found them most excellent.

The Island is about thirteen miles long, and four wide, and is in the latitude of 33° 45′ South, and 78° 58′ West from Greenwich. On approaching its shores, it appears like a stupendous, barren pile of rocks, lifting up their heads over two thousand feet from the ocean, splintered and thrown apart by the earthquakes of these regions. Shocks of earthquakes are continually occurring along the coast of Chili and Peru, and are as common as thunder is with us.—These shocks reach the islands all along the coast, and are often attended with great loss of life as well as property.

OLD TIMES.

Rev. Mr. Fox, in a paper written in 1828, to a friend, gave a familiar sketch of the manners and habits of the good people of Boston nearly a century ago. The following is that part which describes the dress of a couple as they were arranged for marriage:

"To begin with the lady; her long locks were strained upward over an immense cushion that sat like an incubus on her head, and then plastered over with pomatum and sprinkled with a shower of white powder. The height of this tower was somewhat over a foot. One single white rose bud lay upon its summit, like an eagle upon a haystack. Over her neck and bosom was folded a black handkerchief, fastened in front by a bosom pin rather larger than a dollar, consisting of your grandfather's miniature set in virgin gold. Her airy form was braced up in a satin dress, the sleeves as tight as the natural skin to the arm, with a waist formed by a bodice worn out-side, whence the skirt flowed off and was distended at the ankles by an ample hoop. Shoes of white kid, with peaked toes, and heels of two or three inches elevation, enclosed her feet, and glittered with spangles as her little pedal members peeped curiously out.

Now for the swain. Your grandfather slept in an arm-chair the night before his wedding, that the arrangements of his pericranium, which had been under the hands of a barber the whole afternoon, might not be disturbed. His hair was sleeked back and plentifully beflowered, while his cue projected like the handle of a skillet. His coat was of a sky blue, lined with yellow; his long vest of white satin embroidered with gold lace; his breeches of the same material, and tied at the knee with pink ribbon. White silk stockings and pumps, with clocks and ties of the same use, completed the list of his nether garments. Lace ruffles clustered around his wrists, and a portentous frill worked in correspondence, and bearing the miniature of his beloved, finished his truly genteel appearance. [Com. Adv.

THE LION'S STRENGTH.

Of this noble animal, two varieties (the yellow and the brown or black) exist in South Africa, both, however, retreating before the progress of European colonization. The dark colored is the strongest and fiercest; their strength is prodigious. Well authenticated accounts prove that a lion will carry off an ox or a horse with nearly as great ease as a fox would a goose. A young lion has been known to carry a good-sized horse a mile from the spot where he killed it; and an instance occurred in Sneuburgh where a lion carried off a two year old heifer, and his track or spoar was followed by the hunters for five hours on horseback. Throughout the whole distance the carcass only once or twice was discovered to have touched the ground. Spearman says he saw a lion at the Cape take a heifer in his mouth, and though the legs trailed on the ground, he carried it off as a cat would a rat, and leaped a broad dike without the least difficulty. Like all the feline tribe, the lion lies in wait for his prey, crouching among the grass and reeds near pools and fountains, or in narrow ravines: he will spring from nine to twelve yards at a bound, and can repeat these springs for a short time. Denied, however, the fleetness of the hound or wolf, the lion, by a few quick bounds, can seize even the tall giraffe or camelopard, by springing on the haunches of the latter. Instances have been known of the giraffe thus carrying the lion twenty miles, before sinking under the attacks of the destroyer.

THE BASSA WOMAN WHO HAD HEARD OF THE JUDGMENT.

Mrs. Crocker, who spent several years as a missionary in the Bassa tribe, of West Africa, states that large groups of men would often assemble to hear the words of eternal life, but seldom could there be seen a mother, sister, or daughter among them. Early taught by their chiefs that men alone should be wise, they felt no interest in the words of the teacher; and, if led by curiosity to know what the white man had to say, they were sent away from their towns when it was known that the "God-man" was to tell them God's word. The chiefs feared that something might be said against their foolish superstitions which would destroy their power. A school for little girls, by great perseverance, was formed, but no female teacher had been able to labor constantly among the adults of her own sex.

Sometime in the latter part of 1844, a poor Bassa woman looked into the mission schoolroom, where were assembled about twenty little girls of her own tribe. Earnestly looking at the teacheress, she clasped her hands repeatedly, saying, "Wai! Wai!" (an exclamation of sorrow.) The little girls evinced much interest, and eagerly inquired what troubled her. Pointing to the teacheress, she replied, "When I saw her my heart would not lie down; trouble catch me plenty. Once I heard God-man Crocker talk about God." When she was asked why this affected her so, she related her simple story. Once, when all the chiefs were gone from her town, and the God-man was preaching, she thought she would go and hear what he said He told her of the day of judgment, and looked at her, saying she would be there; and he would know and God would know that she had heard this word once, if she never heard it again. "And these things troubled me," said she, "for I know he has told God about it." Light had only begun to shine in her dark mind, leaving an impression of guilt and danger.

A SAILOR'S ESCAPE FROM AN ALLIGATOR.

A sailor named Campbell, on board a Guineaman on the Congo, bathed in that river while in a state of intoxication. When he had swimmed some distance from the ship, some of the sailors on board discovered an alligator making towards him. His escape appeared impossible: but two shots were fired at the frightful monster, which however did not take effect. The report of the piece, and the noise on board the vessel, intimated to Campbell his perilous condition; and turning, he saw his enemy advancing with open jaws, which impelled him with his utmost strength and skill towards the shore. On approaching some canes and shrubs which covered the bank, closely pursued by the alligator, a ferocious tiger sprang towards him, at the instant the jaws of his first enemy were extended to receive him. At this awful moment Campbell was preserved; for the too eager tiger, by overleaping him, encountered the gripe of the amphibious monster. A conflict ensued between them, and the water was colored with the blood of the tiger, whose efforts to tear the scaly covering of the alligator were unavailing: while the latter had also the advantage of keeping his adversary under water, by which the victory was soon obtained, and the tiger fell the victim. They both sank to the bottom, and the alligator was no more seen. Campbell was recovered, and instantly conveyed on board. His danger had made him sober, and the moment he leaped on deck, he fell on his knees, and returned thanks to Providence for his most remarkable preservation; and what is most worthy of observation, "from that moment to the time I am writing," says the narrator, "he has never been seen the least intoxicated, nor has he been heard to utter a single oath. If there ever was a reformed being in the universe, Campbell is the man."

Bankruptcy Execution.—Hamburgh was the scene of a curious proceeding on the 8th of November. A scaffold was erected as for execution before the principal front of the Exchange, and at twelve o'clock a large furnace filled with resinous wood was placed on it. The wood having been set on fire, the bell of the town-hall was rung violently, as is usual during the execution of decrees inflicting infamous penalties. At one o'clock, the hour at which merchants are assembled on the Exchange, the public executioner ascended the scaffold, followed by two of his assistants, and having caused a drum to be beat, proclaimed in a loud voice the name of a merchant who had been declared guilty of fraudulent bankruptcy, and who had taken to flight. He then displayed to the spectators an enormous placard, bearing the name of the culprit in gigantic letters. He next caused the drum to be beat a second time, after which he tossed the placard in the flames. For twenty-three years no similar execution had taken place.

Female Skaters.—In Friezland the women are as fond of skating as the men, and frequently have races. At one of these races, which took place some time since on a piece of ice in the outer ditch of the town of Leuwarden, there were thirteen competitors for the prize. They skated two and two; after each heat, she who arrived last at the goal quitted the course. The seventh and last trial was between the two remaining winners, one of whom was twenty years of age, and the other sixteen. The former gained the principal prize, consisting of a gold ornament for the head; and the other the second, which was a coral necklace, with a gold clasp. One of the competitors on this occasion was just past fifteen. To afford some idea of their swiftness, it is stated that one young female passed over the course, which was one hundred and fifty yards long, in thirteen seconds, or a mile in less than two minutes and a half.

A Challenge.—When Judge Thatcher was member of Congress from Massachusetts, he was challenged to fight a duel by Mr. Blount, member from North Carolina, for words spoken in debate. The Judge, on reading the message from Blount, after adjusting his wig and revolutionary hat, said to the bearer—"Give my respectful compliments to your master, and tell him he cannot have a definite answer to-day. Let him be patient a short time, till I can write to Portland and receive an answer. I always consult my wife on matters of importance, well knowing that she is a better judge of family affairs than myself. If she consents to take the choice of becoming a widow, or having her husband hanged for murder, I certainly will fight Blount. Tell him not to be in a hurry; it will not take more than three weeks to receive her selection."

Milk in Mexico.—Mustang, of the New Orleans Delta, writes: "One of the curiosities in Mexico is the manner of selling milk; instead of the neat white wooden vessel, or the long-spouted tin can, with the different measures hung upon it, and the rattling bell-cart to convey it from place to place with dispatch, or an old homespun looking negro backing it about on his hard-crowned head, we have the live animals themselves driven from door to door of the different regular customers, where they are milked, and a regular stand where transient patrons are supplied by milking into the vessel in which they take it home. Beside a drove of cows, with the calves all muzzled running and bleating after them, there is also a gang of goats and asses driven along, that people may suit themselves as to quality and price, and also their different tastes." This mode would have suited the nice taste of Dr. Johnson, the lexicographer.

Use of the Lungs.—It is quite an accomplishment to be able to breathe properly. The functions of the lungs are so important that too much care cannot be taken in order that their action may not be impeded. The stays, corsets, braces or any kind of apparatus by which the full inflation of the lungs is hindered or prevented, is nothing better than a gradual suicide. It is very well, in addition to the removal of all external pressure, to take pains to form a habit of fully inflating the lungs at every inspiration. They are composed of innumerable small air cells, into which the pure air is designed to be constantly pouring to purify the blood which is constantly brought there to meet it. If these cells are not constantly filled by the pure air, the impure blood is hurried off to perform its rounds once more through the system, bearing the elements of disease and death with it. Draw long, deep, gradual inspirations, and give the lungs a chance to perform faithfully their work, if health is desired.

No Land like America.—Mr. Winthrop of Boston, the new Speaker of the House of Representatives, who not long since returned from Europe, addressing a political meeting in Faneuil Hall, said, he had recently returned from other and distant lands; he had stood in the halls of world-wide renown: he had stood in the hall where Chatham fell dead, while vindicating, in words of burning eloquence, the cause of the American colonies and of American freedom. He had been at Runnymede, where the bold Barons rung from King John the Magna Charta—the constitution of England. He had stood on the field of Bannockburn, where Bruce won the liberty of Scotland; and on the 4th of July last, amid the wild hills and mountains of Switzerland—the land of Tell—he had, in company with a companion and countryman toasted once again his native and beloved land. But, amid all his wanderings, he had seen no land like his own land—no hall like Faneuil Hall—no hill like Bunker Hill—no plains like those of Lexington—and no rock like that of Plymouth."

Nutriment in Different Substances.—Dr. Warwick gives an interesting comparison of the amount of nutriment contained in different substances, and the time for their digestion. Of vegetables, he considers that beans contain most nutriment. As to animal substances, he remarks that mutton contains 29 per cent. of nutriment, beef 26, chicken 25, pork 24, cod and sole 21, haddock 18, &c. As to digestion, boiled rice occupies an hour, sago an hour and forty-five minutes, tapioca and barley two hours, stale bread two hours, new bread three hours, boiled cabbage four hours, oysters two and a half hours, salmon four hours. Venison chops one and a half—mutton three—beef three—roast pork five and a quarter—raw eggs two—hard boiled eggs three and a half.

Leap Year.—Our readers are aware, we presume, that the year we have just entered is Leap Year. Every fourth year contains, by the calendar, 366 days, one being added to the month of February. The calendar of the Roman Emperor, Juna, made the year 365 and one-fourth days. It was found, however, there were some minutes less, which in the course of centuries had made a difference in the astronomical equinox of about ten days. Pope Gregory XIII., in 1582, corrected this error by suppressing ten days in the calendar, and to prevent such a discrepancy in future, he established the rule of adding one day every four years. This is why it is called Leap Year.

VARIETY.

Cato pleaded four hundred cases, and won them all; Archimedes could relate all he ever heard, and in the same words; Julius fought fifty pitched battles; he could write, dictate, and listen to the conversation of his friends at the same time; Mithridates spoke to the ambassadors of twenty-two different nations without an interpreter. Julius Viator lived to an old age without using any kind of liquid nourishment. Crasne, grandfather of the Triumvirassua, who was slain by the Parthians, never laughed—he had, on this account, the surname of Angelastus.

There is a man in London who has a glass eye and spectacles, a wig, one arm and both legs of wood, a nose which is fastened to the skin of the forehead, a lower jaw of silver, a set of artificial teeth, a part of the skull of caoutchouc, and a palate and both ears of the same substance, as well as a large part of the abdomen. It is said that he was formerly employed in supplying a steam engine with coal and in an explosion of the boiler was most horribly mutilated. Dr. Kemble succeeded, almost by a miracle, in saving his life, and made him what he now is—almost an artificial yet breathing man.

Gumilla relates, in the History of the River Orinoco, that there is one nation which marries old men to girls, and old women to youth. For, they say, that to join young persons equal in youth and imprudence in wedlock together, is to join one fool to another. The marriage of young men with old women is, however, only a kind of apprenticeship, for, after they have served for some months, they are permitted to marry women of their own age.

Whoever undertakes to put a joke on the 'Razor Strop man,' is sure to get floored in the long run. While selling his strops in Plymouth, and expatiating the while on the evils of rum-drinking, a tipsey fellow cried out, 'If rum made me lie as fast as you in selling your strops, I'd quit it to-day.' 'Very good,' replied Smith; 'the only difference between your lying and mine, is this: My strops enable me to lie in a good warm bed, while rum makes you lie in the gutter.'

Make yourself agreeable, as much as possible, to all; for there is no person so contemptible, but that it may be in his power to be your best friend or worst enemy.

Those who are formed to win general admiration, are seldom calculated to bestow individual happiness.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

JAS. R. IRISH, Principal.
GURDON EVANS, Principal of Teachers' Department.
CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music,

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second "	"	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third "	"	April 5,	"	July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

EXTRACTS FROM MISSIONARY LETTERS.

The readers of the Recorder are already aware, that our missionaries have made choice of Shanghai as their place of residence and center of operations in China. It will be remembered that Bro. Carpenter proceeded to that place first, alone, leaving the rest of the company at Hongkong. The following extracts from his journal will be read with interest. More will be given next week.

After remaining at Hongkong about three weeks, having spent a great part of that time in examination of the relative claims of different fields of labor, with our hearts raised to God for direction, it was the opinion of us all, that I should proceed to Shanghai to make a personal examination, and, if Providence should favor, secure a house and get in readiness. Accordingly I cheerfully submitted to the apparent necessity of a temporary separation from my partner in life and other companions, took ship in the Prussian Bark Elizabeth, and again committed myself to the care of Providence on the restless waves. A winding course of five miles among mountain peaks and ridges, led us out into the open sea.

May 20th. I arose this morning but little refreshed. "Tired nature's sweet restorer" had been slow to spread his balmy wings over my couch. So great was the contrast between the Elizabeth and the cleanly and commodious Houqua, that it required nearly one full night of wakefulness to realize the difference. But our Captain is very kind. The passengers are three Catholic priests, Mr. Lord and wife, a Polish Jew, an Italian physician, and myself.

22d—Sabbath. Blessed be God for putting upon this day a blessing which may be felt under circumstances the most unfavorable. The promise of God has been graciously fulfilled to me: "Before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear."

24th. I find myself recovering from a slight sea-sickness. What a defense to the defenseless is the name of the Lord of Hosts.

25th. We are in the vicinity of Amoy; more than forty native vessels are in sight this morning. In reading the 15th chap. of 1 Cor., today, my mind was forcibly struck with the Apostle's reasoning. He brings a number of arguments, each one weighty in itself, into one grand focal point, and that point is brought to bear upon the great duty of laboring strenuously in the vineyard of our great husbandman. His argument seems to amount to this: Because the doctrine of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead is an incontrovertable truth, which sets the seal of God upon the whole gospel scheme; because this event renders certain the resurrection also of all the dead; because we shall be raised with power, and with spiritual and glorious bodies; because when we shall be raised, it will be to enjoy eternal life, having, through our Lord Jesus Christ, obtained the victory over the sting of death and the strength of sin; THEREFORE, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord. O what a therefore is that!

29th—Sabbath. The word of God, which liveth and abideth forever, has again refreshed my spirit.

June 4th. The most southerly of the Chusan group of Islands is in sight. A strange sight appears. The water ahead wears a yellow hue. Now we cross the line that divides the blue from the yellow. It is as distinct as that which divides sunshine from shade.

5th—Sabbath. Much of this day has been spent in reading about and meditating upon the rest that remaineth for the people of God. Mr. Baxter has some excellent thoughts on this subject. I have resolved to make the saint's everlasting rest a distinct subject of meditation, at least on every rest day.

8th. We are in the mouth of the great Yang Tse Kiang. We are obliged to feel our way with the lead.

9th. We anchor at Woosung. This is a small port on the Woosung river, at its junction with the Yang Tse Kiang. Here are twelve opium receiving vessels, which take the opium brought here and sell it to the Chinese. They have no canvas on their yards, but it is spread over the vessels to shed off the rain. We proceed up the river about fifteen miles to Shanghai, and cast anchor at half past 9 P. M., after a passage of twenty-one days, and a distance of twelve hundred miles, the wind for the most part ahead. Thanks be to God for his preserving mercies.

10th. Rev. Mr. Milne came on board before breakfast, and took me with him to the station of the London Missionary Society, about half a mile from the ship, on the ground belonging to the English. I took breakfast with Dr. Medhurst, then took up my residence for the present with Dr. Lockhart. The friends all appear kind. In the evening I attended a prayer meeting at Dr. Medhurst's. After the meeting, he took occasion to tell me in decided language that I ought to go to Foo-Chow.

11th. After breakfast, and before family prayer, Dr. L. gave me his mind as plainly as did Dr. M. the previous evening. I retired to my room with a load upon my heart. That was a day of trial. Conflicting thoughts rushed into my mind. I was in a measure sensible of the responsibility of that hour; for upon the decision I should make might hang the destinies of souls. I bowed my spirit before the throne of my God. With floods of tears I besought him for direction. His providence had appeared to guide my steps to this place, and I could not give way to the clamors of unbelief that He would abandon me now. I said to myself, Will not the prayers of my brethren at home be answered now? After giving the whole subject a thorough reconsideration, I became settled again in my opinion that I ought to make a serious attempt to locate our mission here. In the afternoon, according to a previous invitation, I went into the city to dine with Bishop Boone, and on my way called at the residence of the British Consul, and saw his wife. They had formerly been located at Foo-Chow. Had an interesting conversation with this lady. It confirmed my previous opinion. The uniform testimony of all disinterested persons with whom I have conversed, who are acquainted with both places, is that the disposition of the people here and at Ningpo is decidedly more mild and agreeable than at Foo-Chow. The Fuhkien province furnishes a great many seafaring men, and nearly all the pirates that have infested the coast. They have had a few serious outbreaks of popular violence there. Still the people are not so bad as at Canton. The great argument in favor of Foo-Chow is its relative destitution of laborers, there being only two missionaries there, whereas there are six or seven here, and more are expected soon. But the question of adaptation, it seems to me, should be taken into the account as well as the question of demand and supply. Our little company are doubtless better adapted to this people, than to a people of a harsher character. Besides, when we look at the absolute wants of this people, and the slowness of the gospel's progress among the Chinese, we see room enough here. In spite of all that can be done, the present generation will most of them die in their ignorance, unless miracles of grace shall be wrought for them. The law of God, in its integrity, ought doubtless to be held up here. This place has great facilities for intercourse with the interior.

13th—Sabbath. Spent this day in retirement, and got refreshed.

17th. Since my determination to settle here is seen to be steadfast and unmovable, I discover an evident softening down of the asperities that lay in my way. I am necessarily much dependent on the missionaries for facilities of accomplishing my object. I feel more at ease than I did. I have employed this week thus far in trying to get a house. Rent is high. The English have made it so. The missionaries have been obliged to pay a high rent the first year, and then they either build or tell the owners they will not pay so much. At present it appears probable that I shall have to pay three or four hundred dollars the first year. It distresses me to think of it. I know of but two houses at present that I can have. Either of them would accommodate both families, and so we could get along with one cook, and one teacher, possibly. One of these is on the English ground, and pleasantly located. Rent in this part is higher than the native houses. This is four hundred dollars, and the owner would wait till we can get it from home, i. e. six or seven months. It would be much cooler during the intense heat of summer, and much warmer in the winter, than a Chinese house. It contains only four rooms and a hall, and an out-house for the cook, &c. The floor is two or three feet from the ground, and it is new, and not quite finished. The other is near the other extremity of the suburbs, a good location for a Chinese house. The house is new and larger than we should need. It is two stories high, and contains one large place or room with no floor, that would make a very good chapel. [Some of the missionaries, by attending primarily to the colloquial language, can preach in a year after their arrival.] It would require an expense perhaps of one or two hundred dollars, instead of one or two thousand. This is an important consideration. There is but little danger of being driven out of a house; for the natives do not pay so much rent as foreigners do. This house has no chimney, no place for cooking except a room where we might build one for five or six dollars. The walls of the upper story are thin plank or boards. The missionaries generally line them with brick. For this they ask about three hundred and thirty dollars. I know not how much they will come down. But I shall offer them to-morrow two hundred dollars. I do not expect it can be got for that sum. The rent must be in advance. The Chinese are very slow to consummate a bargain, unless their price is acceded to. But I have a little time before it will be necessary to close the bargain. In the meantime, I will continue to look for a cheaper house.

I WILL GIVE NOTHING.

"There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." Prov. 11: 24.

A minister soliciting aid towards his chapel, waited upon an individual distinguished for his wealth and benevolence. Approving the case, he presented to the minister a handsome donation, and turning to his three sons, who had witnessed the transaction, he advised them to imitate his example. "My dear boys," said he, "you have heard the case; now what will you give?" One said, "I will give all my pocket will furnish;" another observed, "I will give half that I have in my purse;" the third sternly remarked, "I will give nothing."

Some years after, the minister had occasion to visit the same place, and recollecting the family he had called upon, he inquired into the actual position of the parties. He was informed that the generous father was dead; the youth who had so cheerfully given all his store, was living in affluence; the son who had divided his pocket-money, was in comfortable circumstances; but the third, who had indignantly refused to assist, and haughtily declared he would give "nothing," was so reduced as to be supported by the two brothers.

The above anecdote is a striking illustration of the words of Solomon. Men of property should contribute largely; they should recollect that they are responsible to God for the use they make of their fortunes, and he will hereafter call for the account.

HYMN.

Approach not the altar
With gloom in thy soul,
Nor let thy feet falter,
From terror's control.

Confiding, believing,
Oh, enter always
His courts with thanksgiving,
His portals with praise!

God loves not the sadness
Of fear and mistrust;
O serve him with gladness,
The Gentle, the Just.

Nor come to the temple
With pride in thy mien;
But lowly and simple,
In courage serene.

His bounty is tender,
His being is Love,
His smile fills with splendor
The blue arch above.

Bring meekly before him
The faith of a child;
Bow down and adore him
With heart undefiled.

WALKS IN LONDON.

I took the missionary's arm, and walked away from the school room. As we passed on, he said, "I am going to see the first ragged-school teacher in London, and while we are going, I will tell you how I first became acquainted with him. Ten years ago I made an appointment to meet a few persons in Old Pye street, to talk with them about their future interests. A few days previous to the day appointed, as I was passing a little brick hut not far from the place of meeting, I was accosted by a man in the door of the hut, who asked me to come in. He was a rough-looking fellow, and I thought that it might be dangerous to enter; but I concluded to do so. After he had given me an old chair to sit upon, he went to the farther end of the apartment, and brought out two large and furious bull-dogs. "Don't be afraid," he said, "for I aint agoing to hurt you now—but just look at those dogs. They would tear a man in pieces in five minutes. Now if you come into Old Pye street next Sunday with your religion, I'll be there with these dogs, and they'll put you in such a condition that you can't come to Old Pye street again." When he had finished, I said to him,—My friend, I am not afraid of you or your dogs; and to prove this, I am now going to pray for you. I knelt there in his dark cabin, and prayed that God would take pity upon the poor man, and shew him his condition. When I rose, I was astonished to see large tears rolling down his cheeks. As I left, I asked him if I might call again, and he said I might. He came to hear me in Old Pye street, but without his dogs. He finally became changed, and his wife with him. He gave up his evil practices; and although severely tried on account of poverty, he preserved his honesty. He helped me in all my little plans for doing good; and when I proposed to gather in a few of the outcast children of the streets and teach them how to read, he became the first teacher. For two years, while it was unpopular, he was at his post regularly each evening. He had but little knowledge, but he had a happy way of talking to the boys, and his own ragged appearance seemed to take away from them all fear, but not respect. At length the school became so popular that young men of the higher classes would come in and teach in the evenings. I recollect how he came to me one evening, as I was leaving, and said that he should not come to the school any more. "My rags," said he, "are out of place here. I have done my best for the school while it has been unpopular, but now there is no need of me." I told him that I thought more of him than any of the rest; but he said that he would help in any humble enterprise, but wished I would not ask him to come to the school any more. He has lived a noble life; and although tried, especially of late, by the sickness of himself and wife, he does not murmur.'

As the missionary finished his recital, we were in front of the poor man's hut. It was a little, low, brick hut, about ten feet wide and twenty long, and had but one window. We knocked at the door, and he let us in. There was but one room, and at one corner there were a few coals dimly burning, over which he was trying to mend an old kettle, for tinkering is his business. He was very pale, for he had the consumption, and his eyes looked as if he had just been weeping. His voice was tremulous, and yet there was such a struggling to be cheerful in it, that it touched my heart. But the forehead of that poor man was saint-like. There was a mildness about it that made me feel as if I were in the presence of an angel. The walls of his room were hung with cheap pictures and articles of furniture. As I was gazing at them, I thought I heard a groan issue from the farther part of the room. It was dark, but I could just discover the form of a woman upon a bed on the floor. 'Twas his wife—she was sick with a fever, and it was doubtful if she would live. The missionary took her withered hand and tried to comfort her. She said she would be glad to die if it wasn't for her husband; she did'nt know what he would do without her. "I should'nt stay long behind ye," said the old man with tears in his eyes. The missionary tried to cheer her up, and told her how pleasantly she and her husband would live in heaven! And then he came and sat down by the old man. He had in his hand a kettle, with a large hole in its bottom, which he was eyeing with a desponding look.

"Why don't you mend it," said the missionary, "and get your money for it?" "Ah!" said he, "they won't give me but a penny for the job, and it will take a penny's worth of solder to mend it with; but I have some solder, but havn't any money, and I want to get my wife two or three little things, and I guess I'll do it."

He said this with so much simplicity and pathos, that before I knew it I had placed a piece of silver in his hand, and told him not to think any more of the old kettle. He grasped both of my hands, and his hot tears fell down upon them, while my whole frame thrilled with such an ecstacy as I had never felt before. And the missionary gave him a piece—not his first gift to the poor teacher—and he was overwhelmed with joy. I believe that if my pillow that night had been a rock, it would have seemed to have been of the softest down. The thought of having made tears of joy to flow from the eyes of a stricken one, made my own heart leap for gladness. "Poor old man!" said the missionary, after we had left the hut—"poor old man! he has a lonely place here, but how much higher a place than any of us he will have there,"—and he pointed at the sky—"I cannot tell."

A GOOD SERMON.

We have heard a story of the elder Dr. Beecher, now of Cincinnati, that is said to be true, and is worth putting into type, as illustrating the truth that we can never tell what may result from an apparently very insignificent action. The doctor once engaged to preach for a country minister, on exchange, and the day proved to be one excessively stormy, cold and uncomfortable. It was in mid-winter, and the snow was piled in heaps all along in the roads, so as to make the passage very difficult. Still the minister urged his horse through the drifts, till he reached the church, put the animal into a shed, and went in. As yet, there was no person in the house, and after looking about, the old gentleman—then young—took his seat in the pulpit. Soon the door opened, and a single individual walked up the aisle, looked about, and took a seat. The hour came for commencing service, but no hearers.

Whether to preach to such an audience or not was now the question—and it was one that Lyman Beecher was not long in deciding. He felt that he had a duty to perform, and he had no right to refuse to do it, because only one man could reap the benefit of it; and accordingly, he went through all the services, praying, singing, preaching, and the benediction, with only one hearer. And when all was over, he hastened down from the desk to speak to his "congregation," but he had departed.

A circumstance so rare was referred to occasionally, but twenty years after, it was brought to the doctor's mind quite strangely. Traveling somewhere in Ohio, the doctor alighted from the stage, one day, in a pleasant village, when a gentleman stepped up and spoke to him, familiarly calling him by name. "I do not remember you," said the doctor. "I suppose not," said the stranger; "but we spent two hours together in a house, alone, once, in a storm." "I do not recall it, sir," added the old man, "pray, when was it?" "Do you remember preaching, twenty years ago, in such a place, to a single person?" "Yes, yes," said the Dr. grasping his hand, "I do, indeed, and if you are the man, I have been wishing to see you ever since." "I am the man, sir: and that sermon saved my soul, made a minister of me, and yonder is my church! The converts of that sermon, sir, are all over Ohio!"

CONCISE HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

The history of the English Bible includes a period of nine hundred years. The venerable Bede translated the Psalter and the gospel into the Anglo-Saxon by order of King Alfred. The price of a Bible in 1274, fairly written, was from $150 to $250, though in the year 1840, two arches of the London Bridge were built for $123.

Richard Rolles was one of the first to attempt a translation of the Bible into the English language, as it was spoken after the conquest. He wrote a paraphrase in verse on the book of Job, and a gloss upon the Psalter, but the whole Bible, by Wickliffe, appeared in 1360 and 1380.

A bill in the year 1490, was brought into the House of Lords, to forbid the use of English Bibles; but it did not pass. A decree of Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury in 1403 forbade unauthorized persons to translate any text of Holy Scripture into English, as well as prohibited the reading of any translation till approved of by the bishops or a Council. Several persons were burned for reading the word of God. In the reign of Henry the Fifth, a law was passed, "That whoever should read the Scriptures in their mother tongue, should forfeit land, cattle, body, life and goods, from their heirs for ever, and be condemned for heretics to God, enemies to the crown, and most arrant traitors to the land." And between 1461 and 1493, Faust, or Faustus, who undertook the sale of Bibles at Paris, where printing was then unknown, narrowly escaped punishment. He was taken for a magician, because he produced them so rapidly, and because one copy was so much like another.

The Latin Vulgate, printed at Mayntz, in 1462, was the very first printed edition of the whole Bible in any language, bearing the date and place of its execution, and the name of the printer.

The first printed edition of the Holy Scriptures in any modern language, was in German, in the year 1467. The New Testament, by Luther, revised by Melancthon, appeared in 1531. William Tyndal, in 1536, printed his English Testament at Antwery; but those who sold it in England, were condemned by Sir Thomas More, the Lord Chancellor, to ride with their faces to the horses' tails, with papers on their heads, and to throw their books and themselves into the fire at Cheapside. Tyndal himself was strangled and burned. His dying prayer was, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes." John Fry, or Fryth, and William Rope, who assisted Tyndal in his Bible, were both burned for heresy.

Cranmer obtained a commission from the King to prepare, with the assistance of learned men, a translation of the Bible. It was to be printed at Paris; but the Inquisition interfered, and 2500 copies were seized and condemned to the flames. Some of these, however, being, through avarice, sold for waste paper, by the officer who superintended the burning, were recovered, and brought to England, to the great delight of Cranmer, who, on receiving some copies, said that it gave him more pleasure than if he had received two thousand pounds. It was commanded that a Bible should be deposited in every parish church, to be read by all who pleased, and permission given people to purchase the English Bible for themselves and families.

In the year 1535, Coverdale's folio Bible was published. In the reign of Edward the Sixth, new editions appeared. In Mary's reign, the Gospellers, or reformers, fled abroad, but a new translation of the New Testament, in English, appeared at Geneva, in 1587, the first which had the distinction of verses, with figures attached to them.

A quarto edition of the whole Bible was printed at Geneva, 1260, by Rowland Harte. A new Testament in Welsh, appeared in 1569; the whole Bible in 1488, and the English translation called the Bishop's Bible, by Alexander Parker, in 1568. It was in 1582 that the Roman Catholic Rhenish Testament appeared, and in 1609 and 1610, that their Doway Old Testament was printed. In 1607 was begun, and in 1611 was completed, a new and more correct translation, being the present authorized version of the Holy Scriptures, by forty-seven learned persons, (fifty-four were appointed,) chosen from the two Universities. This edition has been truly styled, "not only the glory of the rich, and the inheritance of the poor," but the "guide of the way-worn pilgrim, the messenger of grace, and the means of knowledge, holiness, and joy to millions."

DON'T WORRY.—When Bulstrode Whitelocke was embarking as Cromwell's envoy to Sweden, in 1653, he was much disturbed in mind as he rested in Harwich on the preceding night, which was very stormy, while he reflected on the distracted state of the nation. It happened that a confidential servant slept in an adjacent bed, who, finding that his master could not sleep, at length said, "Pray, sir, will you give me leave to ask you a question?" "Certainly." "Pray, sir, don't you think that God governed the world very well before you came into it?" "Undoubtedly." "And pray, sir, don't you think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?" "Certainly." "Then, sir, pray excuse me, but don't you think you may trust him to govern it quite as well, as long as you live?" To this question Whitelocke had nothing to reply; but turning himself about, soon fell asleep till he was summoned to embark.

THE BEST IS LEFT.—"I am fallen," cried Jeremy Taylor, "into the hands of publicans and sequestrators, and they have taken all from me. What now? Let me look about me! They have left me sun and moon, fire and water, a loving wife, and many friends to pity me, and some to relieve me; and I can still discourse; and, unless I list, they have not taken away my merry countenance, and my cheerful spirits and a good conscience; they have still left me the providence of God, and all the promises of the gospel, and my religion, and my hopes of heaven, and my charity to them too. And still I sleep, and digest, and eat and drink. I read and meditate; I can walk in my neighbor's pleasant fields, and see the varieties of natural beauties, and delight in all that in which God delights, that is, in virtue and wisdom, in the whole creation, and in God himself."

A CHILD'S TEARS.—A Welsh clergyman asked a little girl for the text of the last sermon. The child gave no answer—she only wept. He found out that she had no Bible in which to look for the text; and this led him to inquire whether her parents or neighbors had a Bible; and this led him to begin a Bible Society for Wales. Some good people in London said, "Why should not we have a Bible Society for England, too?" and others said, "And for France and the nations of Europe?" And then another said, "And why not have a Bible Society for the whole world?" The tears of that little girl led to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

CHEAP RELIGION.—Says Jeremy Taylor:—"He that takes off the yoke of obedience, and unties the bands of discipline, and preaches a cheap religion, and presents Heaven in the midst of flowers, and strews carpets softer than the Asian luxury in the way, and sets the song Zion to the tunes of Persian and lighter airs, and offers great liberties in bondage under affliction and sin, and reconciles eternity with present enjoyment, he shall have his schools filled with disciples; but he that preaches the cross, and the severities of Christianity, and the strictness of holy life, shall have the lot of his blessed Lord; he shall be thought ill of and deserted."

"SCRIPTURAL VIEW OF THE WINE-QUESTION."

Most of our readers are probably aware, that a discussion has been going on for some time past, among distinguished friends of temperance, in relation to the nature of wines, and the kind most proper to be used at the Lord's Supper. In the progress of the discussion, some contended, that mere grape juice, as expressed from the cluster, was not wine; that all wine was fermented liquor, and of course was intoxicating; and that the use of such wine for sacramental purposes was sanctioned by the Bible. Others insisted, that the fruit of the vine in the form of grape juice as expressed from the cluster was truly wine, was recognized as such by the sacred writers, was presumed to be the wine used at the first Supper, and was the wine most proper to be used in the celebration of that ordinance in all after time—that the drugged and brandied wines of commerce were unfit for sacramental use, especially at a time when so many reformed inebriates were by the grace of God brought into the Church of Christ, and that the purchase of such liquors to be used for a purpose so sacred encouraged its manufacture and sale, and brought reproach both on the church and the cause of temperance.

With a view of furnishing inquirers upon this subject with the best helps to form a correct conclusion, Dr. Nott, of Union College, requested Prof. Stuart, of Andover Theological Seminary, to give him the result of a critical investigation of the Scriptures in relation to the nature of the wines there referred to. His reply is before us, in the form of a sixty-four page pamphlet, entitled, "Scriptural View of the Wine-Question." After a thorough examination of the principal terms used in the Scriptures to designate wine and strong drink, the Professor says that they are generic, and that their meaning in particular cases must be determined to a great extent by the context. Wine and strong drink were used by the Hebrews "in two different states; the one was a fermented state, the other an unfermented one. The fermented liquor was pregnant with alcohol, and would occasion inebriation in a greater or less degree, in all ordinary circumstances; and even where not enough of it was drunk to make its effect perceptible, it would tend to create a fictitious appetite for alcohol, or to injure the delicate tissues of the human body. The unfermented liquor was a delicious, nutritive, healthful beverage, well and properly ranked with corn and oil; and it might be kept in that state, by due pains, for a long time, and even go on improving by age." In view of these facts, he thinks it easy to explain, what has often been represented as a contradiction in the Scriptures, viz. that wine and strong drink are sometimes spoken of as a good, a token of divine favor, and ranked with corn and oil; while the same substances are also spoken of as an evil, their use prohibited, and woe denounced upon all who seek for them. The Professor's conclusion in relation to this matter is, "that wherever the Scriptures speak of wine as a comfort, a blessing, or a libation to God, and rank it with such articles as corn and oil, they mean only such wine as contained no alcohol that could have a mischievous tendency; that wherever they denounce it, prohibit it, and connect it with drunkenness and reveling, they can mean only alcoholic or intoxicating wine."

In regard to the question whether the use of the fruit of the vine at the Passover and the Lord's Supper, sanctions the use of ordinary fermented wine for sacramental purposes, Prof. Stuart is very explicit. He thinks it is established beyond all reasonable doubt, that orthodox Judaism has always rejected alcoholic or fermented wine at sacred feasts; and even now the Passover is celebrated with wine newly made from raisins, where unfermented wine can not be had. "The Passover, says he, which excluded every thing fermented, did, in the view of the Hebrews, of course exclude fermented wine." Hence he thinks it all but absolutely certain, that unfermented wine was used at the original celebration of the Lord's Supper, which followed the celebration of the Passover. He denies, therefore, that any argument can be drawn from this source in favor of using fermented wine for sacramental purposes.

CHINA MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

The last overland mail from China to England, brought some interesting missionary intelligence. It appears that Mr. Roberts has again been exposed to the indignation of a mob, and his furniture and effects carried off. Hereafter the American missionaries will be protected by the authorities, and allowed to preach in their chapels. The acting magistrate of Pwan-yu has published the following proclamation respecting the attack upon Mr. Roberts:

> "Whereas, an American, named Roberts, having erected and established a Christian or Sabbath-day meeting-house, for the purpose of explaining the Scriptures and reforming the wicked—it appears that some time ago a number of the rabble endeavored by force to obtain money from him: but their demand not being complied with, they made a great disturbance, smashing all the doors, windows, chairs and tables, and carrying off all his clothes and effects:
>
> "I, the magistrate, have already inquired into the matter, and have apprehended Le-a-Shang and eleven others, who will generally be prosecuted, as is on record."

The magistrate goes on to say that he has examined "this Roberts," and that he explains the Scriptures and exhorts to good actions; that all who desire to hear him can do so quietly, but if any dare to oppose, "such persons will be apprehended, and severe punishment will follow."

The Che-Keang authorities have traced the murderers of the late Rev. Mr. Lowrie, American Missionary, who, about three months ago, was killed by pirates in the bay of Hang Chau.

At Canton, the British residents are still frequently annoyed and ill-treated by the Chinese, and they have petitioned their Government for protection. A war steamer stationed in the river is suggested as the best method of protecting British interests.

"DESECRATION OF THE SABBATH."

Under this head the New Brunswick (N. J.) Fredonian says that the habitual desecration of Sunday, "by drovers in driving their horses, cattle, sheep, and swine to market on the Sabbath, and of other persons passing on the road with loaded wagons in order to gain an early market on the following day, has induced the citizens of Ten-Mile-Run, Somerset County, to meet and pass resolutions calling upon the 'civil magistrates and other good citizens to execute the law' in such cases; pledging themselves 'to coöperate with them in rescuing this blessed day from the contempt and desecration of the Sabbath-breaker.' They also complain of the 'habitual violation of the Sabbath, committed in the unnecessary use of the Canal and Railroad,' both of which run near them. They 'invite other neighborhoods throughout the State to combine for the purpose of restoring to the Sabbath the honor that is due it; and so teach men to respect the law of the land, if they will not the law of God.'" How long will it take people to learn, that the "desecration of the Sabbath," so-called, cannot be prevented by statutes and penalties? The Sunday laws have long existed in New Jersey, and yet the evil they were intended to prevent has increased. Would it not be well to try some other expedient? Our opinion is, that these reformers who are for making "men respect the law of the land, if they will not the law of God," would be in much better business, and much more likely to do good, if they would exert themselves to make the law of the land agree with the law of God.

MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION—EXECUTIVE BOARD.

In the Sabbath Recorder of Nov. 18th, 1847, an article was published, prepared by the undersigned, the design of which was to disclose certain facts connected with the missionary service performed for the Board by Elder James L. Scott, concerning which some misunderstanding had arisen with certain esteemed brethren of the denomination. In that article occurs the following:

> "Bro. Estee appears to have commenced his agency in West New Jersey, where he raised about thirty dollars towards sustaining brother Scott in the western field," &c.

From information since received, the undersigned believes that he was mistaken in regard to the place where Bro. Estee commenced his agency, and raised the foregoing sum of thirty dollars. Instead of West New Jersey, it was Rensselaer Co., N. Y. The undersigned did not feel certain on this point when he prepared the article, and the official documents in possession of the Board did not enable him to resolve his doubt. His only alternative was to consult those members of the Board to whom he had access, that, if there was any statement not strictly according to fact, it might be corrected before going to press. This he did. Those who examined it, discerned no error. Still, the writer, not feeling entirely confident, did not choose to commit himself so far as to say, unqualifiedly, that brother Estee raised the thirty dollars in New Jersey, and therefore used the qualifying expression, "Bro. Estee appears to have commenced his agency," &c.

Having recently received a communication from Bro. E. on this subject, and the matter having been submitted again to the decision of the Boaad, the undersigned hastens to make this correction.

On behalf of the Board,
Thomas B. Brown, Cor. Sec.

MISSIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The New York Tribune says, that on Sunday, Feb. 13, a very interesting discourse was preached in the Broome-street Presbyterian Church, by Rev. Dr. Badger, in behalf of the Home Missionary Society. Dr. B. stated that the Society now employs 972 Ministers, scattered through all parts of the Union, and preaching to 1,470 churches. The expense to the Society of supporting this body of laborers is $150 each a year, or $120,000 in all. More than 100 additional ministers have been asked for, but the Society has not had the means of supporting them. In Texas, with a territory seven times as large as New York, and a population of 100,000, there is only one missionary. In Oregon there is not one, though one is on the way thither. The Roman Catholic Church, however, has a Bishop and twenty priests in that region, and an Archbishop, with eleven new missionaries and seventeen nuns, will soon be there.

It was also stated by the Rev. Dr., that a foreign missionary society had been formed in the Sandwich Islands, with the Valley of the Mississippi as its chosen field of operations! The treasury of the American Home Missionary Society has received $60 from this source. It was further stated by Dr. Adams, that the Sandwich Island Society had sent to their station in this country a printing-press, which some time ago was sent from here to aid the missionary operations in that distant region.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP—NO. 1.

I noticed, in the Recorder of February 3d, the following question, with some editoral remarks, viz: "If a Seventh-day Baptist joins the Society of Odd-Fellows, ought he to be excommunicated unless he will renounce Odd-Fellowship?" You remark, that you are not sufficiently acquainted with the minutæ of Odd-Fellowship to express a definite opinion upon the question.

We are aware that the secrecy thrown around it renders it more difficult to examine it, and test its claims to indulgence and patronage; yet, notwithstanding this difficulty, we think there are infallible criteria by which we may judge of its merits or demerits, and come to a correct conclusion whether a church ought to retain an adhering Odd-Fellow as a member of the church or otherwise. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is a rule given by the Great Head of the Church, and has been confirmed by the experience and observation of all mankind. By this standard we will examine the subject, and shall not confine our investigation to this society alone, but shall extend it to kindred societies, who exact an oath or promise from the candidate for initiation, that he will keep the secrets of the society, and to a certain extent of its members, and this even before he knows what those secrets are. We conceive that no person has a moral right thus to pledge himself, when he does not know but he may be pledging himself to sustain acts of the most diabolical wickedness; that he may not be binding himself to a clique to control elections, defeat justice, and even to ruin the character and destroy the interests of his neighbor whenever he shall offend the Order, and that too in a way that leaves the victim no means of prevention or redress. Witness the abduction of Morgan and the subsequent trial, where the power and wealth of the Order of Freemasons were brought to the defense of the perpetrators of crime, and where members of the fraternity refused to testify, thereby acknowledging the claims of the Order superior to the claims of their country, and thereby preventing the due administration of justice, and defeating the design of government to protect its subjects in the enjoyment of their personal, social, and civil rights.

It will be objected, that the promise of secrecy is restricted to the signs, grip, and password of the Order, and that all its essential principles and objects are open to the inspection of the whole community. So said Masonry, and so say all secret societies, the society of blacklegs only excepted, who refine upon the secrecy of these "moral, benevolent, and heaven-approved" societies, by laboring to conceal not only their signs, grips, and pass-words, but even their membership, and the existence of the society itself. If these are the only secrets of the Order, why retain them? Why not lift the cover, and give the only satisfactory evidence that can be given, that there is nothing behind the curtain that is dangerous to the rights and liberties of the community—that there is nothing unholy or impure in the Order. Nothing short of this can satisfy a community jealous of its rights. In short, we unhesitatingly believe, that their refusing to raise the curtain is prima facia evidence that there are means of evil concealed in their sanctorum.

Secondly, I will examine its influence on the social relations. Here we shall find its tendency is to excite jealousy and distrust on the part of the uninitiated, while it circumscribes the kindly feelings of those of the Order to those of its own fraternity, thus dividing society into distinct castes, with feelings as repulsive as those existing among the Hindoo castes. Instead of estimating men by their moral worth, it substitutes a fictitious standard, and judges and treats men as they happen to belong to the Order of Odd-Fellowship or otherwise. Let a member of the fraternity be confined on a bed of sickness, or subjected to some other misfortune; his misfortune may awaken the sympathies of the neighborhood and call into action the benevolence of the community. But Odd-Fellowship steps in and forbids these spontaneous effusions of humanity, and arrogates to itself the exclusive privilege of ministering to the wants and necessities of the initiated. What a wound is inflicted upon the feelings of the uninitiated! This is no fancy sketch; but the experience and observation of the inhabitants of every village where Odd-Fellowship has existed for a sufficient length of time to exhibit its effects, will establish its truth.*

But what are its effects on the domestic relations? Does the confiding wife (who has not only plighted her love, but herself, her all, to the man of her choice) feel herself repaid for this devotion and consecration, when her husband, instead of reciprocating these pledges, forms other relations and connections too sacred for his bosom companion to participate in or even to know? The slighted and abused wife may have too much regard for the reputation of her family to reveal her sorrows, yet she cannot repress those feelings of anguish and disappointment which she must unavoidably feel, or renounce her humanity.

In my next number I shall examine its claims to the character of a benevolent institution. E.

* This has been the case as far as the observation of the writer extends.

$50,000 for Colonization.—A circular appears in several of the papers setting forth that the Colonization Society will require at least fifty thousand dollars to meet all their liabilities the present year, while there is only $268 46 in the Treasury. The Empire State, says the circular, can easily furnish ten thousand dollars. Nobody doubts its ability, but we question its disposition, to do such a thing. The time has been when the colonization scheme had a strong hold upon the confidence of the philanthropists of New York. But that day has past; and the better-informed now regard the scheme as being just what some of its southern officers have declared it to be, a device to remove free blacks and work off anti-slavery feeling, and so strengthen the system of slavery.

Revivals among the Methodists.—The Methodist paper in New York, the Christian Advocate and Journal, says: "Nearly all our churches in this city are enjoying special tokens of the Divine regard, in the awakening and conversion of sinners, and edification of believers; and we are happy to inform our readers that we have a considerable number of revival notices on hand, for which we could not make room in our columns this week. 'Praise the Lord: praise thy God, O Zion!'"

Denominational Statistics of Kentucky.—The Louisville Presbyterian, giving the statistics of religious denominations in Kentucky, says that the number of communicants in the Episcopal church in the State is about 950, in the Presbyterian about 10,000, in the Baptist about 70,000, in the Methodist about 38,000, in the Campbellite not certainly known, but supposed to be about 30,000, making, with the addition of several minor sects, near 150,000 professed Protestants in the State.

Protestant Favors reciprocated by the Catholics.—The letters of Kirwan to Bishop Hughes, upon the Catholic controversy, have not only been published in a great many religious newspapers, but reprinted in a tract form for general distribution. The Catholic Telegraph, printed at Cincinnati, says that the letters of Bishop Hughes in reply have been stereotyped, and large editions printed, with which it is proposed to supply the whole Protestant population of Ohio. The Telegraph speaks of the matter thus:—

> "The demand has thus far amongst all classes been very great, and we hope that it will continue to increase until the whole commonwealth has been supplied. It is our duty to reciprocate the favors received from our Protestant friends in the shape of tracts. We have never tried what we can do in this line, but as Catholics never fail in any effort to which they bring their whole strength, success on this occasion is certain. Every professor of the old faith 'once delivered to the saints,' ought to take a warm and untiring interest in this work of charity. Thousands are at present directing their attention to the Catholic Church, for they are beginning to comprehend the falsehoods and misrepresentations of which she has been so long the victim. They discover that the 'sect every where spoken against,' is now, as in the days of St. Paul, the true Church of Christ."

Men needed, as well as Money.—Many persons talk as though nothing but money was needed to carry forward the benevolent enterprises of the day. But they are mistaken. Men are needed as much as money; and we believe that when the men can be had, the money will generally be forthcoming. The Presbyterian Treasury, speaking upon this subject, says:—

> "The number of ordained ministers which the Presbyterian Church sends out to teach the heathen nations is exceedingly small in comparison with the extent of the field. This Church should send forth hundreds of Christian missionaries to answer the importunity of an awakening world. But where are the men? Within the bounds of our own denomination, in this favored land, there are nearly five hundred vacant churches. Besides this, there are hundreds of destitute places east, south, and west, where the gospel ought to be proclaimed from sanctuaries built through the labors of Presbyterian missionaries. With an adequate supply of right-minded, devoted ministers, the number of Presbyterian churches might be speedily doubled. The Presbyterian Board of Missions have affirmed that they might at once advantageously locate one thousand, if they could find the men. But where are the men?"

Value of a Religious Paper.—A pastor in Illinois expresses his opinion on this subject, in the Presbyterian of the West, as follows: "It is a great comfort to a minister to preach to a well informed congregation. The ministry was instituted to give information of a certain kind. There are a thousand items of intelligence, which it is important that a congregation should have, and which cannot be conveyed to them by the pulpit labors of their pastor. The state of the church in different and distant parts of the 'field'—its progress, its difficulties, &c., ought to be known to its members. The well-conducted religious newspaper, is well adapted to this end. And besides this, the merely secular information which such a paper conveys to its readers, in its weekly visits, will abundantly compensate for its trifling cost. A good religious journal is worth to a family where there are children growing up, as much as a quarter's schooling each year. It gives them knowledge which they can in no other way obtain."

A Shrewd Conjecture.—The Postmaster in ———, writes thus:—"The Alabama Baptist, sent to this office to the address of ———, is not taken out. I know of no cause, unless money is more interesting than religion to the man." [Alabama Baptist.

Roman Catholic Newspapers.—The Catholic Herald says, that of the one hundred religious newspapers published in this country, "eighty-eight are enlisted in behalf of heresy and schism!" The remaining twelve, we suppose, are Roman Catholic, concerning which the Herald says:—

> "But although ample provision has been made in this respect, it is a lamentable fact, that the Catholic community at large have not manifested a corresponding interest. While we have a sufficient number of newspapers established in various sections of our country, north and south, east and west, yet their circulation, both separately, and in the aggregate, is exceedingly limited. In the number of our papers we compare to advantage with even the largest or wealthiest denomination in the country, but in the amount of circulation we are sadly behind them. We are confident that there are several Protestant papers, which have, each of them, a circulation as great as that of all our papers put together! We are confident that notwithstanding they have eight times as many papers as we have, the circulation of their papers averages four or five times as many as ours average!"

"High places of Paganism."—The Watchman of the Prairies contains a letter from Rev. J. G. Beecher, dated at Maulmain, Aug. 20, 1847, addressed to a Baptist church in Illinois. Referring to his outward voyage, he says:—

> "The first thing that attracts the attention of those coming from Christian lands, as they approach this land of idolaters, is the spires of the white and gilded pagodas, which crown the hill-tops in almost every direction. If the sight of them could be associated with any thing that is noble, any thing good, or worthy of intellectual and moral beings, they would appear very beautiful to the distant beholder. But, as they mark out the high places of Paganism, and are associated with all that is vile, degrading, and abominable in heathenism, they can be looked on only with feelings of sadness and pity."

Value of Religion in a Slave.—In a lecture delivered at Salem, Mass., by Wm. M. Brown, the following significant statement was made:

> "I have with me an account of a slave recently sold upon the auction stand. The auctioneer could only get a bid of $400, but as he was about to knock her off, the owner of the slave made his way through those that surrounded him and whispered to the auctioneer. As soon as the owner left, the auctioneer said, 'I have failed to tell you all the good qualities of this slave. I have told you that she was strong, healthy, and hearty, and now I have the pleasure to announce to you that she is very pious. She has got religion;' and, although before that he could only get $400, as soon as they found that she had got religion, they commenced upon her, and the bidding went up to $700. The writer says that her body and mind were sold for $400, and her religion was sold for $300."

Imperial Intolerance.—The Emperor of Russia having been informed that a young officer had joined a religious sect which is considered heterodox, issued the following decree:—

> "Seeing the results from the inquiry made by the Count Marshal of Volgeda, that Frederick Schucheaky, gentleman, sub-lieutenant of the battalion of infantry garrisoned in that town, has been guilty of the crime of abjuring the Apostolic Roman Catholic religion, wherein he was born, and has joined the sect of the Duclaborgas, or Molokas, a sect which has separated itself from our orthodox church, I ordain that he shall be deprived of all his rights of nobility, and that he shall serve as a private soldier in the armies of the Caucasus for the rest of his life. Given at St. Petersburg, Oct. 12.

Power of Liberal Sentiment in Italy.—The European correspondent of the New York Evangelist gives the following relation to the progress of civil and religious liberty in Italy:

> "The Pope, in order to avoid the responsibility of a somewhat pithy article in a journal, deposed the Censor, who had suffered it to pass. Immediately the editors of the seven principal papers at Rome declared that their editions would cease to appear until the liberal Censor was restored to his place. The Pope yielded and restored the Censor. It is one step toward the abolition of a preventative censorship. The Pope is ready to take back some prerogatives, but at his first retrograde step, the popular disapprobation was so strongly manifested, that he was obliged to yield in order to lead."

The St. John's Church (Episcopal) located at Portsmouth, N. H., was to be consecrated on Wednesday of last week. This Church has been built one hundred years, but has never as yet been consecrated. When first organized, the Episcopal Church in this country was without a Bishop, and for some cause the ceremony has not since been performed. The Church has lately been rejuvenated and repaired.

The New York Tribune states that Rev. H. W. Beecher, of Brooklyn, preached a very impressive sermon on Sunday last, at the Church in Cranberry-st., in which he took occasion to censure in manly language, our war on Mexico, terming the assertion on our part that the war was for the purpose of civilizing and Christianizing the unhappy and down-trodden Mexicans, as sheer hypocrisy, and a blistering infamy upon us in the eyes of all true and honest Christians.

Rev. Zephaniah Swift died in Derby, Ct., on the 7th inst., at the advanced age of 77 years. He was the first person born in Wilmington, Vt., graduated at Dartmouth College in 1752, and was installed Pastor of the Congregational Church in Roxbury, Ct., in 1796. He took charge of the first church in Derby in 1813, where he has since lived.

In New Jersey the Court of Errors and Appeals has decided that slavery in that State is not inconsistent with its Constitution, which declares that "all men are by nature free." The case was that of a slave born prior to 1804, who sued for his freedom. Slaves born since that year cease to be chattels on coming of age.

Rev. Mr. Poisal, agent of the Virginia Bible Society, says that there are fifteen thousand families in that State destitute of the Scriptures.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, last week, the Ten Regiments Bill continued under discussion, and was spoken upon by Messrs. Upham, Cass, Breese, Rusk, and Green. Mr. Cameron presented a petition from the citizens of Pennsylvania, for abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. The House resolution, proposing thanks to General Scott, was passed; also the House resolution thanking Gen. Taylor and his men—Mr. Hale of N. H., voting against both, on the ground that to thank the officers was to approve the war.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the bill authorizing a loan of sixteen million dollars was debated, and finally passed by a vote of 192 to 14. Mr. Thompson, of Pennsylvania, submitted a resolution, which lies over, for the withdrawal of our troops from Mexico. Mr. Thompson also offered a resolution, that the words in the resolution of the 3d of January last, that the war was unconstitutionally commenced by the President, is untrue in fact, and calculated to prevent peace with Mexico, and should therefore be expunged from the journals of the House. This resolution was laid on the table, by a vote of 116 to 74.

WAR NEWS.

New rumors of peace have been afloat within the past week, but they do not seem to be generally credited. The following items about war, murder, &c., comprise the principal intelligence lately received from Mexico.

A courier who was sent to the Capital with the President's Message, by Mr. Peoples, for the American Star, was, on his return, taken into the bushes, stripped, and shot by some guerillas.

Col. McClelland, with 300 infantry and 200 mounted men, had started to follow up the Orizaba road and cut off robbers, who are represented as in large force on the main road to the Puente Nacional.

It was positively asserted, by merchants well informed on affairs in the interior, that General Lane was moving on Orizaba with 500 cavalry. A later arrival reports the capture of Orizaba, and its being in quiet possession of the body of American troops dispatched from the Capital.

Fifteen cases of small-pox had occurred at Vera Cruz.

Col. Hays, with 100 Rangers and a few volunteers, reached Teotihuacan on the 12th ult., in pursuit of Padre Jarauta, and while reposing at a hacienda, with horses unsaddled and unbridled, Padre Jarauta came suddenly upon them with a body of guerillas, and a severe contest ensued. Eight Mexicans were killed and left on the field, and the whole body successfully repulsed, the Americans sustaining no injury. Padre Jarauta was last seen on his horse, severely wounded, and the animal was afterwards found loose, the blood running down his sides.

A member of Captain Mears's company of Mounted Volunteers was condemned and shot the latter part of December, for threatening to take the life of his captain at Buena Vista. Alex. Neason, also a member of Capt. Mears's company, was hung at Saltillo for wilful murder, in shooting one of the Mexican Revenue Guard.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Hibernia arrived at New York last week, bringing European news eight days later. We give below the principal items.

All Sicily is in a state of revolt. The Piedmontese Gazette of the 20th gives the following details: Messina began the insurrection on the 4th, eight days before the general rising, and had organized a civic guard, and taken possession of the fort of St. Salvadore. At Palermo, country people flocked in arms to the Capital, headed by the priests, with crucifixes in their hands, haranguing the multitude, and saying, that as Christ died for them, they should die for their country. The cavalry attacked the people, but were repulsed with a loss of fifty men; the people only lost twenty. Some persons were seen pouring boiling oil on the soldiers from the windows; and among the pieces of furniture that assailed their heads from above there was a piano! Other accounts say that the insurrection extends to Catania, Syracuse, Reggio, Messina, and the principal towns of the interior.

Accounts from Ireland represent pauperism as increasing to an alarming extent in the south and west. Tipperary, Limerick, and Mayo, appear to be the Counties more severely visited. At Cloughjordan, in the first-named County, scenes almost to parallel those of Skibbereen have been disclosed at the Coroner's inquests. At an inquest held at Borriskane, on the body of the daughter of a schoolmaster, her father declared, on his oath, that for a week previous to her death she could get nothing to eat, and that while expiring in his arms, as he gazed on her pallid face and parched lips, she was calling on him to give her a drink, and to administer to her food, which he had not the means of procuring. And this is by no means an islolated case.

Preparations, on a larger extent than for many years past, are making for emigration this season, in Armagh, in Ireland, and the surrounding counties. A great proportion of the number will be respectable Protestants, most of whom will have a considerable amount of cash with them.

The state of health of Louis Philippe has given rise of late to considerable uneasiness in France. The real fact is, that his Majesty still labors under the remains of influenza, although considerably better. Any complaints by a monarch so advanced in years, and whose feelings have so recently been subjected to a severe and trying ordeal, will cause more general interest than usual, and we do not wonder, therefore, that they have caused the renewal of the old rumor of abdication.

Abd-el-Kader, after being confined for several days in the Lazaretto at Toulon, has been transferred to a wretched prison at Fort Lamalgue, where he is treated with great rigor, in consequence of his refusal to write a letter to the King, thanking his Majesty for the hospitable reception he had received, renouncing the convention with Gen. Lamoriciere and the Duke d'Aumale, expressing his ardent desire to live and die in France, and, above all, begging the permission of the King to be allowed to visit Paris, in order that he may make his submission to his Majesty in person.

The Secretaries of the British Association for the Relief of Distress in Ireland and Scotland, have received from Adelaide, South Australia, an order from his Excellency, Governor Robe, on the Lords of her Majesty's Treasury, for £1,000, subscribed by the colonists for the relief of the distressed by famine in Ireland and Great Britain. A donation in wheat, of similar value, is shortly to follow.

Miss Frederica Herschell, sister to the celebrated astronomer, Frederick William Herschell, died on the 17th inst., at Hanover. Miss Herschell was herself an accomplished astronomer; she is perhaps most popularly known in England as the constructor of the selenic globe preserved in Greenwich Observatory.

An urn containing about 300 Roman brass coins of the reigns of Dioclesian, Maximilian, and Constantius, was discovered at Malvern, near the foot of the Beacon Hill.

Cardinal Massinio, Minister of Public Works, died suddenly at Rome on the 11th inst., at the age of 42. The Italia of Pisa says that his death was the effect of the reproof given to him by the Pope for the opposition which the Cardinal gave to the late motu proprio establishing the Council of Ministers.

The King of Bavaria has ordered those Jesuits who have taken refuge there, after banishment from Switzerland, to leave within three days.

An envoy from Rome has arrived in Berne, charged by the Pope to use his efforts for the religious pacification of the Catholics of that country. He is a French prelate, and of a conciliating mind.

The Hague journals announce that the King of Holland has given the sum of 10,000 florins from his private purse, for the construction of a House of Refuge for old men of the Reformed Evangelical Communion at the Hague.

The King of Denmark died on the 21st ult., at the age of sixty-two.

Professor Finn Magnussen died at Copenhagen on the 24th December, 1847, and the announcement will be received with sorrow by all friends of Northern philology.

The weather had become extremely cold in Paris, and particularly in the south-eastern department of France. The Rhine was partially frozen.

On the 11th, at Hamburg, there were sixteen degrees of Reaumur of cold. The Elbe was frozen, even to its mouth, so thickly that laden wagons were able to pass over it.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY OF INCENDIARIES.—The authorities of Poughkeepsie have arrested two individuals, supposed to be implicated in the recent acts of incendiarism in Taghkanic, Columbia County. The mode in which the property was fired was by the use of a lantern made of pasteboard, in which a piece of candle was placed, the bottom of which was wound round with tow. One of these lanterns, in a partially consumed state, was found, and on the pasteboard was seen, in pencil, the name of a lady residing in one of the adjoining villages. On being shown the pasteboard, the lady recognized the name to be her hand-writing, and that she wrote it at one of the village stores. The storekeeper, on being applied to, said the sheet of pasteboard had been selected by a lady who wished to purchase it, but that he had sold it to ———, (naming one of the parties now in jail.) The arrest of this individual followed, and farther disclosures led to farther arrests.

SUMMARY.

The success of Banvard's wonderful Panorama of the Mississippi, has induced some artists to undertake an immense painting in the same style of the Hudson—a subject immeasurably exceeding in beauty, variety and majesty, the turbid waters, and the flat shores of the western river, and yet presenting a work of much less labor. The Boston Chronotype says that Dr. Townsend, the Sarsaparilla man, is the projector of the enterprise, and has chartered a sloop, in which artists are now making their sketches. The picture will be completed in three or four months.

A boy, 16 years of age, says the Livingston Republican, hung himself in Nunda on Monday last. The circumstances are truly melancholy. The family where he resided were engaged in butchering hogs, and while the men were at dinner he put a small chain around his neck, as is supposed, for the purpose of ascertaining what impression it would make, and let himself hang from the pole on which the hogs were strung up. When the men returned from dinner, life was found to be extinct.

Louis Joseph Papineau in 1836 was speaker of the Canadian parliament, with a majority of twenty to one at his back. In 1837 he was an outlaw, with £1000 on his head. In 1838 he was to be put to death untried, if found in Canada. In 1847 he fulminated once more his anathemas against colonial rule. In 1848 he will be the successor of Sir Allen McNab, the hero of Fort Schlosser, as speaker of the third united parliament of Canada.

It is said that under the instructions sent from Washington to General Scott, the mint at the city of Mexico, and the mints of Guanaxuato, Zacatecas, Guadalaxara, Durango, &c., will be put in operation for the coinage of U.S. dollars and half dollars. The average annual coinage at these mints is about twelve millions of dollars.

Thomas Cole, the distinguished landscape painter, died on Saturday, at his residence near Catskill. He leaves a wife and a numerous family to mourn his loss, a sorrow in which a large circle of devoted friends will share. To art his death is a great calamity.

The number of copies of the Old and New Testaments which have been issued by the Bible Societies is about thirty millions.

A horse belonging to a Mr. White, of Baltimore, made a leap at Charlestown, Va., a few days since, which is close akin to the famous leap made by Putnam's horse, in revolutionary times. Running off from fright, he encountered a mill-race 12 feet in depth, which he attempted to leap 10 feet from its edge, but striking the opposite bank with his head, dislocated his neck, fell back and expired. The distance he jumped is said to be twenty-five feet.

James Abbot, of Franklin, Me., an old man of 80, was recently killed by the falling of a tree in that town, which he had cut down, and a young man named Leander Wass, of Columbia, was killed a day or two afterwards, in the same place, from the same cause.

Some stones were found snugly packed in four bales of cotton, which lately arrived at Mobile, and which somebody had purchased at the rate that was paid for the cotton. The weight of the stones was about 30 lbs. each.

The State of Pennsylvania is about to attempt the increase of her revenues by heavy taxes on Merchants and Tavern-keepers. The latter are to pay $20 each per annum, in all cases where the yearly rental of their premises is less than $100, thence increasing $5 for every $100 of rent up to $5,000, on which the license is to be $265, with a like increase thereafter.

A man in Philadelphia, named William Rushford, who has been for some time under indictment, charged with biting off the tongue of Patrick McGuire, compromised the matter by paying the latter $5225 for the dainty mouthful.

A French journal says of the French nation, that out of a population of 33,000,000 there are 4,000,000 in rags; 20,000,000 without shoes; 18,000,000 who eat no wheat bread; 27.000,000 too poor to drink wine; and 31,000,000 without sugar and meat.

While two little boys were skating on the ice near Noble's Ferry, in Fairfield, Maine, one skating backwards and the other facing him with his hand on the other's coat-collar, and being near an open place which had not frozen over, they not perceiving their danger, both went into the hole together. No one being near, both were drowned. They were found about three hours after. They were sons of Capt. David Cain, of Clinton, who, together with his wife, is left very deeply affected—almost to despair.

Another Land-Slide is expected, in the hill back of Troy, New York. A large crack has opened, and the earth seems preparing to move—which has caused several families to beat a hasty retreat. There is a beautiful gothic cottage on the top of the hill, which will yet disappear. The hill is a deposit of gravel.

Mr. J. Morrison, of Harrisburg, Pa., has invented a new machine for making rope, by which the space occupied for making tow lines and bale ropes, will not exceed 8 feet square, and for 2 1-2 inch rope he estimates that a room 18 or 20 feet square will be quite large enough.

The contemplated railroad between Vera Cruz and Mexico, (says a correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune,) passes over no mountains, and crosses no swamps; the ascent, though great, is very gradual—not more than a yard and a quarter in every hundred—and the nature of the ground extremely favorable.

The London Literary Gazette states that Mr. Harris, of Alexandria, in Egypt, has purchased a papyrus in Greek characters, which is the oration of an accuser, apparently Hyperides, against Demosthenes, for taking the bribe, or rather embezzling the 760 talents of Aarpalus.

Mr. Robert Hoe, of this city, has made contracts to build two Printing Presses, similar to those of the New York Sun and Philadelphia Ledger, for two Paris papers. Each is to print 12,000 copies per hour. They are to be made in this city and to cost $24,000.

The merchants of Philadelphia have organized a company for a line of steamers to run between that city and Charleston, S. C. One splendid steamer called the Columbus is now nearly ready for sea, and another is to be immediately constructed.

The Milwaukie Sentinel regrets to hear that the wheat, in many parts of the Territory, has been greatly injured by the alternate thawing and freezing weather of the last two months. The early sown wheat suffered considerably from the fly, and this, added to the injury caused by the open winter, threatens to diminish very materially the amount of the coming wheat crop.

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, communicating from Constantinople, says that not less than 500,000 pounds sterling, ($2,000,000) was recently expended in the fete consequent upon the circumcision of a son of the Sultan.

The New York Tribune says that Henry, the slave in Mrs. Sprigg's boarding-house, Washington, who was sold to a slave dealer by his mistress, after he had bought himself of her, and paid her the price within a few dollars, has finally been set at liberty through the exertions of several Members of Congress. The female miscreant who sold him to himself, and then to a flesh-jobber, was made to disgorge a good part of the latter plunder. A farther sum of $180 was subscribed, and his freedom secured, until somebody shall steal and sell him again.

The Philadelphia North American says, that a daughter of Mr. Brown, on Frankford road, above Phœnix street, was found dead in her bed, having died in consequence, as is supposed, in a fit of anger with which she was affected the previous evening.

Mr. Asa Swain, of Sandbornton, N. H., was frozen to death on the 10th inst., within a short distance of his house. He had been to market at Franklin, with a load of coal, and purchased a bottle of rum, which was found in his pocket, empty.

There were shipped from New York for Europe during the first four days of the present month, 1,853 barrels of flour. Last year the amount shipped in the same time was 52,736 barrels. In corn there is a still greater falling off. The export of breadstuffs last year amounted to about $60,000,000.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

DWIGHT'S AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

THIS amusing and interesting Family Work, illustrated with many engravings, and containing an extraordinary variety and amount of valuable reading matter has closed the third volume, and subscribers to the fourth are invited. The character of this work is attested by the religious and secular press. It is warmly recommended to every family by the New York Observer, Christian Advocate, Recorder, Express, Courier, &c.

The fourth volume, (beginning with January, 1848,) will be sent in numbers of 48 pages large octavo, for $2 a year, in advance, (free of postage.) The January number will be highly illustrated with about 25 engravings, some of them large and of the finest style. Among the original matter will be the first chapter of Carlo Carbonaro, or real adventures and scenes in Italy. The history of New York Public Schools, and Mr. Squier's discovery in the Western Mounds, both with illustrations, will be also in this number.

Vols. 1, 2, and 3, (each with about 800 pages and 150 engravings,) for sale in muslin, or half bound, at $2 50 each. For $10 those three volumes, and any work in the market, not over $1 50, will be delivered at the houses of purchasers in Boston, Buffalo, Baltimore, and intermediate places, free of charge; and volume fourth will also be sent monthly, as above.

Valuable seeds sent to subscribers. Seven copies of volume four for $10; three copies for $5.

Edited by Theodore Dwight, Express office, 112 Broadway.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

ANGRY WORDS.

BY JAMES MIDDLETON.

Angry words are lightly spoken
In a rash and thoughtless hour;
Brightest links of life are broken
By their deep, insidious power;
Hearts inspired by warmest feeling,
Ne'er before by anger stirred,
Oft are rent past human healing,
By a single angry word.

Poison drops of care and sorrow,
Bitter poison drops are they,
Weaving for the coming morrow,
Saddest memories of to-day.
Angry words, O let them never
From the tongue unbridled slip;
May the heart's best impulse ever
Check them, ere they soil the lip.

Love is much too pure and holy,
Friendship is too sacred far,
For a moment's reckless folly
Thus to desolate and mar.
Angry words are lightly spoken,
Bitterest thoughts of life are stirred;
Brightest links of life are broken
By a single angry word.

CAPTURING WILD HORSES.

To illustrate the manner of capturing the wild horses, called by the Spaniards mustangs, on the prairies of Texas, we insert the following description by one who has often engaged in the exciting chase:—

"The pursuer provides himself with a strong noosed cord, made of twisted strips of green hide, which, thus prepared, is called a lazo, the Spanish word for a band or bond. He mounts a fleet horse, and fastens one end of his lazo to the animal, coils it in his left hand, leaving the extending noose to flourish in the air over his head. Selecting his game, he gives it chase; and as soon as he approaches the animal he intends to seize, he takes the first opportunity to whirl the lazo over his head, and immediately checks his own charger. The noose instantly contracts around the neck of the fugitive mustang, and the creature is thrown violently down, sometimes unable to move, and generally for the moment deprived of breath. This violent method of arrest frequently injures the poor animal, and sometimes even kills him. If he escapes, however, with his life, he becomes of great service to his master, always remembering with great respect the rude instrument of his capture, and ever after yielding immediately whenever he feels the lazo upon his neck.

"Being thus secured, the lazoed horse is blindfolded; terrible lever, jaw-breaking bits are put into his mouth, and he is mounted by a rider armed with most barbarous spurs. If the animal runs, he is spurred on to the top of his speed, until he tumbles down with exhaustion. Then he is turned about and spurred back again; and if he is found able to run back to the point whence he started, he is credited with having bottom enough to make a good horse; otherwise, he is turned off as of little or no value. This process of breaking mustangs to the bridle is a brutal one, and the poor animals often carry the evidence of it as long as they live. After service during the day, they are hoppled by fastening their fore-legs together with a cord, and turned out to feed. To fasten them to one spot in the midst of a prairie, where neither tree, nor shrub, nor rock, is to be found, is quite a problem. But that is accomplished by putting on a halter, tying a knot at the end, digging a hole about a foot deep in the earth, thrusting in the knot, and pressing the earth down around it. As the horse generally pulls nearly in a horizontal direction, he is unable to draw it out.

"When a number are caught, they are generally driven to market, where they are purchased for three or four dollars, branded, hoppled, then turned out and abandoned to themselves, until needed. At some future time they will doubtless become a valuable article of export."

BENEVOLENCE OF EUGENE SUE.

A late number of the Atlas has a sketch of the famous or infamous Eugene Sue, from the pen of Mr. Poore, who has spent several years in Paris, and who was during that time the correspondent of the Atlas. A single paragraph will illustrate the private morality of this teacher of freedom and morals:

'Not many months since, Sue used to visit almost daily, one of the most fashionable ladies in Paris, Madame de ——, and hold forth in her richly furnished boudoir on the condition of the poor. "Do you ever relieve their distress?" asked Madame de ——, at the close of the harangues. "To a trifling extent," answered Sue; "but though my gifts are small, they are always cheerfully bestowed—I give one fourth of my income in alms." That afternoon, as he left Cafe de Paris, where he had been eating a costly dinner, an apparently old woman, clad in rags, prayed for charity. "Go away," was the stern reply. "But I am starving, give me a single copper to purchase bread with." "I will give you in charge to a police officer, if you thus annoy me." "You will," said the beggar; "and yet, Monsieur Eugene Sue, you are the man who writes about the misery of the poor—you are ———." "Who are you?" exclaimed Sue. "Madame de ——," was the reply, and the disguised lady stepped into her carriage, which was in waiting, leaving the novelist to his reflections."'

ORIGIN OF THE BARBER'S POLE.

The origin of the barber's pole is to be traced to the period when the barbers were also surgeons and practical phlebotomy. To assist this operation, it being necessary for the patient to grasp a staff, a stick or a pole was always kept by the barber surgeon, together with the fillet or bandaging he used for tying the patient's arm; when the pole was not in use, the tape was tied to it, that they might be both together when wanted. On a person coming in to be bled, the tape was disengaged from the pole and bound round the arm, and the pole was put into the person's hand: after it was done with, the tape was again tied on the pole, and in this state, pole and tape were often hung at the door, for a sign or notice to passengers that they might there be bled; doubtless the competition for custom was great, because, as our ancestors were great admirers of bleeding, they demanded the operation frequently. At length, instead of hanging out the identical pole used in the operation, a pole was painted with stripes around it, in imitation of the real pole and its bandagings, and thus came the sign.

PROCESS OF COINING GOLD.

The process of coining gold is very accurately, yet succinctly described in a recent letter to the Boston Post. We condense the description as follows:—The miners have to grind the gold rock fine, keeping it wet constantly, and as it becomes fine, it washes off. They have a hard kind of stone for grinding. They then mix quicksilver with it, and that collects the gold dust. It is washed out, dried, and goes through some kind of a heating process. The gold dust is then usually sold to the superintendent of the mint. Sometimes the miners melt the dust and cast it into a bar before offering it at the mint. To find the value, each parcel has to be assayed. The assaying is the most curious and scientific of all the business in the mint. The melters take the gold dust, melt it, and cast it into a bar, then it is weighed accurately, and a piece cut off for the assayer. He takes it; melts it with twice its weight of silver, and several times its weight in lead. It is melted in some small cups made of bone-ashes, which absorb all the lead, when a large part of the silver is extracted by another process, and the sample is then rolled out to a thin shaving, coiled up and put in a sort of glass vial called a mattrass, along with some nitric acid. The mattrasses are put on a furnace, and the acid is boiled some time, poured off, a new supply put in, and boiled again. This is done several times till the acid has extracted all the silver and other mineral substances, leaving the sample pure gold. The sample is then weighed, and by the difference between the weight before assaying and after, the true value is found. The gold, after it has been assayed, is melted, refined, and being mixed with its due proportion of alloy, (equal parts of silver and copper) is drawn into long strips, in shape not unlike an iron hoop for a cask; the round pieces cut out with a sort of punch, each piece weighed, and brought to the right size by a file, if too heavy, when it is milled, or the edges, raised and put into a stamping press, whence it comes forth a perfect coin, bearing the endorsement of "U. S."

DEATH OF NAPOLEON'S EMPRESS.

We have already briefly announced the fact of the death of Napoleon's widow. No great interest is excited by the event; and yet it is important in connection with its associations with the most brilliant and momentous epoch in European history. Maria Louise, Duchess of Parma, Placentia and Guastalia, died the 9th of December, 1847. From various foreign journals, received by the Cambria, we collate the following facts and comments in relation to her:—She had lived to be very nearly the longest reigning sovereign of Europe—thirty-four years having elapsed since she exchanged for the portion of an Archduchess her share in the throne of the French empire. Her Highness was born at Vienna, Dec. 12th, 1791, the eldest daughter of Francis II., Emperor of Austria, by Maria Theresa, daughter of Ferdinand IV, King of Sicily. Her marriage to Napoleon, took place the second of April, 1810—the most brilliant epoch in the career of that illustrious soldier. Paris was then the capital of an European empire. The spoils of all European nations, save one, formed the circle of the Imperial Court. And yet within four brief years, this mighty power passed away like a meteoric splendor. The Emperor departed an exile from France, and his Austrian bride became sovereign of the little Duchy of Parma.

"Her fitter place was by St. Helena's wave;
Her only throne was in Napoleon's grave!"

The only child of Maria Louise by Bonaparte, was a son, the late Duke of Reichstadt, born March 20th, 1811, who died unmarried at the palace of Schoenbrunns, near Vienna, 22d July, 1832. At the Congress of Vienna, Maria Louisa was chaperoned by the Duke of Wellington, a circumstance which is alluded to by Byron in these lines:

"Yes! the right arm, yet red from Waterloo,
Which cut her lord's half-shattered sceptre through,
Is offered and accepted! Could a slave
Do more? or less? And HE in his new grave!
Her eyes, her cheek, betray no inward strife,
And the ex-empress grows as EX a wife.
So much for human ties in royal breasts!
Why spare men's feelings when their own are jests?"

CULTURE OF THE CRANBERRY.

The first Cranberries were cultivated in England, by the late Sir Joseph Banks, who, in 1813 produced 3 1-2 bushels from a bed eighteen feet square. S. Bates of Billingham, Mass. has cultivated this fruit for years on dry soil with the utmost success—the fruit being double the usual size. Mr. B.'s method is to plow his land—strike out drills twenty inches apart, into which he puts a quantity of swamp muce—then sets out the plants in these drills four or five inches apart—hoeing them the first season. Capt. Henry Hall, of Barnstable, has cultivated this fruit twenty years. He spreads on his swampy ground a quantity of sand or gravel to kill the grass—then digs shallow holes four feet apart each way, and sets in sods of cranberries ten or twelve inches square. Mr. Gardner has cultivated on Nantucket Island. He selects ground that will keep rather moist throughout the season; takes off the top soil two inches deep—(an easier method would be to plow the land four or five inches deep, completely turning over the furrow;)—he then plows and harrows the ground—strikes out drills twenty inches apart—enriches with swamp muck, and sets out the plants four inches apart in the drills. Others are set out in hills, by putting a small sod of vines four feet apart each way. By any of the above methods no cultivation is needed after the first year, and in two or three years the vines completely cover the ground. Rakes are made in Massachusetts for gathering Cranberries, with which one man gathers fifty bushels in a day. When Cranberries are to be shipped to Europe or Asia, put them in new tight casks, and fill up with water; they will arrive in perfect order. During a winter as mild as the present, the land might be put in order, and the plants put into the ground, at any time from the opening of spring until the tenth of May.

Houses for Laborers.—A society exists in Edinburgh for promoting the comfort of the working classes. A large piece of land is bought in the suburbs, which is covered with suitable buildings; watered, and drained from central reservoirs. All things (land and materials) are bought at wholesale for ready money, and the best machinery, with steam power, is used. The work is also pushed most actively when labor is in the least request. In this way a saving of fully one half is effected in the cost of a dwelling over the usual expense to the poor, who pay exorbitant rates for lots or ground-rent, and for credit on material. Some 10,000 working-men belong to the Association, each of whom pays a monthly contribution. The houses, at low comparative rents, pay full interest, so as to induce capitalists, from other than benevolent motives, to contribute largely to the fund. Every contributor receives his share of the rentals, and when he desires to buy (for his own use only) he is entitled to his choice of unsold houses at nearly the cost price, payable in very small monthly installments. By this plan, instead of small rooms in dirty alleys and courts, good sized, well lighted and ventilated rooms are provided, with wide streets, and cheap omnibus conveyance to the town; the cost to the working-man is less than one-half of the usual rate paid by the laboring classes in the old way.

WILD MAN OF AFRICA.

There is yet another inhabitant of the woods by the Gaboon river, more to be feared than the African boa; it is the wild man of the woods,—not the ourang outang, though an immense ape,—always acting on the offensive, and ready to attack man. The bones of his extremities are larger than those of an ordinary sized, full grown man. I have examined them here, and whilst contemplating the skull, the jaws, and their terrible apparatus, really experienced a sort of shuddering. The canine teeth are upwards of two inches long, and of proportionate bulk. There is a ridge running from the top of the nose backwards over the crown of the head; to this is affixed a muscle, by which the living animal draws backwards and forwards a most frightful crest of stiff hairs; when enraged, or purposing to inflict injury, he erects them and draws the crest forwards over his large glaring eyes, and utters most hideous yells at the same time. Nothing seems to intimidate him. Sometimes he advances with boughs of trees broken off for the purpose of concealing his approach and attack, and suddenly grasping the legs of the human being, brings him instantly to the ground, breaks his bones by blows of his mighty arms and hands, and tears the flesh by his monstrous teeth. The native huntsman who goes in search or meets with him whilst pursuing less formidable animals, has learned that the safest way to engage is to act quite on the defensive; to let the monster draw near, when he will immediately seize the end of the muzzle of the gun (ready cocked and presented) between his teeth. Instantly it must be discharged; if the man either delays till the ape has compressed the barrel so as to close it, or fails to give a mortal wound, wo be to him; his doom is sealed. [Dr. Prince.

Precautions for Louis Phillipe's Protection.—One of the saddest circumstances which exist in France is the extraordinary precaution which it is considered necessary to take for the safety of the king. There are, for example, five large barracks, each occupied by regiments of elite in the immediate vicinity of the Tuilleries, and eighteen guard houses, each of which is continually occupied by 250 armed national guards of the infantry battalions, and 25 men of the regiment of horse. There are, besides, 350 soldiers of the line, and a troop of 50 men of a cavalry regiment. At nine o'clock at night, a detachment, composed of four companies, takes its station in the centre of the palace, and remains all night with loaded arms; 90 sentinels with loaded arms, keep watch in and around the palace during the night, besides which, patrols and detachments visit every part of the palace and gardens every half hour; 55 of the attendants in the gardens, and of the domestics of the royal household, mount guard in the royal apartments during every night, armed with double-bareled guns. In addition to all this multitude, there is a number of police agents, aides-de-camp, adjutants, &c., continually on duty. A secret passage leads from the palace to one of the nearest barracks, and some of the guard houses are provided with ladders, to enable the soldiers to enter the palace at any moment. Madam—Most worthy of estimation, after long consideration and much meditation, on the great reputation you possess in the nation, I have a strong inclination to become your relation, and on your approbation of this declaration, I shall make preparation to remove my situation to a more convenient station, to profess my admiration, and if such obligation is worthy of observation, and can obtain commiseration, it will be an aggrandization beyond all calculation, of the joy and exultation, of Yours, &c., Samuel Dissimmulation.

Sir—I perused your oration, with much deliberation, and a little consternation, at the great infatuation, of your weak imagination, to show such veneration on so slight a foundation; but after examination, and serious contemplation, I supposed your animation was the fruit of recreation, or had sprung from ostentation, to display your education by an odd enumeration or rather multiplication of words of the same termination though of great variation in each respective signification. Now without disputation, your laborious application to so tedious an occupation deserves commemoration, and thinking immutation a sufficient gratification, I am without hesitation, Yours, &c.,

Words of Wisdom.—Sir Robert Hall, in an address delivered in 1823, to the inhabitants of Leicester, England, on the subject of Slavery in the West India Islands, used the following memorable words, which are equally applicable to this country:—

"Let us not be discouraged, if in this great enterprise our efforts are not immediately crowned with success. The slave trade, be it remembered, was long upheld by a combination of private interests, in opposition to the remonstrances of reason, humanity, and religion; but it fell at last. Such unquestionably will be the fate of slavery. It may, like its twin brother, be supported for a time by that great obstruction to all enlightened legislation, the opposition of interested individuals, who may obscure truth by sophistry, and intimidate justice by a formidable array of influence; but it is one of the felicities of a free country, that nothing can be permanent which will not sustain the ordeal of inquiry and the shock of discussion."

VARIETY.

A ragged urchin, with a basket of flat-iron holders upon his arm, made his way into the Council Chamber, at Boston, while the Governor's Council were in session, and with perfect nonchalence, marched up to the Governor and offered his wares for sale. The Governor, pleased with the honest simplicity and business turn of the boy, treated him very kindly, and purchased one of his articles. The boy then went to each of the councillors, and most of them bought one, and some of them two of the useful appendages to the kitchen. Having supplied the Honorable Council in his line, the embryo merchant retired, apparently much pleased with his adventure. It is presumed that the boy was sent there by some wag.

Mr. Rowland Hill, on being told that it was expected he should take notice of some unhandsome things which had been publicly said of him, said that he did not consider it necessary to enter into any vindication of himself; and, he added, "I have now lived a great many years in the world, and have passed through much of evil report and good report, and I have arrived at this conclusion, that no man can possibly do me any harm except myself.

The Roman Catholic Canadians are very fond of playing cards. During Lent, the priests will not allow them to play for money; but as they must have something for a stake, what do you think they do? Why, instead of money, they play for prayers! The person who loses is to repeat a certain number of prayers, and the merit of these prayers is to go to the man who wins the game. Nay, further, the loser is not obliged to do this drudgery himself—there are old women to be found, who, for a shilling a dozen, will repeat the prayers for him.

Franklin, when he was Ambassador to France, being at a meeting of a literary society, and not well understanding the French when declaimed, determined to applaud when he saw a lady of his acquaintance express satisfaction. When they had ceased, his little child said to him—"Why, grandpa, you always applauded the loudest when they were praising you." The old man laughed heartily, and explained the matter.

A person was by order of a judge, discharged from Reading jail, England, after having been imprisoned nearly seven years for a debt of £10, increased by costs to about £39. He refused to avail himself of the insolvent debtor's act to obtain his liberation. This reminds us of another and still worse case, of which we have read. After the passage of the insolvent law in England, in 1794, among the prisoners released was a farmer who had remained in custody eleven years, for the cost of an action in which he failed, for having killed a hare on his own grounds!

Abraham Lincoln, Member of Congress from Illinois, is described as a tall, raw-boned, thin, and dark-complexioned man, six feet four inches high. He made his debut in the House in a speech on the war, and displayed the rapidity of utterance, abundance of gesture, and striking figurative language, which are common to western men. Speaking of military glory, he said: "Military glory is a rainbow which rises in the heavens and dazzles with its luster, but it comes forth from the clouds of desolated cities and showers of human blood!"

Persons unacquainted with the art of typemaking, says the Anglo Saxon, would be surprised to hear that there are not more than three men in the United States acknowledged by type-founders and printers to be good type-cutters, and there are not ten men in the Union who ever pretend to cut type. The type cutting is a very difficult art to acquire. There are many trades and professions which any one of moderate capacity can acquire so as to be tolerably useful in them. It is not so, however, with type-cutting.

A large number of vessels are now employed in conveying saw-dust to Charlestown, Mass. It is designed for packing ice at Charlestown and Cambridge, the great sources of the ice trade for almost the whole world. A respectable income is now derived at several places in Massachusetts from the sale of pine saw-dust for this purpose, and the transportation gives employment to considerable tonnage.

A correspondent of Mann's Family Physician states that a son of Capt. Charles Morse, of Norridgewock, 12 years of age, weighs 194 3-4 pounds! He stands 5 feet high—measures 1 foot 8 1-2 inches across the shoulders, 3 feet 11 inches round the hips—the arm is 1 foot 2 inches in circumference above the elbow, thigh 2 feet 1 inch, and the leg 1 foot and 6 inches.

Mrs. Lanman of Norwich, Ct., widow of the late Judge Lanman, was burned to death on the 11th inst. by her clothes taking fire at the grate. She was about 70 years of age. She left four children by a former marriage, of whom Park Benjamin, Esq. of this City, is one. The circle of her family connections is large; and among the poor and needy, to whom she was a true friend, her death will be sincerely mourned.

At the new blacksmith's shop, Washington Navy Yard, they are putting up a new steam hammer composed of a solid block of iron weighing 16,000 lbs. The bed in which this is to be placed weighs 10,000—making the weight of the hammer when completed 26,000 pounds.

A company of missionaries recently embarked at London for various stations in the Pacific. Among the items of the cargo, were 5,000 copies of the Scriptures in Tahitian, and 4,000 Pilgrim's Progress. Also a large quantity of Bibles and Tracts, printing materials, and an iron chapel.

On Sunday, a lady called to her little boy, who was playing marbles on the side-walk, to come into the house. "Don't you know you should'nt be out there, my son? Go into the back yard, if you want to play marbles—it is Sunday." "Well, yes. But ain't it Sunday in the back yard too, mother?"

Two young blockheads, named James P. Goode and Francis Deshagon, with "respectable connections," shot at each other four times near Farmville, Va. on the 4th inst. The last shot took effect in Goode's breast, and he is not expected to recover. Deshagon is in jail.

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

EXTRACTS FROM MISSIONARY LETTERS.

We make very full extracts from the communications of our missionaries, even to minute details concerning their household arrangements, &c. Our apology for bringing all these minutiæ before the public, is the necessity of having our people thoroughly informed in reference to the expense of sustaining the cause, and the deep interest felt by all of them in regard to the missionaries, with whom they are, most of them, personally acquainted. In a more advanced stage of our operations, it may not be necessary to be so full.

BELOVED BRETHREN,—I now have the pleasure of informing you, that I have obtained a house in this city, and am now occupying it. I took possession of it on the last day of June. You may be surprised to learn that I have got a large, commodious house, and paid the rent in advance. But I will explain. After I had come to a decision to make this city our station, it was a matter of necessity that I should obtain some house. The London Mission took me in and bade me welcome to stay until I could obtain a house. I spent about three weeks, during which time a pretty thorough search was made. Only three could I find, besides the one I am in. One of these is on the foreign ground, pleasantly located, but quite small for all of us. It is built after the European style, and the rent is $400 a year. Rent is very high on the grounds allotted to the British. Another is a new house close by two of our American missionaries, (Bishop Boone and Mr. Lyle.) This is a Chinese house, and would require at least $200 expense to make it comfortable. The rent would be $320. Another is a house nearly finished in the native style, and smaller than the last mentioned. The rooms were well arranged for our two little families, and I felt strongly inclined to take it. It is situated at the southern extremity of the suburbs. The rent would have been probably $130. The owner asked $160. But afterwards I ascertained that he would have taken less. But there was one little circumstance that prevented me from taking this house; it was only one story high, and the ground rooms are too damp. Besides, it would have required at least $100 additional expense to make it comfortable. The fitting up would have consisted in putting ceiling overhead under the tile roof, to prevent being baked in summer, and frozen in winter, and in putting in glass windows. In two-story houses, besides this, the side walls have to be thickened with brick and ceiling. The house that I have taken is in a better location than either of the others. It is sufficiently removed from all the other missionaries, is in a part of the city as densely populated perhaps as any, and yet a little retired from any of the principal business streets. It is already fitted up sufficiently for one family; i. e. one sitting-room, two large bed-rooms, and one small study, are fitted up. There is a chimney and grate in the sitting-room. The grate I have put in. There is a great abundance of rooms in the house, and it may be necessary to fit one or two small lower rooms. All that would be required for them would be glass windows. The rent of this house is $170, a year. In addition, I had to pay the go-between-man—(I have not seen the owner)—$6. I also had to pay for the kitchen fixtures $5, so that the house this year costs $181. The grate $1, makes $182. Upon the whole, this is the cheapest house I could get, even for the first year. It is more spacious and airy than either of the others; and prospectively it contains one other advantage, which is not often found in a Chinese house. It has one ground room, about 20 feet by 30, which, with a trifling expense might be used as a chapel. And we hope to need one in two years. And I presume we can keep the house as long as it is desirable to keep it. The Chinese believe this house to be haunted. Hence no Chinaman will rent it, and the rent is brought down to about one half of what it otherwise would be. It is a more costly house than the one Bishop Boone occupies, for which he pays $400. It is said that a man was strangled in this house a few years since. This is the origin of the notion that it is haunted. The greatest difficulty I find with it yet, is, that it is haunted with fleas. The former occupant kept two or three dogs around him. But my servant is making fearful battle with these troublesome occupants. Although there is much room in the house, there is but little of it available at present. But amidst acres of tile roofs, it is some relief in summer, to have some open space to let the air circulate. The best we can do, it is much more oppressive in the city during the summer months than it is out. Hence the London Mission have located themselves out on the British grounds. It is also cheaper in the long run to get a piece of land out and build. But they must have their chapels in the city. Considering all the advantages this house combines, I regard it very fortunate that I have got it, especially as I could get no other so cheaply.

Dear Brethren,—I trust, you will not fail to mark the kind dealings of our Heavenly Father towards us. 1st. We had a very prosperous voyage from New York to Hongkong. 2d. We met with a kind reception there; even strangers showing us no small favor; which I consider special providences of God in behalf of our infant mission. 3d. A prosperous voyage to this place. 4th. Hospitality and kindness here. 5th. The concurrence of circumstances connected with obtaining a house. 6th. Chinese superstition making available to us a house and location so desirable as this. Putting all these things together, and comparing them with what the Bible teaches in reference to God's care for his people and for his cause, it does appear to me that his hand and his counsel are in this matter. And if God be for us it is of little consequence who is against us; the work will go forward, and the mission will prosper.

I hope the kindness and mercy of our God towards us will excite both you and us, and all the friends of the cause, to gratitude and praise. And I hope we may keep steadily before us the great object of our coming here. It would seem to be difficult to lose sight of it, while we see on every side of us a teeming population who have no knowledge of the God that made them, nor of the only name under heaven given among men, whereby they must be saved. Nay, it must be impossible to lose sight of our object in coming here, if we daily hear from an idol temple within fifty yards of us, the sound of a great drum, or of a huge bell, both of which are occasionally struck for the purpose of awakening the attention of their stupid gods to their stupid worship. Never before was I placed in circumstances which impressed me so thoroughly with the conviction of the importance and urgency of the charge given by our Saviour to his disciples just before he ascended up on high; for, although heathenism is seen in this city in its mildest aspect, yet enough of its bewildering, beclouding, and benumbing influence may be seen even here to excite the earnest desire to communicate to them the word of eternal life. Even while I am writing, the bell is sounding, and two or three guns have just been fired, I suppose for the same purpose. But who is competent to the task of remodeling the moral character of these fallen ones? Learning may toil for it, but it will toil in vain. There is no intrinsic regenerating power in learning or labor, at home or abroad, if separate from the Spirit of the Lord. Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord. Whatever means, therefore, are put into requisition, it must be in habitual reliance on the power and grace of God. And this is my concern, that we may be assisted to do as instruments just what his wisdom has dictated to be done by human instrumentality, and then we may confidently expect his blessing to attend our efforts. But the inquiry arises, how much does this imply on our part? To what extent does it please God to use human sympathy and labor and faithfulness in this great enterprise of redeeming the lost? If a life of complete consecration to the service of God, embracing the most heroic self-denial, the enduring of greatest contradiction of sinners against himself, and the offering up of prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears—if such a life be the example set for us, can we expect to succeed well in a course essentially different? Now that God has fixed our station here in this promising field, I hope we may labor with all our might to fulfill the good pleasure of his will in directing us to this place.

PRAYER AND TRADE.

Rev. Mr. Hume, a missionary at Bombay, says that there are about twenty-five thousand Parsees, or followers of Zoroaster, in Bombay, and that they constitute the most intelligent, enterprising and wealthy class of the native population.

A few days ago I had occasion to go into the shop of a Parsee, with whom I am considerably acquainted. It was in the afternoon, and I found him standing on the steps of his shop, with his face toward the setting sun, busily engaged in repeating his prayers. Many people were passing along the street just before him; but this seemed to cause him no concern, unless when he had occasion to bow to some acquaintance. When I turned to enter his shop, he gave me a very cordial salutation, bowing and waving his hand for me to enter, but all the time repeating his prayers as rapidly as ever. Perceiving that no one was present in the shop to attend to me, he clapped his hands several times, making a loud noise, the object of which seemed to be well understood by the family, as his son, a young man of twenty years of age, came running into the shop.

I asked him the price of the article which I had come to purchase; when he, being in doubt, went and inquired of his father, who, with the fore finger of the right hand, wrote upon the palm of the other the price to be charged. The young man then came back and told what his father had said; but the price being extravagant, I objected to it, and told him what I would give. The young man, not feeling at liberty to act on his own responsibility, went and reported my offer to his father, who shook his head, and again wrote on his hand, as before, a sum considerably less than that first mentioned. The young man again came and stated the price now asked; which being still very unreasonable, I was about to leave, but said I would give him the sum offered at first, if he chose to take it.

The young man again hastened to his father with my offer, and as he shook his head at this, I passed out another door, leaving him repeating his prayers as busily as ever. While I remained, he appeared much interested in what was passing in the shop; and although praying with his face in an opposite direction, he every moment turned so far about as to catch a glance of us, and observe what we were doing.

The person here mentioned is a shrewd, intelligent business man; but alas, how blind in regard to spiritual matters! He readily acknowledged that we were indebted to God for every thing; but I have often seen him, early in the morning, bowing reverently to the different articles in his shop, muttering over something at the same time. This is done from a superstitious belief that it may secure good prices and prosperous business.

BY OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

Blest be that spot, where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire;
Blest that abode, where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair;
Blest be those feasts with simple plenty crowned,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jests or pranks that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale;
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good.

SINGULAR EFFICACY OF SOCIAL PRAYER.

A clergyman, who was not very remarkable for his zeal in the cause of his Divine Master, while traveling, not many months ago, in a certain section of this State, stopped for a night in a place where there was an extensive revival of religion. After resting for a short time at the inn, his curiosity to view the place led him to stroll through the streets. He had not proceeded far on his evening ramble, before his ear was arrested by the voice of prayer. He paused and listened, and finding that the voice issued from a retired and humble dwelling by the road-side, stranger as he was, he resolved to enter. On entering, he found himself unexpectedly surrounded by a band of disciples assembled for special prayer. He cast his eye about upon the little group, in a vain endeavor to find some one whom he could recognize as an acquaintance; but all were strangers in person, though brethren in Christ. Collecting his wandering thoughts, he bowed himself in the humble attitude of prayer, and, to his infinite surprise, he soon discovered that himself, by name, and the people of his charge, were the subjects of ardent and importunate supplication. The person who was leading their devotions, was an entire stranger to him, and yet he seemed to wrestle in spirit with God, that he might be aroused to greater faithfulness and zeal in his ministerial duties and private devotions, and that God would prepare him to become instrumental in reviving his work in the church and congregation over whom he was placed as a spiritual watchman. After the meeting had closed, being deeply impressed with the guilt of his past negligence, and with the responsibility of the ministerial office, he silently withdrew and returned to his lodgings. Not long after this event, he returned to his people, and resumed, with renewed vigor, the duties of his office. Within a short time, a revival commenced in his congregation, and three hundred were early numbered as the hopeful subjects of redeeming mercy. The revivals in both mentioned places still continue.

THE EVENING OF LIFE.

BY THOLUCK.

"O DEATH! how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, to him that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things: yea, unto him that is yet able to receive meat," saith the son of Sirach. Yes! and by what expedient do such men try to overcome thy bitterness? Oh! when I see them, like some beaten foe, who retreats from fence to fence behind the last intrenchment; driven now from the joyous revelry of youth, and anon from manhood's keen enjoyments, until they are reduced, at last, to solicit a faint gratification from stimulating, perhaps, a languid palate. Oh! when I see them, like the worm which cleaves to the withered leaf, feeding on the wan and shadowy remembrance of days never to return, and trying whether it may do them any good to forget that which they now no more can change,—how do I then, with my whole soul, exclaim, Thanks be to Jesus Christ, my Lord, who hath delivered me from the bondage of this corruptible world! The poet says—

"Taught by some impulse from on high, men's minds
Suspect the coming danger, as we see
The waters heave before the approaching storm."

But of you it may be said—

"They hear the wild winds lash the bursting sails,
At every joint the shivering vessel creaks,
But strike they will not, and go blindly down."

How sweet, O death, is the thought of thee to the man who could never find a satisfying portion here below, but who, even amidst this fleeting life, still lived and leaned upon the promises of that which is everlasting! I do not quail before thy scythe; it can cut off nothing which I am not willing to leave behind, that the wings of my spirit may bear me unencumbered away. Old Age, for him who has a Saviour, thy rosy evening changes so insensibly into dawn, that there is scarce a night between!

Yes, I will set my house in order; the task will not be difficult. The best of my property I take along with me. I leave my children to the great Father of the fatherless, to whom belong heaven and earth. My body I bequeath to the earth, and my soul to the Lord. He has sued for it longer than my life, and he bought it with his blood. Thus, I lay every weight aside, and am ready for the journey. When the traveler has paid his debts in the city of a foreign land, how does he exult to pass the gate, as he bends his steps homeward. I have no more a single creditor upon earth, and I know I shall find none in the place to which I go. Oh, it is a blessed thing to die, when we can say, with Hezekiah, "Behold, for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption: for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back." Yes, old men, the blessed thistle is an herb of precious use. It soothes the aching of the heart. But beside the cross of Jesus there grows a plant that is fairer still, and has a juster claim to be called Hearts-ease. Nothing like it alleviates the bitter pangs that precede the hour of dissolution!

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATED.

BISHOP BUTLER.—This worthy prelate, when on his death bed, having sent for his chaplain, observed, that though he had endeavored to avoid sin and please God, yet from the consciousness which he felt of perpetual infirmities, he was still afraid to die.

"My lord," said the chaplain, "you have forgotten that Jesus Christ is a Saviour." "True," was the answer, "but how shall I know He is a Saviour for me?" "My lord, it is written, Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." "True," replied the bishop, with admiration; "and I am surprised that, though I have read that Scripture a thousand times over, I never felt its virtue till this moment, and now I die happy."

PSALM xxxii: 37—Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace.

THE MIMIC TAKEN OFF.—A Mr. Madan, who had been educated for the bar, being a great mimic, was one evening desired by some wicked companions to go and hear the Rev. John Wesley, who, they were told, was to preach in the neighborhood, and then return and exhibit his manner and discourse for their entertainment. Accordingly he went to the meeting with this intention, when, just as he entered the place, Mr. Wesley named his text, "Prepare to meet thy God," with a solemnity of accent that struck the young man very forcibly, inspiring a seriousness which continued to increase as the good man proceeded in exhorting his hearers to repentance. On returning from the meeting, Mr. M. was accosted by his acquaintances, "Have you taken off the old Methodist?" "No, gentlemen," he replied, "but he has taken me off!" And from that time he left their company, associated with serious people, was soon converted, and afterwards became a useful minister of the Gospel.

I COR. xiv: 24, 25—But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all; and thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so, falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

PATIENCE UNDER REPROOF.—Tasso, the celebrated author of "Jerusalem Delivered," when informed by his physician that he must soon die, thanked him for the tidings, and expressed much gratitude that he was soon to be brought safe into port, after so long a storm. When his last moment arrived, he calmly said, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit, O Lord;" but expired before the sentence was finished.

It is recorded of him, that "there never was a scholar more humble, a wit more devout, or a man more amiable in society." When he had extended his reputation throughout Italy, by his celebrated poem, his father, fearing that it might seduce him from more advantageous studies, was greatly vexed, and went to him and remonstrated against his devoting himself to philosophy and poetry, making use of many very harsh expressions. The old gentleman's anger being heightened by the patience of Tasso, he at length exclaimed, "Of what use is that philosophy on which you value yourself so much?" "Sir," replied Tasso, "it has enabled me to bear the harshness of your rebuke."

PROV. xix: 11—The discretion of a man deferreth his anger; and it is his glory to pass over a transgression.

REMARKABLE RESIGNATION.—When the Duke of Burgundy, the illustrious and promising pupil of Archbishop Fenelon, lay dead in his coffin, and the nobles of his court, in all the pomp of silent sadness, stood weeping around, the archbishop came into the apartment, and having fixed his eyes on the corpse, broke out at length in terms to this effect:—"There lies my beloved prince, for whom I cherished an affection equal to the tenderest regard of the tenderest parent. Nor were my affections lost; he loved me, in return, with all the ardor of a son. There he lies, and all my worldly happiness lies dead with him. But if the turning of a straw would call him back to life, I would not for ten thousand worlds be the turner of that straw in opposition to the will of God."

JOB i: 21—The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away blessed be the name of the Lord.

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE.—Among the prisoners taken captive at the battle of Waterloo, there was a Highland piper. Napoleon, struck with his mountain dress and sinewy limbs, asked him to play on his instrument, which is said to sound delightfully in the glens and mountains of Scotland. "Play a pibroch," said Napoleon, and the Highlander played it. "Play a march;" it was done. "Play a retreat." "Na, na," said the Highlander, "I never learned to play a retreat!" No retreat! should be the motto emblazoned on the standard of every Christian warrior, as he goes forth to battle, "not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

EPHES. vi: 13—Wherefore, take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand.

PINKNEY AND EMMET.

The Knickerbocker for the past month has the following anecdote of the two eminent persons named above. Where sarcasm, invective and severity of denunciation are regarded as the characteristics of eloquence, the lesson which the subjoined narrative conveys, may operate as a useful corrective:—

"We do not know when we have encountered a more forcible exemplification of the truth, that 'a soft answer turneth away wrath,' than is afforded in the ensuing anecdote: On one occasion, in the Supreme Court of the United States, the eloquent Irish exile, Mr. Emmet, and the distinguished orator, Mr. Pinkney, were on opposite sides in an important cause, and one which the latter had much at heart. In the course of the argument he traveled out of the cause to make observations personal and extremely offensive, on Mr. Emmet, with a view probably of irritating him and weakening his reply. Mr. Emmet sat quiet and endured it all. It seemed to have sharpened his intellect, without having irritated his temper. When the argument was through, he said, 'Perhaps he ought to notice the remarks of the opposite counsel, but this was a species of warfare in which he had the good fortune to have little experience, and one in which he never dealt. He was willing that his learned opponent should have all the advantage he promised himself from the display of his talents in that way. When he came to this country he was a stranger, and was happy to say, that from the bar generally, and the court universally, he had experienced nothing but politeness, and even kindness. He believed the court would do him the justice to say, that he had said or done nothing in this cause to merit a different treatment. He had always been accustomed to admire and even reverence the learning and eloquence of Mr. Pinkney, and he was the last man from whom he should have expected personal observations of the sort the court had just witnessed. He had been in early life taught by the highest authority, not to return railing for railing. He would only say, that he had been informed that the learned gentleman had filled the highest office his country could bestow at the court of St. James. He was very sure that he had not learned his breeding in that school.'

"The court and the bar were delighted; for Mr. Pinkney was apt to be occasionally a little too over-bearing. When we take into consideration the merit of resistance against the natural impulse of a warm Irish temperament, we must admire still more the manner adopted by Mr. Emmet. Mr. Pinkney, as we gather from Wheaton's Life of that gentleman, afterwards tendered the most ample and generous apology. 'The manner,' said he, 'in which Mr. Emmet has replied, reproaches me by its forbearance and urbanity, and could not fail to hasten the repentance which reflection alone would have produced; and which I am glad to have so public an occasion of avowing. I offer him a gratuitous and cheerful atonement; cheerful, because it puts me to rights with myself, and because it is tendered not to ignorance and presumption, but to the highest worth, intellect, and morals, enhanced by such eloquence as few may hope to equal; to an interesting stranger whom adversity has tried, and affliction struck severely to the heart; to an exile whom any country might be proud to receive, and every man of a generous temper would be ashamed to offend.'"

THE BIBLE HONORED WHERE KNOWN.

Among men of education and talents, those who have been known as enemies of the Bible have, for the most part, unhesitatingly acknowledged their ignorance of its contents, or at least that they were not familiar with its pages; while the invariable testimony of all who have candidly studied it, has been in favor of its claims to divine authority, and to the sublimity, purity, and wisdom of its precepts. The testimony following will be very generally respected:—

The venerable John Quincy Adams recently stated to a friend, that ever since he was thirty years old he had been accustomed, among the first things, to read the Bible every morning. With few interruptions, he has followed the practice over half a century.

The late Hon. Samuel Hubbard, also, of Boston, says the American Messenger, had a remarkable acquaintance with the Bible. He had a large Bible class of young men; and in the conversations and discussions which arose, would quote a verse from memory, and add, "I think you will find it in ——," naming the chapter and verse; and the reference would be found invariably correct. Such a knowledge of the Scriptures could have been obtained only by long and faithful study.

MATERNAL AUTHORITY.

"Mary, let that book alone," says a mother to her little daughter, who is trying to pull the Bible from the table. "Let it alone."

Mary stops for a moment, and then takes hold of the book again. Pretty soon the mother sees that Mary is still playing with the Bible. "Did you not hear me tell you to let that book alone? Why don't you obey?" Mary stops for a moment, but is soon again at her forbidden amusement. By and by, down comes the Bible on the floor. Up jumps the mother, and hastily gives the child a blow, exclaiming, "there, obey me next time." The child screams, the mother picks up the Bible, saying, "I wonder my children do not obey me better." Is it strange that a child thus managed should be disobedient? There is no more effectual way of teaching a child disobedience, than by giving commands which you have no intention of enforcing. The mother who first coaxes, then threatens; then pretends to punish; then punishes a little; is only making trouble for herself and sorrow for her family.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 2, 1848.

CHRISTIANITY MISREPRESENTED BY CHRISTIANS.

Smith, in his "Consular Cities of China," recently republished in this country, tells a good many stories illustrative of the influence exerted, by the representatives of Christian nations in China. The testimony of A-tuh, "a smart, intelligent, well-educated man," ought to be read and pondered by all. According to Mr. Smith, he "spoke of the insolent treatment to which the Chinese residents were exposed from the police of Hong Kong, and the Europeans generally, and became much excited when he spoke of a recent indignity which his father had suffered. He said the English had always been overbearing toward his countrymen; and until they showed a kinder spirit toward them, Christianity would never be respected. Especially, continued he, since the war the Chinese generally hate the English to a much greater degree than ever before, as they have done so much greater mischief. On this account, they are more disinclined than formerly to listen to Christian doctrines, thinking that if Englishmen are Christians, it cannot be a good religion which permits them to be so insolent and mischievous." The father of A-tuh, Leang-Afa, confirmed this by his own testimony. "On my asking him," says Mr. Smith, "what were the principal obstacles to missionary success, he replied, "The Chinaman's heart is very hard; they will listen to European missionaries, and not bring objections till they have departed. But to me, they will address remarks of this kind:—'Perhaps this English doctrine may be very good; but we wish that you would first try it on the English themselves, for they are wicked men. WHEN THIS DOCTRINE HAS MADE THEM BETTER, THEN COME AND SPEAK TO US.'"

THE MORMONS.

The privations and sufferings of the Mormons since they left Nauvoo, the site of their temple to go farther west, have been almost unparalleled. It seems, however, that they have at length found a resting-place, where they hope for quiet. From a circular addressed to the members of the Nauvoo Church, by the twelve Mormon apostles, we learn that their principal abiding place hereafter, is to be in the valley of the great Salt Lake, and, if they succeed according to their expectations, their central position between the Pacific and the Mississippi, their numbers and united prospects, will give them an importance that they have not been able to attain in the United States. Their numbers will be greatly increased this season. It is confidently asserted, by those who ought to know, that at least 20,000 persons are in expectation of joining the church during this summer. The number of their members, and the extent and industry of their system of proselyting, exceeds the belief of those not informed of their real operations. No sect has ever sprung up that could boast of the same number of members within the same space of time. They have, notwithstanding the opposition which they have encountered, pushed their missionaries and preachers into every continent, and many of the islands of the sea, and have made proselytes everywhere. Their progress has been as incredible as their belief is absurd. The present site of their church, in the midst of mountains on the margin of the great Salt Lake, and cut off on all sides from other settlements by a belt of sterile and mountainous country of nearly five hundred miles in breadth, gives to their present position and enterprise a novelty which will attract hundreds to them; and they confidently look forward, within a very short period, to the formation of a large and powerful settlement at that place.

ECCLESIASTICAL QUESTION—JUDICIAL DECISION.

A case was tried some weeks ago, in the Supreme Court of New York, which involves important church interests. It seems that while Rev. John Maffit was under the discipline of the Methodist Church, Rev. Mr. Green, pastor of the Centenary Methodist Church in Brooklyn, assisted him to evade certain disciplinary proceedings. For doing so, Mr. Green was suspended from his ministry one year, by the New York Annual Conference, and a new pastor appointed in his place. Subsequently Mr. G. resigned his connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church; and the Centenary Church, having done the same thing, gave him a call to become their pastor, which he accepted. When the pastor appointed by the Conference went to take possession of the parsonage and the church, he was met with a refusal, on the ground that the church had withdrawn from the Conference, and denied its jurisdiction; hence proceedings in law were instituted. After a full hearing of the case, the Court gave the following decision:—

That the itinerancy of their preachers is a well established rule of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and that their practice of enforcing that itinerancy by means of the Bishop's stationing the preachers, without consulting their wishes or those of the congregation, is not contrary to law. That the Centenary M. E. Church in Brooklyn, having been organized in connection with that Society at large, is bound, so long as the connection continues, by the 'Doctrines and Discipline' laid down for the government of the Church.

That their meeting-house and parsonage, having been built by contributions from Methodists generally, and for the use of a Methodist Episcopal congregation, it is not in the power of the trustees to divert them to any other purpose, or to withdraw them from the subordination which was voluntarily assumed at the establishment of the Society.

It is no excuse for the trustees, that their action has been sanctioned or governed by a majority of the males now worshiping in that house, it being their only duty to see that the temporalities of the Society are faithfully devoted to the uses intended by those whose benevolence founded and endowed the Church.

That they erred in refusing admission to the relator as their preacher. That it is the duty and has been the practice of this Court to enforce the rights thus established, and that with regard to ministerial offices and corporations, it is competent for this Court not only to direct them to act, but the manner in which they shall act. Therefore a peremptory mandamus must be awarded, commanding the defendants to admit the relator to their pulpit and parsonage.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP—NO. 2.

Having in my former communication examined the effects and influences of Odd-Fellowship on society and the domestic relations, I propose in this number to examine its claims to be considered a charitable or benevolent institution.

Were we to receive as proof, the testimony of its advocates, and the lectures delivered by its members and published by the lodges, we should be constrained to believe it the ne plus ultra of benevolence and truth, and the church of Christ would be placed completety in the back ground. Rev. Mr. Harvey, member of Cherry-valley Lodge, and Pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Cherry-valley, New York, in an address delivered at the celebration of Fountain Lodge I. O. of O. F., West Springfield, Sept. 4th, 1847, page 11, speaking of the objects of the Order, says, "These are, in the first place, the banishment of all pecuniary distress from within its pale, not caused by crime or immorality committed by the sufferer." After having praised Odd-Fellowship in this strain for nearly half a page, he views the sufferer in the agonies of death, and represents Odd-Fellowship "whispering in the ear of a husband's, a father's dying grief, 'Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me.'" Here Rev. Mr. Harvey takes the language of God himself, (see Jer. 49: 11,) and having personified Odd-Fellowship, puts this very language into her mouth. This, in my opinion, falls very little short of blasphemy. It may be said, that I pervert the reverend gentleman, and that he ought not so to be understood. I know that charity is an excellent grace, and covers a multitude of sins. But I cannot (without doing violence to my own judgment and to the English language,) stretch my charity broad enough to cover such arrogance. Read an anecdote recorded on page 17 of said Address, where you will discover that what was presented on page 11 as a theory, has here assumed a practical embodiment. A poor but worthy member of his own church, (not an Odd-Fellow,) was laid on the bed of death; his property exhausted; his family in want; but no prospect before him but of ending his days in a poor-house. The benevolence of this pious minister was awakened; he appealed to the charity of the community with various success; some gave cheerfully, some reluctantly, and some not at all. "There were some fifty or sixty Odd-Fellows in the place. He had but to make his errand known to each of these, and a response come forth, not in covetous excuses, impotent good wishes, or pennies warped by the vice of avarice, but in a liberal, ready relief." Tales of a like character are often trumpeted to the world, and are probably in every lecturer's mouth, and generally accompanied with an unkind thurst at the churches. I do not say that such circumstances never do exist; but I do say, that I believe that when they do exist the whole transaction was for effect, and that they are often colored to suit the occasion, and that still oftener they are like the far-famed "OIL JUG," whose location could never be found.

After all this display and boasting, the benevolence of Odd-Fellowship, with few exceptions is the benevolence of a Mutual Insurance Company, in which a great degree of sagacity is manifested to keep out of its pales such as would be most likely to become chargeable. No person can become a member of a lodge, under any circumstances, who is under 21 or over 60 years of age, and an increased initiating fee is demanded of a man over 40 approximating to 60. Again, a man cannot become a member unless he is exempt from all mental or bodily infirmities, which may prevent him from using the means of obtaining a respectable subsistence for himself and family. See By-laws of Oneactah Lodge, No. 172, I. O. of O. F., Art. vi. and vii., page 22 and 23. Now we have no objection to these rules, as the rules and by-laws of a Mutual Insurance Company. It is a fair business transaction. But considered as a benevolent or charitable institution, we are constrained to view its claims as totally unfounded. Is this the benevolence of the Gospel? We should be sorry to be told that it is, but still more so to be constrained to believe it. The benevolence of the Gospel is universal and disinterested; the benevolence of Odd-Fellowship is limited and selfish. The one is unostentatious and sincere; the other like the Pharisee thanking God—no, Odd-Fellowship—that he is not like other men.

There is another very striking analogy between Odd-Fellowship and a Mutual Insurance Company. Let a man of tens of thousands be taken sick; if his sickness continues over a week, he is entitled to receive from the funds of the Society $4,00 a week; but a poor brother, no matter how poor his circumstances, is entitled to no more. Is this the boasted benevolence of Odd-Fellowship? Ah, truly, but it is not the benevolence of the Gospel.

Let us next examine its effects on religious character. If it increases a man's zeal for God, and the cause of truth; if it makes him more punctual in his attendance on public worship; if it makes his presence more frequent at the prayer and conference meeting; if it makes him more devotional when there; if it causes him to pay a more strict regard to the claims of the Sabbath; if he is more ready to aid in sending the gospel to the heathen; in short, if it makes him a better citizen, a better neighbor, a better husband, a better father, and a more devoted Christian—we shall be constrained to acknowledge that Odd-Fellowship is of God, and that its members will be blessed, as our reverend lecturer declares in his conclusion: "The smile of conscience and of Heaven shall bless them in life, and shed a halo around their death; when from an eminence covered with light they shall fall to rise again in glory, and angel messengers shall guide their ascending spirits where FRIENDSHIP, LOVE and TRUTH had their birth, and live forever." But our observation does not give an affirmative answer to those items, and we have yet to receive the first evidence that Odd-Fellowship improves the religious character of any of its members. On the contrary, we are fully persuaded, that church members, (at least within the circle of our acquaintance,) belonging to Odd-Fellowship, fall below (in these particulars) the generality of the brethren who are not of the Order; and that, when the claims of the church and the lodge conflict, Odd-Fellowship has the preference.

GENERAL AGENCY OF THE TRACT SOCIETY.

Since the issuing of the Circular of the Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society, relative to the General Agency, the inquiry has several times been made, "if it was the design of the Board that no sums should be received of less amount than five dollars." It is to be regretted, on account of the loss of time which has occurred, that the wishes of the Board had not been expressed more definitely, and that it is now necessary to explain them.

About seventy-five Circulars were issued. If the request had been made, that to each of these Circulars the sum of eight dollars should be subscribed, and the payment pledged by some responsible individual, the matter would probably have been understood, and the $600 asked might have been ere this easily raised. But to name a definite sum, it was thought, would appear as a requisition or tax upon the individuals addressed, and perhaps would have deterred some from acting at all under such instructions. And yet it did not seem prudent to leave it entirely without limitation; for if the amount named was subscribed in small sums by individuals scattered over the whole denomination, the most of the subscribers being nearly or quite unknown to the Treasurer, it could afford no reliable assistance to the Board; and therefore the sum of five dollars was named as the smallest sum the Board wish the trouble of collecting, trusting that the deficiency in such subscriptions would be made up by such as should return larger sums. It is a matter entirely immaterial to the Board, how this sum is raised, PROVIDED it is returned to us with at most the name of one responsible individual to call upon when it is wanted for each five dollars subscribed. The experience of Boards conducting benevolent or denominational enterprises among a people so scattered, has shown the necessity of some responsibility attached to the promises of Executive Boards before liabilities are incurred by employing men, furnishing outfits, &c. We trust that a course so manifestly right will be approved by our brethren generally, and that the necessary pledges will be forwarded to us with little delay.

PAUL STILLMAN, Cor. Sec.

"I AM HOLIER THAN THOU."—A correspondent of the high-church Episcopal paper in New York, inquires whether a churchman, residing in a place where there are no religious services but those of the dissenting sects, should attend their meetings, especially if the teaching of their ministers be able and wise. Another correspondent, whose communication seems to be approved by the editor, expresses the opinion that he should not, because to attend the worship of sects is to "abandon both the doctrine and fellowship of the apostles," and "incur the danger of growing gradually tolerant of heresy, and thinking with indifference on schism." Whether such a view of the case is consistent with that charity which hopeth all things, the reader may judge. There is, however, some apology for this advice, in the fact that the denomination to which the writer belongs has the "forms" of worship printed and made ready to its hands. The head of a family, where there is no priest, may become his own priest, "and needs only a Prayer-book, an almanac to direct him to the proper day in the calendar where the lessons are appointed, a Bible from which to read them, and a volume of printed sermons approved by his Bishop." All this is very convenient, and would no doubt enable a man to get along alone very well—growing stronger each day in the feeling expressed by one of old, "Stand aside, for I am holier than thou!"

MISSIONS AND SLAVERY.

The religious papers published in the Southern States have a strange way of mixing up sacred and profane things, without seeming to see their incongruity. A recent number of the Christian Index, the organ of the Georgia Baptists, affords a good illustration. On one page it publishes the proceedings of the West Tennessee Baptist Association, held in September last, at which a report on Foreign Missions was presented, containing the following paragraph:

"But what shall your committee say of China? Shall China be forgotten? Never! She now deservedly attracts more attention than any other missionary field. Her population is one-third of the world. She numbers not less than three hundred and fifty millions. They are not a savage, but a civilized people. Their Emperor has read the Bible, pronounced it the best book that was ever written, and recommended it to all his subjects. The light of divine truth may now be poured upon the Celestial Empire. The Convention, in the judgment of your committee, should aid the cause in China. Let us feel for her, pray for her, and labor for her. What though she be on the opposite side of the globe? They are descendants of the same stock—children of the same father, and bound to the same destinies. They are our brethren, though sixteen thousand miles assunder from us, and though we have never seen them."

That is all very true—very good. It cheers one's heart to see the band of brotherhood recognized as existing between persons dwelling "sixteen thousand miles assunder," who have never seen each other. But what shall we say of the following notice, which appears on the page opposite the one from which the above paragraph is taken?

"EXECUTOR'S SALE.—Will be sold at the late residence of Jesse Perkins, deceased, late of Greene County, on Wednesday, the first day of March next, the following property, viz:

"Allen, about 30 years old; Claiborn, 25; Dick, 25; Anderson, 20; Asa, 15; Israel, 14; Harrison, 13; Nathan, 13; Sirena, 14; Adaline, 12; and Wesley, 10.

"Also, stock of hogs, stock of cattle, horses, corn, fodder, oats, plantation tools, &c."

PROTESTANT AND CATHOLIC PROSELYTES.

A Kentucky correspondent of the Christian Witness uses the following language in relation to the comparative number of conversions from Catholicism to Protestantism and Protestantism to Catholicism:—

"Ten Catholics become Protestants where one Protestant becomes a Catholic. Impressions to this effect come in from all quarters. Hardly an extensive journey through the State can be taken without hearing of more or less becoming Protestants—rarely here and there of one becoming a Catholic. Every one knows of scores whose ancestors were Catholics—very few can be pointed out, now Romanists, whose forefathers were ever Protestants. The same absorbing process, (within restricted limits,) which is swallowing up the French population in St. Louis, and the Quaker population in Philadelphia, is slowly wasting away the isolated settlements of Catholics in Kentucky. Emigration, immigration, and intermarriages, are all largely in favor of the great majority, of whomsoever they may consist, and constantly against the minority, of whatever form of faith."

The truth of this closing remark is attested by the experience of our own denomination. Our number is small indeed, when compared with the denominations who differ from us in relation to the day of the Sabbath; and besides this, the adoption of our belief involves a much greater pecuniary sacrifice than is connected with joining any other denomination. The natural consequence is, that many of those who are brought up in the observance of the Sabbath, are induced to forsake it when they engage in business. They acknowledge our sentiments to be scriptural, but they are unwilling to make the sacrifices which are necessary to comply with them; hence they leave us and join other denominations. Whether they find their spirituality and religious enjoyment increased by such a course, we leave the reader to judge.

WHOLESALE PARDONING.—The True Wesleyan says that "Governor Young, of this State, appears to have outdone all who have preceded, in the exercise of his pardoning prerogative. It is stated that he has pardoned more than one hundred, some of whom are among the worst class of State's Prison convicts. In the fearful list are no less than five murderers; eleven convicted of manslaughter in the first degree, eight of whom were sentenced for life; and the balance made up of burglars, forgers, bigamists, robbers, and thieves, of every grade and description." If this statement be true, the question may well be raised as to what use there is in going to the expense of trying and convicting men who are so soon to receive an executive pardon?

TEMPERANCE IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—A recent letter from the Sandwich Islands, gives an account of a juvenile temperance meeting at Molohai, attended by a thousand children. A speech was made by his Majesty the King, who exhibited great pleasure at the scene. Speeches were also made by the Prime Minister, by the High Chief of the Privy Council, and by the Governor of Maui, who did honor to the occasion.

BAPTIST MISSIONS.—The Treasurer of the Baptist Missionary Union acknowledges the receipt of $5,506 80 in the month of January, and $54,704 32 in the first ten months of the present financial year. Twenty-four thousand dollars are wanted in the months of February and March to cover the expenditures of the year.

COST OF COLLECTING CHURCH-RATES.—Bucks Advertiser says that Mr. Simonds, of whose imprisonment we have given some account, has came out of jail, and returned home. The parish church of Mursley, however, is still minus her five-pence. After all the labor and bustle, the fivepence has not yet been recovered. And this is rather curious, seeing that the whole proceedings were founded upon an act of Parliament for the more easy recovery of church-rates. Let us see:—the amiable churchwarden has about a dozen journeys to Winslow; the clerk of the Winslow Bench has about a dozen "Bucks to wit" papers to issue; the worthy magistrates themselves have to be deprived of dinner more than once for an hour or two; a constabulary officer has to convey Simonds from Winslow to Aylesbury; for five weeks the county has to provide Simonds with bed, board, and lodging; a monster indictment is framed by the clerk of the peace; a barrister is retained to expound the document to a jury; all the great and influential gentlemen of the county are compelled to put their heads into mental torture for six mortal hours! Such is the plan for the more easy recovery of church-rates, and said five-pence has not yet been recovered.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AT THE WEST.—A meeting was held in this city last week in behalf of the American Sunday School Union, at which a report was presented from one of the missionaries of the Union at the West, representing its operations as exceedingly successful in that quarter. During the last two years, 395 schools have been organized, in which 527 teachers and 18,020 scholars are engaged. At the close of the meeting, 224 of the Union's libraries, worth $10 each, were pledged for the use of Western schools, and a large contribution was taken up on the spot.

BANVARD'S PANORAMA OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, now to be seen in this city, is one of the most extensive and perfect works of the kind ever exhibited. It presents to the visitor, in the course of two hours, a complete view of the Mississippi river for twelve hundred miles, with all the scenery and towns on its banks. Everybody has read about western steamboats, flat-boats, rafts, snags, and snag-boats—about sugar plantations, cotton fields, natural forests, and bluffs. But only a few persons, comparatively, choose to run the risks and pay the expenses necessary to see them at large. They may, however, now get a view of them in miniature, without risk, and with very little expense, by visiting Mr. Banvard's Panorama. Those who avail themselves of the opportunity, will not be likely to regret it.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for February has been republished by Leonard Scott & Co., in advance of the English edition, which has not yet been received in this country. The following is its table of contents:—The Russian Empire; Autobiography of a German Headsman; Edinburgh after Flodden; Subjects for Pictures; Jerusalem; My English Acquaintance; Our West India Colonies; Now and Then. Office of republication No. 79 Fulton-st., corner of Gold.

ANTI-MISSION ASSOCIATIONS.—The Rev. P. M. Musgrave, in a letter to the Tennesee Baptist, alludes to an anti-mission Association, and gives some very interesting facts. He says:—

"Associations which have declared non-fellowship with the missionaries, show a gradual decrease every year, so that within the last five years, the number has decreased from sixty thousand to forty-five thousand. Look at the Missionary Associations, reporting their hundreds baptized every year. The Lord works with his people. He will bring dearth and famine on those who will not obey him. Brethren, come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty, and no longer occupy a back ground; examine this great subject, and act promptly."

THE LICENSE LAW IN NEW JERSEY.—The majority of the Special Committee to which the subject of repealing the license law of last session was referred, presented their report on Tuesday morning. The following is the result of their deliberations:

After a careful investigation, and under a deep sense of the responsibilities they assume, the Committee state that they believe the public good will be promoted by the repeal of the law, and therefore recommend a repeal, and that licenses granted be so modified as to prohibit the sale of liquor on the Sabbath.

In the Davenport (Iowa) Gazette, the Rev. B. F. Bradbrook, the Baptist minister of that place, acknowledges the products of a "Donation Visit," as follows: viz., cash $26, books, English goods, ready-made clothing, shoes, groceries, honey, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, pork, beef, flour, corn, a patent washing machine, and last, though not least, a valuable horse, saddle, side-saddle, bridle, etc., presented by a young lady—amounting in value to about $200.

A proposition is on foot to raise a monument to Bunyan, "in the shape of a new chapel at Bedford, on the site where Bunyan used to preach: and thus it will be made, not only to perpetuate his memory, but, at the same time, to promote the worship and honor of our common Lord."

We learn from the Bridgeport (Ct.) Farmer, that the donations to the rector of St. John's Church, in that city, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, amounted to about eight hundred dollars.

The Brainerd Presbyterian Church in New York city, during the thirteen years of its existence, has contributed over $91,800—more than $7,000 a year—for benevolent purposes.

General Intelligence.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The venerable Patriot and Statesman, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, died at the Capitol, in Washington, on the evening of the 23d of February, a few minutes after seven o'clock. Although more than eighty years old, he enjoyed a good degree of health up to Feb. 21st, on which day he took his seat as usual in the House of Representatives. A series of resolutions of thanks to the officers of the army, introduced by Mr. Chase, had occupied the attention of the House until about one o'clock, giving rise to some excitement. The Speaker was just in the act of putting the question upon them, when he was suddenly arrested by the cry, "Mr. Adams is dying!" It is impossible to describe the scene that followed. The members sprang towards the venerable man, and he was caught as he was falling from his chair, apparently in the agonies of death. All business was immediately suspended—the House adjourned; and intelligence of the sad event reaching the Senate just as it was about to take up the special order, Mr. Benton rose, in a few words of great feeling, announced the calamitous visitation, and that body hastily adjourned. Mr. Adams was placed upon a sofa, carried to the Speaker's room, and every medical attention at once given to his situation. Here, for a moment, he partially recovered the use of his speech, and was heard to utter, in low, faltering accents, "This is the end of earth!—I am composed!" He spoke no more, but lingered, to all appearance, insensible and unconscious, from that period until he gently breathed his last, and his spirit returned to the God who gave it.

In the Senate and House of Representatives, Feb. 25, Mr. Adams' death was formally announced, remarks were made by various individuals, and a committee of one member from each State was appointed to attend the remains of the illustrious dead to their final resting place, which is understood to be Quincy, in Massachusetts. Mr. Adams' seat in the House is to be dressed in mourning for thirty days. The officers of the army are ordered to wear crape, the colors of the different regiments are to be put in mourning for six months, and various other honors are to be paid to his memory. The funeral took place at Washington, on Sabbath, Feb. 26.

Mr. Adams' wife, and her niece and nephew, were in attendance soon after his attack, and continued with him to the last.

The following extract from Mr. Hudson's tribute to the virtues of the illustrious dead, delivered in the House of Representatives, gives the best biographical sketch we have seen:—

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS was born on the 11th day of July, 1767, in that part of Braintree, Mass., which was subsequently incorporated into a town by the name of Quincy, and hence was in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1778, when he was but eleven years of age, he accompanied his father, John Adams, to France, who was sent with Benjamin Franklin and Arthur Lee, as Commissioners to the Court of Versailles. After remaining in France about eighteen months, during which time he applied himself closely to the study of the French and Latin languages, he returned to his own country in August, 1779. In November of the same year his father was again dispatched to Europe for the discharge of diplomatic services, and took his son John Quincy with him.

At Paris he was put to school, and when in 1780 John Adams removed to Holland, his son enjoyed the advantages of the public school at Amsterdam, and afterward of the University at Leyden. Francis Dana, who accompanied John Adams, as Secretary to the Embassy, received in 1781 the appointment of Minister Plenipotentiary to Russia, and took John Quincy Adams, then fourteen years of age, with him as his private Secretary. Here he remained till October, 1782, when he left Mr. Dana, at St. Petersburgh, and returned through Sweden, Denmark, Hamburg, and Bremen, to Holland, where he remained some months, till his father took him to Paris, at the time of the signing of the treaty of peace in 1783. From that time till 1785 he was with his father in England, Holland, and France; during the whole of which period he was a close student.

At the age of eighteen, at his own request, his father permitted him to return to Massachusetts, where he entered Harvard University, and was graduated in 1787, with distinguished honors. Soon after leaving College he entered the office of the celebrated Theophilus Parsons, afterward Chief Justice of Massachusetts, where he remained the usual period of three years in the study of the law, when he entered the profession, and established himself at Boston.

In 1794 Gen. Washington appointed him resident Minister to the United Netherlands. From that period till 1801 he was in Europe, employed in diplomatic business, and as a public minister in Holland, England, and Prussia. Just as Gen. Washington was retiring from office, he appointed Mr. Adams Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Portugal. While on his way to Lisbon he received a new commission, changing his destination to Berlin. During his residence of about three years and a half at Berlin, he concluded an important commercial treaty with Prussia—thus accomplishing the object of his mission. He was recalled near the close of his father's administration, and arrived in his native country in September, 1801.

In 1802 he was chosen by the Boston District to the Senate of Massachusetts, and soon after was elected by the Legislature a Senator in Congress for six years from March 3, 1803. He remained in the Senate of the United States until 1808, when he resigned. While in the Senate he received the appointment of Professor of Rhetoric in Harvard University, an office which he filled with distinguished ability.

In 1809 he was appointed, by President Madison, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Russia, where he rendered the most important services to his country. By his influence with that Court he induced Russia to offer her mediation between Great Britain and the United States, in the war of 1812; and, when the proper time had arrived, he was placed by President Madison at the head of five distinguished Commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace, which was concluded at Ghent in 1814. Mr. Adams was then associated with Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin to negotiate a Commercial Convention with Great Britain, and was forthwith appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James. While in Europe, in 1811, he received the appointment of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which he declined.

After remaining in England till the close of President Madison's Administration, he was called home, and placed by President Monroe at the head of the Department of State, where he remained eight years.

In 1825 he was chosen by the House of Representatives President of the United States for four years. On leaving the Presidency in 1829, he returned to his native place in Massachusetts, and in 1831 he was elected a member of this House, and by the free suffrages of the people has been continued in that office to the day of his death.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS—PEACE.

Proceedings in Congress last week are nearly destitute of interest. The occurrence of Mr. Adams' sickness on the first day of the week's sessions, his subsequent death, and the adjournment in consequence until after the funeral, prevented the transaction of any important business. The Treaty of Peace with Mexico, however, was presented to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to be printed. Its terms have not yet been made public. But the editor of the New York Tribune says that it is agreed on all hands that the future boundary of the two nations is to be the Rio Grande, from its mouth to about the 32d degree of north latitude, thence due west to the Pacific, giving us an accession of ten degrees or nearly 700 English miles in width across the whole north end of Mexico, with all that she possessed on this side of the Rio Grande, including the cities or important villages of Santa Fé, Albuquerque, Taos, &c., and a Mexican population of perhaps 50,000 on this side of the Rio Grande, and as many on the other. The territory we thus acquire can hardly be less than 2,000,000 square miles in all, equal to a district 2,000 miles long and 1,000 broad; but of this a very large proportion is an inhospitable and irreclaimable desert of rock and arid sand, destitute in the main of wood, of soil, and even of water.

◆

MOST SINGULAR OCCURRENCES.—Capt. Martin Lund, a Dane by birth, who was well known in New Orleans, left there about eighteen months ago in the schooner Independence, loaded with merchandize for a Mexican port, upon a speculation. He went to the Rio Grande, sold his cargo, and after taking on board the receipts, which amounted to $3,000 or $4,000 in specie, he again put to sea. A norther coming on he was obliged to put into a hostile Mexican port, when his property was confiscated and his person put into close confinement. His friends hearing no news direct from him, and a rumor being in circulation that his vessel was lost with all on board, they supposed of course that he was dead. A succession was opened in the proper Court, his property sold, the succession closed, and the proceeds paid over to the supposed widow. The wife, about six months ago, married a young lawyer of New Orleans. Three or four days since, to the wonder of every one, the long-lost, but veritable Capt. Lund, returned to his former home, and found quite an alteration in his affairs, both pecuniary and domestic. This may give rise to some interesting discussions of the law.

MEXICAN NEWS.—The American Star, of Feb. 11, published in the city of Mexico, contains the official announcement that the treaty of peace was ratified on the part of the Mexican Congress, by receiving the signature of Signor Rossa, Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 10th inst. which date it bears. A meeting of the Deputies and Senators who were in the city was held, but only 24 were present, and a majority of them were in favor of peace and the treaty.

The Star of the 12th says that Santa Anna had asked for a passport to leave the Republic, and that he recommends to his friends to yield up the contest with the United States, sue for peace, and establish a good government.

Pena y Pena publishes a letter in which he states that the Government of Queretaro, in conjunction with Gen. Scott, have resolved upon the imprisonment of Santa Anna and thus remove the only obstacle which exists against a speedy conclusion of peace. There was considerable animation exhibited at Queretaro. Business was fast reviving under the general belief that peace was at hand, if not already concluded.

The Buffalo Express states that the ice has passed out of the harbor, and all is free for the resumption of navigation. The Lake is as clear of ice as in July. A strong wind from the south-west had been blowing for several days, and no ice had made its appearance, which is good evidence that there has been none of consequence above. This is without precedent in the history of Lake Erie navigation.

A late arrival at Norfolk brings the painful intelligence from Venezuela, that President Monargus has attempted to seize the civil power and has caused the members of Congress who were unfavorable to his designs to be massacred. Civil war was expected.

Of forty-eight deserters from the American Army, forty-one were foreigners, and forty-two were men of intemperate habits.

The New Bedford Bulletin relates a case, in which a young man in a drug store in New Bedford became a raving maniac from inhaling Chloroform.

The Hudson river is now open, after a fashion, to Hudson, whence a boat came down.

SUMMARY.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter says: The Susquehannah County Bank, we understand, has continued to redeem its notes, at its own counter, in specie, or specie-paying funds, notwithstanding its discredit in this city and Philadelphia, and that the bank rests on a better foundation than formerly—more than two-thirds of its entire circulation having been redeemed. We quote this bank the same as other western Pennsylvania money, (2 per cent discount.)

The Hagerstown News states that Hezekiah Burhans, an old man, who lately died in Baltimore, has left all his property, valued at $12,000, to a young lady, a school-mistress of that town, who, when the old gentleman visited Hagerstown a year ago, treated him with great kindness, when others, viewing him as beneath their notice, in consequence of his shabby appearance, treated him with great coldness. The lady not only gave him a warm welcome, but also introduced into her school the "Monotonical Speller," a work of which the deceased was the author. "Kind words cost nothing."

R. L. Pell, Esq., the celebrated owner of the extensive Pelham Farm, has offered a premium of a piece of plate, valued at sixty dollars, or sixty dollars in money—at the option of the successful competitor—for the best fat Ox of three to five years old, that shall weigh not less than 3,500 lbs. The premium to be awarded at the judgment of a Committee of Butchers only. A butcher of this city has offered a premium of $50 for the fattest and best conditioned Sheep. Both the animals are to be exhibited at the next Fair of the American Institute—October, 1848.

Captain Tobin, who is now at San Miguel, thus notices the last moments of a dying gambler, a desperado from Tennesee:—"He was in the last stage of galloping consumption, and his latest breath was expended in blaspheming his Maker, boasting of having committed five murders, and regretting that he could not carry his money to Hell and cheat the Devil at poker! He died that night, and left $2000 in gold behind him."

John Randolph, a colored servant born on the plantation of the famous Randolph of Roanoke, and long in his service, but among the four hundred left free by his will, proposes to publish "The Private Life of John Randolph," including letters, poetry, anecdotes, &c., &c. Many eminent men who knew the subject, and know the author, have warmly aided the enterprise.

At Massilon, Ohio, on the 23d of Feb., great excitement was occasioned by the town being flooded and much destruction occasioned by the contents of an immense reservoir, occupying a location ninety feet above the town, escaping and pouring through its midst. The force of the flood tore down several brick warehouses, a brick factory, the Tremont House, and the canal embankment, and almost all the stores, warehouses, &c., in town were overflown and their contents damaged.

The Governor of the Penitentiary at Halifax, N. S., recently let out six prisoners, armed with weapons, for the purpose of capturing an escaped convict. Contrary to his expectations, however, instead of aiding in the capture of the convict, they burst into a rum-shop, and compelled the keeper thereof to furnish them with drink. After committing other outrages, they were captured and taken back to prison.

The Scientific American says that Mr. Robert Patterson, a practical and experienced flax spinner, of New Hartford, Oneida Co., N. Y., has made some very important improvements in the method of manufacturing flax, which must be of great benefit to this rising and valuable branch of American industry. Mr. Patterson by his own process entirely disposes of all the hetcheling, and spins his thread without that operation, and makes a far superior article.

The Newark Advertiser states that A. G. Hecrote has patented a new mode of connecting cars, by which they are easily coupled by one man, and in case of accident they uncouple themselves. It is said to be impossible for one car running off the track to drag others after it. The "coupling" is so constructed, that on the slightest deviation beyond the regular curve of the track, the connection between the erratic car and others is instantly severed.

Goodwin, the hard-hearted wretch who suffered his insane wife to perish of cold and hunger in a pig-sty in Canada, has been sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. The Judge told him that the Jury had been very merciful in not convicting him of murder, and if he had been convicted he would assuredly have been hanged.

The Edinburgh Chronicle says that a Mr. Lemuel W. Wright, an American, has obtained a patent in England for a process of making paper of straw, which is attracting considerable attention. A large company in Normandy, France, have purchased a patent at a high price, and are preparing to manufacture straw paper extensively.

A number of colored persons, both free and slave, were arrested in New Orleans on Sunday, the 8th ult., for the crime of assembling to worship God! A New Orleans paper mentions, as an evidence of their criminality, that one of them had a Bible and three prayer books.

The Duke of Devonshire has an income of $1,850,000; Louis Phillippe is said to be worth $150,000,000; Sir Robert Peel $90,000,000; and John Jacob Astor $30,000,000; and Astor says that a man with a couple hundred thousand dollars is just as well off as if he were rich.

Dr. George Dock, at Harrisburg, Pa., removed, a few days ago, a cataract in the eye of a boy thirteen years of age, by the name of Culp, who had been blind from his infancy, but who now, (by three minutes' work of the surgical instrument) has the power of vision.

The manufacture of print goods, it is stated, has been reduced by failures and the pressure of the times at least 25,000 pieces per week. This, it is thought, will prevent further decline in prices.

Henry L. Wheaton, of Dudley, Mass., has been appointed President of the University at Norwich, Vt., in the place of Col. Ransom, deceased.

Already in this our Southern latitude, says the N. O. Delta of Jan. 29th, do the harbingers of mild and balmy spring begin to peer forth. The bud of leaflet and the blossom of flower show symptoms of resuscitation, and of the reanimation of nature. The withered turf, in park and paddock, is casting off its sere coloring, and assuming nature's future garb of green. Birds no longer sit silently churlish in bush and tree bough, but gaily chirp their morning matins—and in every living thing the revivifying breath of the season seems to be felt.

J. W. Gordon, of North Carolina, has invented a new machine for shelling corn. It is of very simple construction, occupies but a small space, and is not liable to get out of order. It is calculated to go by hand power, the same person who turns the crank, feeding in the ears of corn. With very little labor, one man can shell twelve bushels per hour. The expense of building one is but a few dollars, and they are intended for the use of farmers generally, and not Mills requiring heavy quantities of Corn, which is shelled by more expensive machines, moved by steam power.

The New Jersey Lunatic Asylum is nearly finished, and was recently visited by the members of the Legislature. It is of brown stone from a neighboring quarry, at a cost of $80,000. It has spacious reception rooms, bathing, dining rooms, and chapel, and is heated by four large steam boilers. It is delightfully warmed and ventilated, and has four cast-iron cisterns in the garret, of one hundred and twenty gallons capacity.

A grammar of the Inpong language, spoken by the negroes of Gaboon, Western Africa, and lately reduced to a written system by the missionaries of the American Board, at that station. has been printed, with vocabularies, in New York, at the expense of the Board. This grammar exhibits the wonderful fact, that these naked savages are possessed of a language rivaling the Greek in copiousness and flexibility.

It has recently been decided by one of the courts of Massachusetts, that no pupil of a public school can be legally expelled for bad character. The judge held, that bad character, so far from being in any case a ground of expulsion, was in reality the strongest ground for retaining a scholar.

The American Society for ameliorating the condition of the Jews have a missionary in New York city, Rev. John Neander, who has had much intercourse with Jews there at their own houses. The Chronicle says "he enjoys the respect and confidence of those whom he seeks to benefit. They begin to employ him as umpire to settle their private disputes."

Governor Shunk has vetoed a bill to incorporate a Telegraph line from Philadelphia to Lewes in Delaware. The ground on which he does so, is, that the telegraph interferes with the operation of the Post Office Department, and he thinks the State has no power to pass laws of which this would be the effect.

A colored barber in Cazenovia, N. Y., a few days ago inflicted a severe and dangerous wound on the neck of a man he was shaving, and with whom he had just had a quarrel about the price.

A Mr. McClay attempted to commit suicide on Monday night, at the Exchange Hotel, in Baltimore. He first cut his throat, and then threw himself from the fifth story window. Though horribly injured, he is still living.

A plant indigenous to California, called chancalagia, has been lately introduced into the Southern States. It is regarded by the Mexicans and Californians as a panacea for all evils and distempers to which they may be exposed. Its efficacy in curing diseases has been well tested.

Recently, the Parochial authorities of St. Luke's, Chelsea, and St. Leonard's, Shorewitch, London, issued descriptions and rewards for the apprehension of 54 men charged with deserting their wives and families.

The Medical Colleges of Buffalo and Geneva, in this State, have made arrangements to send Professor Coventry, of Geneva College, to Europe, to collect information regarding the best way to treat the Cholera.

Mines of lead have been discovered in Arkansas and the ore on being analyzed was found to be worth $70 per ton for the silver alone which it contains. It may therefore be regarded as the Argentine ore of lead.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune says that Richard P. Robinson, of Ellen Jewett memory, died recently in West Florida, where he had kept a small drug store.

MARRIED,

In Jacksonville, Laurens, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 20th ult., by Rev. L. C. Pattengill, Mr. JONATHAN C. BURDICK, of Plainfield, youngest son of Dea. Jonathan Burdick, deceased, to Miss CYNTHIA M. CLARKE, eldest daughter of Alanson Clarke, of the former place.

At Westerly, R. I., on the 10th of January, by Eld. I. Moore, Mr. MILTON P. SAUNDERS, of Brookfield, N. Y., to Miss ABBY A. PROSSER, of Westerly.

In Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., Feb. 8, 1848, by John Edwards, Esq., Mr. OLIVER LANGWORTHY, of Portville, Cattaraugus Co., to Miss HAPPY I. MAXSON, of the former place.

DIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., Feb. 18th, Mrs. SARAH BABCOCK, wife of David Babcock, (formerly Sarah Witter, of Hopkinton, R. I.) Sister Babcock has been for a number of years a worthy member of the Second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield. Her complaint was cancer of the breast, a painful disorder, which she bore with Christian fortitude, and finally died in the triumphs of faith. E. S. B.

At Portersville, New London Co., Conn., on the 14th ult., after a short and painful illness, Doct. BENJAMIN F. STODDARD, aged 56, highly esteemed as a physician and member of society.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

DWIGHT'S AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

THIS amusing and interesting Family Work, illustrated with many engravings, and containing an extraordinary variety and amount of valuable reading matter has closed the third volume, and subscribers to the fourth are invited. The character of this work is attested by the religious and secular press. It is warmly recommended to every family by the New York Observer, Christian Advocate, Recorder, Express, Courier, &c.

The fourth volume, (beginning with January, 1848,) will be sent in numbers of 48 pages large octavo, for $2 a year, in advance, (free of postage.) The January number will be highly illustrated with about 25 engravings, some of them large and of the finest style. Among the original matter will be the first chapter of Carlo Carbonaro, or real adventures and scenes in Italy. The history of New York Public Schools, and Mr. Squier's discovery in the Western Mounds, both with illustrations, will be also in this number.

Vols. 1, 2, and 3, (each with about 800 pages and 150 engravings,) for sale in muslin, or half bound, at $2 50 each. For $10 those three volumes, and any work in the market, not over $1 50, will be delivered at the houses of purchasers in Boston, Buffalo, Baltimore, and intermediate places, free of charge; and volume fourth will also be sent monthly, as above.

Valuable seeds sent to subscribers. Seven copies of volume four for $10; three copies for $5.

Edited by Theodore Dwight, Express office, 112 Broadway.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

Miscellaneous.

THE CHILD AND THE MOURNERS.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

A little child, beneath a tree,
Sat and chanted cheerily,
A little song, a pleasant song,
Which was—she sang it all day long—
"When the wind blows, the blossoms fall;
But a good God reigns over all."

There passed a lady by the way,
Moaning in the face of day;
There was a tear upon her cheek,
Grief in her heart, too great to speak;
Her husband died but yester-morn,
And left her in the world, forlorn.

She stopped and listened to the child,
That looked to heaven, and singing, smiled,
And saw not, for her own despair,
Another lady young and fair,
Who, also passing, stopped to hear
The infant's anthem, ringing clear.

For she, but a few sad days before,
Had lost the little babe she bore;
And grief was heavy at her soul,
As that sweet harmony o'er her stole,
And showed how bright had been the past,
The present drear and overcast.

And as they stood beneath the tree,
Listening soothed and placidly,
A youth came by, whose sunken eyes
Spake of a load of miseries;
And he, arrested like the twain,
Stopped to listen to the strain.

Death had bowed the youthful head
Of his bride beloved—his bride unwed;
Her marriage robes were fitted on,
Her fair young face with blushes shone,
When the destroyer smote her low,
And changed the lover's bliss to woe.

And these three listened to the song,
Silver-toned, and sweet, and strong,
Which that child, the livelong day,
Chanted to itself in play;
"When the wind blows, the blossoms fall;
But a good God reigns over all."

The widow's lips impulsive moved;
The mother's grief, though unreproved,
Softened, as her trembling tongue
Repeated what the infant sung;
And the sad lover, with a start,
Conned it over in his heart.

And though the child—if child it were,
And not a seraph sitting there—
Was seen no more, the sorrowing three
Went on their way resignedly,
The song still ringing in their ears—
Was it the music of the spheres?

Who shall tell? They did not know,
But in the midst of deepest woe
The strain recurred when sorrow grew,
To warn them, and console them too—
"When the wind blows, the blossoms fall;
But a good God reigns over all."

ARNOLD THE TRAITOR.

There was a day when Talleyrand arrived in Havre, hot foot from Paris. It was in the darkest hour of the French Revolution. Pursued by the blood-hounds of the Reign of Terror, stripped of every wreck of property and power, Talleyrand secured a passage to America in a ship about to sail. He was going a beggar and a wanderer to a strange land, to earn his bread by daily labor.

"Is there an American staying at your house?" he asked the landlord of his hotel—"I am bound to cross the water, and would like a letter to some person of influence in the New World."

The landlord hesitated a moment, and then replied:

"There is a gentleman up stairs, either from America or Britain, but whether an American or Englishman, I cannot tell."

He pointed the way, and Talleyrand, who in his life was Bishop, Prince and Prime Minister, ascended the stairs. A miserable suppliant, he stood before the stranger's door and entered.

In the far corner of a dimly-lighted room, sat a gentleman of some fifty years, his arms folded and his head bowed on his breast. From a window directly opposite a flood of light poured over his forehead. His eyes looking from beneath the downcast brows, gazed in Talleyrand's face with a peculiar and searching expression. His face was striking in its outline; the mouth and chin indicative of an iron will.

His form, vigorous even with the snows of fifty winters, was clad in a dark but rich and distinguished costume.

Talleyrand advanced—stated that he was a fugitive—and under the impression that the gentleman before him was an American, he solicited his kind offices.

He poured forth his story in eloquent French and broken English:

"I am a wanderer—an exile. I am forced to fly to the New World, without a friend or hope. You are an American? Give me, then, I beseech you, a letter of yours, so that I may be able to earn my bread. I am willing to toil in any manner—the scenes of Paris have filled me with such horror, that a life of labor would be a Paradise to a career of luxury in France. You will give me a letter to one of your friends. A gentleman like you has, doubtless, many friends."

The strange gentleman rose. With a look that Talleyrand never forgot, he retreated towards the door of the next chamber, his head still downcast, his eyes still looking from beneath his darkened brow. He spoke as he retreated backward; his voice was full of meaning:

"I am the only man born in the New World that can raise his hand to God and say—I have not one friend—not one—in all America."

Talleyrand never forgot the overwhelming sadness of that look which accompanied these words.

"Who are you?" he cried, as he strange gentleman retreated towards the next room. "Your name?"

"My name"—with a smile that had more mockery than joy in its convulsive expression—"My name is Benedict Arnold."

He was gone. Talleyrand sank in a chair, gasping the words—

"ARNOLD THE TRAITOR!"

Thus you see he wandered over the earth, another Cain with a murderer's mark upon his brow. Even in the secluded room at that inn at Havre, his crime found him out, and forced him to tell his name—that name the synonyme of infamy.

The last twenty years of his life are covered with a cloud, from whose darkness but a few gleams of light flash out upon the page of history.

ARTISANS IN PERSIA.

The king is considered to have a general right to the labor of artisans; but he does not commonly exercise the right, receiving instead a certain tax, the amount of which varies according to the man's income. But if a man gets a reputation for any particular excellence or skill in any trade, the king, or the governor of the province where he is, sends for him, and makes him work for the monarch, and for the courtiers and great men, and he may think himself well off if he can get them to pay him even such miserable wages as may enable him just to keep himself from starving. This makes every man anxious to avoid the reputation of being an expert workman, or of having made improvements in his art. Mr. Fraser, in his "Narrative of a Journey into Khorassan," mentions a man who made some improvement in pottery, so far as to manufacture a sort of porcelain, resembling tolerable china ware. His fame quickly spread, and soon reached the court. When the king heard of it, he sent an order for the man to repair immediately to the capital, and make china for the Shah. The poor fellow, who knew the consequences, was terribly frightened at this order. He went, however, but not to make china. He scraped together all the money he could, and sold everything he had, to raise a bribe for the prime minister, whom he entreated to tell the king that he was not the man who made the china; that the real potter had run away, nobody knew where, and that he himself had been put under restraint by mistake, and prayed to be released. The prime minister put the money in his pocket, and told the story to the king, who sent a release to the poor man, who joyfully returned home, vowing that he would never more make a bit of china, or attempt any kind of improvement, as long as he lived. You see how this must tend to keep down the minds of the people, and prevent every kind of improvement.

THE PRESS.

The art of printing is perhaps the mightiest instrumentality ever contrived by man for the exertion of moral influence. The Rev. Dr. Adams, in his late address at Yale College, remarked:—

"In the city of Strasburg, on the eastern frontier of France, there stands, in the principal square, a large bronze statue of Guttenburg, the inventer of the art of printing with movable types. It is a full length figure of that fortunate individual, with a printing press at his side, and an open scroll in his hand, with this inscription; And there was light. Upon the several sides of the high pedestal on which the effigy stands, are four tableaux in bas-relief, designed to represent the effect of the art of printing on the general progress of the world. In one stands the names of the most distinguished scholars, philosophers, and poets of all times; in another the names of those who have been most eminent for their achievements in the cause of human freedom;—conspicuous among which is an allusion to our declaration of independence, with the names of Washington, Franklin, Hancock and Adams. On the third side, is a representation of philanthropy knocking off the fetters of the slave, and instructing the tawny children of oppression in useful knowledge; and on the fourth is Christianity, surrounded by the representatives of all nations, and tribes, and people, receiving from her hand, in their own tongue, the word of eternal truth. Christianity! Heaven-born Christianity! Divine philosophy! look down with indifference or disdain on that bearded man at work with tools in his smutty shop, away on the Rhine! Affect to overlook and undervalue him as a mechanic! A mechanic! why, out of those bars of wood, and pounds of metal, and ounces of ink, he is constructing a machine to make the nations think. He is constructing wings for Christianity herself, which shall bear her, with the music of her silver trumpet, to all the abodes of men."

MANNERS OF OUR ANCESTORS.

Lord Dorchester, having no wife to do the honors of the table at Thoresby, imposed that task upon his eldest daughter, as soon as she had bodily strength for the office, which in those days required no small share. For the mistress of a country mansion was not only to invite—that is, urge and tease—her company to eat more than human throats could conveniently swallow, but to carve every dish, when chosen, with her own hands. The greater the lady, the more indispensable the duty. Each joint was carried up in its turn, to be operated upon by her, and her alone; since the peers and knights on either hand were so far from being bound to offer their assistance, that the very master of the house, posted opposite to her, might not act as her croupier; his department was to push the bottle after dinner. As for the crowd of guests, the most inconsiderable among them—the curate, or subaltern, or squire's younger brother—if suffered through her neglect to help himself to a slice of the mutton placed before him, would have chewed it in bitterness, and gone home an affronted man, half inclined to give a wrong vote at the next election. There were then professed carving-masters, who taught young ladies the art scientifically; from one of whom Lady Mary Montague said she took lessons three times a week, that she might be perfect on her father's public days; when, in order to perform her functions without interruption, she was forced to eat her own dinner alone an hour or two beforehand.

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

On the first of December, the Emperor of Russia completed the twenty-second year of his reign; in three years, therefore, he will have arrived at an epoch which has not been attained by any of the Czars before him. A fundamental law exists in Russia, which dates before the time of Peter the Great, and by which the Emperor of Russia can reign no longer than twenty-five years. After this period, he is obliged to abdicate in favor of the heir presumptive of the Imperial Crown; or, if he wants to maintain himself on the throne, he does so at the risk of braving all the aristocracy of Russia, and of being stabbed or strangled in his own palace. Such, at least, were the customs of the Czars, for a long period elapsed since any attained the 25th year of his reign. The resolution which the Emperor will take for this important period has been deeply engaging parties of St. Petersburg. Many suppose that he will abdicate in favor of the Prince Royal, Alexander Nicolevitsch, who is now twenty-nine years of age, and that he will retire into Germany; but the more general opinion is, that he will convoke the Senate, for the purpose of having this barbarous law revoked, and thus be enabled to continue his reign without the fear of the nobles. The Emperor himself avoids all allusions to the subject.

THE BRACELETS.

Maria Antoinette, of France, was passionately fond of the opera. She once played Susanna in the "Marriage of Figaro," in a private theatre in the palace. Opposite the Queen's box at the opera house, one evening, sat the wife of a rich banker, bedizened with jewels, and sporting a pair of magnificent diamond bracelets; and so anxious was she to attract the notice of the queen, that she leaned her hand on the velvet cushion of the box, that the jewels might be fully seen. Her movements did not escape the notice of the queen. She cast several significent glances at the lady, who was delighted at the homage paid to her brilliants. In the course of the evening, a servant wearing the queen's livery, knocked at the door of the box, and with many compliments to the lady, and apologies from the queen, begged that the latter might have a closer view of one of her splendid bracelets which had so much occupied the public attention and admiration. In a moment it was unclasped and given to the queen's messenger.

The banker's wife soon discovered that it was an ingenious thief, who had observed her movements and efforts to attract the attention of the queen, that had thus obtained the bracelet. The police was soon apprised of the loss, and next morning, while at breakfast, she was made happy by receiving a note from the commissioners of the police, stating that the thief and the bracelet had both been captured, and requiring her either to send the other bracelet by the sub-lieutenant of police and his attendants, to identify the one recovered, or to come herself with it to the bureau. She was en negligee, and preferred giving the other bracelet to the officer, with many cautions of care; but she found in a hour or two that both her bracelets had vamoused! both gone! The rogue who had obtained one at the theatre, had ingeniously managed to possess himself of the other.

A TERRIBLE SITUATION.—The following distressing particulars of the loss of a mail-stage near Montreal, we find in a paper of that city:

There were but two passengers, Mr. Ogden of Quebec, and Mr. Russell of Ancaster. When the leaders plunged into the water, Mr. Ogden and Mr. Russell both leaped from the stage; the first made good his footing on the main ice, but Mr. Russell's cloak unfortunately got entangled, and before he could extricate himself he found himself in deep water.

He clung to the stage, but as the night was dark he could see nothing of his companions. The horses swam with the stage two miles, until it grounded on a shoal, near the Isle Dorval, where the horses perished. Owing to the intense cold, Mr. Russell's clothes were immediately frozen to the stage, otherwise he must have been swept off, as the wind was blowing strongly. Soon after the plunge, Mr. Russell called out to the driver, Mudge, who answered that he was on a sheet of ice and drifting down; but the night was so dark that they could not see each other. Mr. Russell afterward heard him shouting at intervals, some distance ahead of himself, and there is every probability that the unfortunate man was hurried down the Lachine Rapids.

Mr. Russell lay on the stage, where it grounded, exposed to the dreadful inclemency of the weather, for eight hours, from half-past 1 in the morning, to half-past 9, at which hour he was rescued. When found, his situation was distressing in the extreme; from the continuous beating of the surf over him as he lay, he had become completely encased in ice, to such an extent, that it was found necessary to clear it from him with axes, before he could be detached from the stage.

THE FARMER.—It does one's heart good to see a merry, round-faced farmer. So independent, and yet so free from vanities and pride. So rich, and yet so industrious—so patient and persevering in his calling, and yet so kind, social, and obliging. There are a thousand traits about his character. He is generally hospitable—eat and drink with him, and he won't set a mark on you, and sweat it out of you with double compound interest, as some I know well—you are welcome. He will do you a kindness without expecting a return by way of compensation—it is not so with everybody. He is generally more honest and sincere—less disposed to deal in low and underhand cunning, than many I could name. He gives to society its best support—is the firmest pillar that supports the edifice of government—he is the lord of nature. Look at him in his homespun and grey, and laugh at him if you will, but believe me, he can laugh back if he pleases.

NEW USE OF CHLOROFORM.—A theft, by means of chloroform, lately took place at Mardigny, near Port-a-Mousson, in France. Two persons went to an inn under the pretence, as they said, of ordering a little banquet. They succeeded in putting the mistress of the house asleep by making her breathe the perfidious liquor which was concealed in a small bottle within a medalion. Her husband had been sent away, under the pretence of looking for some of the party expected, who had not arrived. On his return he found his wife in a state of alarm, for she had not entirely lost her senses; she had been sensible of the robbers taking away her keys, and had seen them take from her closet a bag of silver, containing the sum of 335 francs, with which they had absconded.

TRUE HOSPITALITY.—I pray you, Oh! excellent wife, cumber not yourself and me to get a curiously rich dinner for this man or woman who has alighted at our gate; nor a bed-chamber made ready at too great a cost; these things, if they are curious in them, they can get for a few shillings in any village; but rather let this stranger see, if he will, in your looks, accents, and behaviour, your heart and earnestness, your thought and will, which he cannot buy at any price in any city, and which he may well travel twenty miles, and dine sparsely, and sleep hardly, to behold. Let not the emphasis of hospitality lie in bed and board; but let truth, and love, and honor, and courtesy, flow in all thy deeds.

[Ralph Waldo Emerson.

VARIETY.

The Dutchess of Praslin, who was murdered in a barbarous manner by her husband, left behind her the following summary of the duties of a wife: "The aim of a wife is to become the friend, the partner, the consolation of her husband; to educate her children, to direct all the household affairs—these are the true missions of women on earth: if she does not fulfill them she has lived in vain, she is deserving of no consideration, she is a useless and despicable being, like the man whose only occupation is to drink, to smoke, to gamble, and to idle away his time."

Two gentlemen in St. Louis, having a dispute, (a lady being at the bottom of it,) agreed to heal their offended honors with a pair of pistols, at a distance of ten paces. The ground was measured, but before the word was given, one of the parties fired; this produced some altercation, and before it was settled the lady was seen approaching at full gallop. She neared the belligerents, sprang from her horse, clasped her lover in her arms, and by her entreaties prevented any farther waste of powder, the challenged party and seconds having agreed that the pistols should be loaded with nothing more.

The yeast prepared by the Hungarians will keep a whole twelvemonth. During the summer season they boil a quantity of wheaten bran and hops in water; the decoction is not long in fermenting, and when this has taken place they throw in a sufficient portion of bran to form the whole into a thick paste, which they work into balls that are afterwards dried by a slow heat. When wanted for use, they are broken, and boiling water is poured upon them. Having stood a proper time, the fluid is decanted, and is in a fit state for leavening bread.

The poet Corpani once asked his friend Hayden, "How it happened that his church music was almost always of an animating, cheerful and even gay description?" To this, Hayden's answer was: "I cannot make it otherwise; I write according to the thoughts which I feel:—when I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy, that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be easily forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

A lazy clown, going to a sun-dial, to see if it was not yet the point of time when he might regale and be idle, expressed himself very irreverently when he found it was not yet the hour he wished for. "Suppress your foolish impatience," said the sun-dial, "and recollect with awe that this moment pointed out by my shadow, and which you survey with indecent scorn, is the last to many, and doubtful to all."

In a case involving about $20,000, before the Supreme Court of Bristol County, Mass., in which Mr. Webster recently appeared for the plantiff, a case pending for fifteen years, he concluded his remarks by declaring that "if the code of common sense was not to govern courts in their deliberations, they might be looked upon as nuisances, rather than the exponents of justice."

"I have been informed," says a missionary to India, "that some merchants in Birmingham have made a good speculation lately, in manufacturing idols of brass for the India market, for which they found a ready sale. It was mentioned to me as a fact last year, that two missionaries were embarking for Calcutta on board the same ship which carried several chests filled with idols."

In the N. Y. Legislature, a member paused in the midst of a remarkably windy speech, to take a drink of water. Another member rose to a point of order. Everybody started, wondering what the point of order was. "I think, sir," was the reply, "it is out of order for a wind-mill to go by water."

A bill has been introduced into the New-Jersey Legislature "for the preservation of newspapers," which authorizes the clerks of counties to subscribe and preserve in a bound form all the newspapers published in them. No better history can be found than the newspapers, and in future years as matters of reference they are invaluable.

'I have known,' says Cicero, 'many sin by speaking, few by keeping silence; it is therefore more difficult to know how to be silent, than to speak.' And there is a Spanish proverb to the same effect:—'Any fool may babble, but it takes a wise man to hold his tongue.'

A merchant of St. Petersburg drives a carriage drawn by two very large wolves. They are harnessed exactly like carriage horses, and attract much attention.

A horse called Charles, forty-five years old, died on Staten Island on the 12th of December last. The Spirit of the Times states that he was the property of the late O. Mauran, Esq., of New York, and that he was bred at Horse Neck, Connecticut, in 1802.

It is said that if a few of the sheep in a large flock are furnished with bells, the dogs will not attack the flock, a dog thief being a cowardly, sneaking animal, and afraid of noise.

It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.

A bill has been introduced into the Mississippi Legislature, providing that where either man or wife be convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary, the other party may be entitled to a divorce.

The number of vessels wrecked on the coast of Florida, and taken into Key West, during the last year, was 20, valued at $515,250. Their expenses for repairs, &c., amounted to $60,117, and the sum awarded to wreckers was $50,904.

The Saratoga Sentinal says that Mrs. Rachel Vendermader, 20 years old, and married only three weeks, cut her throat with a razor on the 29th ult.

Some fine flax, producing 500 lbs. to the acre, has been grown in Van Diemen's Land.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare. to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

EXTRACTS FROM MISSIONARY LETTERS.

We continue our extracts from the letters of our missionaries. It will be remembered that Bro. Carpenter preceded the rest of the company to Shanghai. His wife, with Bro. Wardner and wife, followed afterwards. The following from Bro. W. will give some idea of the perils of their voyage. It is dated Aug. 3d.

We got under sail about 2 o'clock, P. M., on the 18th, (July,) but did not get out into the open sea until the next morning. We moved gently along with a light breeze, in company with three other vessels, till the 20th, a day ever to be remembered by reason of the wonderful display of Almighty power and saving mercies.

For about twelve hours the sea had been greatly agitated, without wind. Early in the morning, however, the wind began to rise, and continued to do so, till it blew a regular typhoon, which lasted from 8 to 12 hours, out of 28 hours of boisterous wind.

The barometer gave no warning of such a tempest, till a short time before it burst upon us, when it sank suddenly. In a short time the roaring became so loud, that it was with difficulty the officers could be heard with a trumpet. So suddenly did the wind shift from one point of the compass to another, that the billows were broken, and thrown into huge pyramids, while all was enveloped in one sheet of foaming spoon-drift. The copious sea-spray was driven with such velocity as rendered it impossible to look windward. The sails were all reefed as soon as possible, the yards taken down, and the vessel sent adrift at the mercy of the furious elements. The spars and masts writhed and trembled like a slender reed, while the winds screamed most fearfully among the ropes and rigging. The lee-side of the vessel was literally buried above its railing in the sea for about 12 hours. The furious waves came plunging against her in quick succession, which frequently set her nearly upon her beam's end. Towards night, one struck against her stern with such violence as to burst our cabin windows, and, rolling over the quarter-deck, poured down a large quantity of water, through the sky-light, into our and Mrs. C.'s rooms. Hers being on the lee-side, it upset her trunk, drenching her and nearly every thing in the room. Clothes, books, and pieces of furniture were floating and dashing about the floor. Being no longer able to retain her room in safety, she took up her quarters with us. We were all so reduced by sea-sickness and fasting, (having taken no refreshment since the preceding day,) that we were unable to sit up.

Mrs. W. and myself had been twice thrown against the wall across our cabin, and considerably bruised. At length night closed in upon us, and the tempest still increasing. Should we be driven on shore, we knew we should be instantly dashed in pieces, it being a bold and rocky coast, and knowing at the same time that we could not be far from it. And with the setting sun hope nearly expired. But, bless the Lord, in that trying hour there was one source of consolation. We knew the God of Jacob still ruled, and did his pleasure upon the stormy deep. He still lives, who said, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." To Him we endeavored to commend ourselves, also the cause in which we had embarked, invoking his blessing especially upon the latter, whatever should become of us. For some wise purpose he has deigned to spare us, for which we praise his holy name.

On the following morning we found ourselves drifted within a short distance of an island south of Hongkong, called the Ass's-Ears. The deck exhibited a scene of perfect confusion. Snarled ropes, yards, spars, barrels, hogsheads, chests, boxes, cannons, and anchor-chains, were rolling and dashing about, or floated by the immense quantities of water dipped by each leeward lurch of the vessel.

During the blow we lost our fore-top-mast, fore-top-gallant-mast, flying-jib-boom, quarter-boat, three casks of water, some provisions, all our fowls but one, besides suffering many other damages which it would be tedious to mention. We saw several vessels, bound up the coast, after the hurricane, all of which were dismantled and much crippled. But we have learned nothing of the fate of our comrades. Judging from their position when the storm commenced, it is more than probable that some of them were lost.

By reason of calms and head-winds, our voyage was protracted fourteen days, which should have been performed in six. Our accommodations were comfortable. We arrived at Woosung (ten miles below this place) on the evening of the first. At 3 o'clock the next morning we left in a native boat, and arrived at this place about half past eight.

By the kindness of Mr. Pierce, (a gentleman connected with the firm of Russell & Co.,) I was assisted in getting chairs, coolies, and a guide to conduct us to our new house, situated near the south gate of the city, about two miles distant. Our way led through narrow, winding streets, barely wide enough for foot-paths, amid the broad grins and starings of the astonished natives. Our meeting was by no means an uninteresting one, after so long a separation, and having escaped such perils.

Nearly all the male missionaries, and Mr. Bates, the acting Consul, have called to see us, who appear very kind and open-hearted.

Aug. 11th. Not having an opportunity to send this till to-day, I am enabled to say from observation, that our location is, in my opinion, one of the most eligible in the whole city.

Before leaving Hongkong I had two interviews with Rev. Mr. Gutzlaff, who informed me that a learned Christianized Chinaman had lately written an essay, proving that the ancient Chinese observed the Sabbath; that he had managed the argument in a very able manner, not with a design of vindicating the claims of that day at the present time, but to prove to his countrymen the validity of the Scriptures from their own history. It has not been published as yet, and it is uncertain whether it will be. I intend, if possible, to get a copy, and forward to you, if I can get it translated, or when I can do it myself. N. W.

The crescent moon, already gaily beaming
  O'er land of ancient Sinim, resteth mild
On mount, and tomb, and field luxuriant teeming,
  And Sinim's superstitious wealthy child,
And outcasts wandering for scanty food,
  And pirates scouting round Hei-chi-chin Bay,
Who, watching barques in thirsty wrathful mood,
  To Fo,* Taou,† or Jos,‡ their "chin-chin" pay,
Asking for spoil from Samqui,|| daring Englishman,
  Well known for fearful hate thro' each piratic clan.

With him on Sir E. Ryan's deck we stand,
  Whose Bengaleeans, toiling, tune their song,
While Canaan's sons, and Malays at their hand,
  With Ishmaelites, the chorus help along.
There, too, as heaves the mighty liquid breast,
  Falls shade, and light of moon, on barque and sea,
And calls the sea-sick thought from loathed unrest
  To visioned forms that dance fantastically;
All seek their own repose, the moon-beams glowing,
Still calm, tho' sighs the sea that yet seems gently flowing.

Morning returns; the waves are heavy rolling,
  And giant-like the winds sweep o'er the sails;
Sea-spirits groan, alarm-bells stealthily tolling;
  O'er China's depths some dangerous power prevails.
"Furl every sail—haul-to on larboard tack,"
  Are loud commands; but winds dispute their power;
Confusion high of sea echoes aback
  Dispute and rage through twelve succeeding hours—
A day to be remembered ever by those there;
To all, of fasting, toiling, fear; to some, of prayer.

At eve the blinding spoon-drift dies away,
  The setting sun gleams faintly through the air,
They talk of food, of dangers through the day—
  Hark! see those looks of terror and despair;
No thunders mutter now, no lightnings gleaming,
  No clank of steel, no clouds obscure the moon;
Yet there is hurried step, faint voices screaming;
  It is the deadly, awful, dread typhoon!
Then break those liquid pyramids o'er shivered masts;
Down, down, we go, till depths seem closing o'er us fast.

Loud oaths respond to China's angriest growl;
  Loud peals the trumpet, giving firm command;
Louder the blasts prophetic furies howl
  Of dissolution on some rock-girt strand;
Or, should by miracle some land be gained,
  Anguish's cold fingers picture horror's spoil—
Those thirsting wild for vengeance still remain
  Inventing tortures from which all recoil.
"Spirits of tempest rule the sea; man hath no power;
Let drive the ship, though perils thicken every hour."

On, on, she sweeps, pursuing and pursued,
  But bears along the humble voice of prayer;
"Ask, that your joy be full," blest promise, stood,
  Then burns the quenchless flame of faith sincere.
O, Father, save, lest Zion's foes rejoice;
  Shall hopes of Zion's friends be blotted here?
O, let us toil for heathen! The sweet voice
  Of Him through suffering perfect calms each fear;
We sleep, awake; the rising sun full viewed, serene,
O'er Haipony's valleys smiles on smooth enameled green.

Letter from Mrs. Carpenter.

HONGKONG, July 9, 1847.

DEAR BRETHREN,—You will see by the enclosed letters from Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Wardner, that the field of our future labors is finally selected. They have each spoken for themselves; I follow their example. It will be to our friends, as to ourselves, an unpleasant thought, that after we are in China, it should cost nearly half as much to get to the selected field, as it did to come from home to China. But this monopoly must, I think, soon undergo a modification. Shanghai is becoming the New York of the Empire, and facilities for reaching it must increase. The trade is already extensive, and you will see at once the reason for my hope in the case. In the mean time, missionaries coming here, by embarking in ships destined for Shanghai, can save themselves, doubtless, much expense. Aside from these considerations, is that of the climate. They have winters there, and an opportunity is thus afforded to recover from the debilitating effects of the summers, without those long and expensive voyages which missionaries in India and Southern China find so frequently indispensable. So that, even in a pecuniary point of view, the Board may not be the losers by this decision. For myself, too, I am deeply interested in the hope, that we may eventually find an opening from that port into the interior among the Nestorians. From none of the other free ports could we so reasonably expect this. With respect to Foo-Chow, the prospect darkens rather than otherwise, of future communications with that port. The acquisition of the language is also another item in favor of going to Shanghai; the spoken dialect in all those Northern Provinces, being much more like the written, than in these Southern ones, and the dialects of the different provinces much more uniform, consequently enlarging the sphere of one's usefulness there.

You will see that Hope enters largely into the composition of our present mental state. And is there not a reason? We feel most deeply, that if our own "hearts have devised our ways, the Lord hath directed our steps." We have crossed the ocean—oceans, rather—in safety; we have found friends in a land of strangers, a heathen land; we enjoy our usual health, and feel that among ourselves there is a harmony, and unanimity, which encourages us to believe, that for wise purposes we have been thus associated. We can but feel strong in the hope that we are where our Heavenly Father would have us to be, and that he will prosper us in this our anticipated work. We believe, dear brethren, that we have your hearty concurrence in these matters, and your earnest prayers for us. L. M. C.

CHINESE PHYSICIANS.

BY REV. T. T. DEVAN, M. D.

The native physicians of Canton are of comparatively low standing in society; it is an employment often resorted to for a livelihood by any scholar or so-called learned man, who has nothing else to do. Generally the sick go to the medical man for relief; it is very rarely that the physician goes to the bedside of the patient. The most respectable are consulted in their own houses, and do not dispense medicines. For the consultations and prescriptions, the ordinary fee is from three to nine cents. If, however, it is found necessary to visit the patient at his own house, the ordinary fee is nine or ten cents per visit; in some few instances one or even two dollars have been paid for a visit. There are no female physicians; hence, when one of that sex is sick, and there is a necessity to call upon the aid of a doctor, means are adopted to carry out, even in the hour of suffering, the custom of the nation never to allow people of different sexes to meet in the same apartment. On entering the apartment of the sick female, the physician is brought close to a curtain or screen, on the other side of which stands the patient, who has been dragged from her bed, and supported by her female friends, is retained in that position till the medical investigation is finished. The patient first passes her hand beneath the curtain, that the pulse may be examined. Great importance is attached by the Chinese to the pulse, and they suppose that the larger proportion of diseases may be fully ascertained by the pulse alone. Close investigation on the part of the physician the patients neither like, nor do they deem it necessary. If, however, the medical man is not satisfied with the pulse alone, the curtain is lifted and he is allowed to look at the face and tongue of the patient. On signifying his satisfaction, the curtain is dropped, and she is carried back to her bed. But if she be wholly unable to rise from her bed, she is invariably brought to a lower floor, should she have been lying up stairs, and after being surrounded by a mosquito curtain, the doctor is allowed to approach his patient. This curtain is not to be drawn only from urgent necessity, and even then it must be drawn but for a few moments.

Most of the sick of Canton generally call upon the physician, though at the mission dispensary I have frequently been called upon by servants for medicines for their masters, who merely sent word that they "did not feel well, and were feverish." The native practitioners are accustomed to prescribe when thus consulted.

It is not unfrequently the case, that the priests are consulted by the people, for the cure of their maladies. These men make amulets, spells, &c., for the sick, and from the sale of which they derive considerable income. They profess to arrest hemorrhage or cure an abscess by writing on the part affected some cabalistic characters. Sometimes these characters are written on paper, and a tea is then made of the paper, and the patient is required to drink largely of this tea.

In a certain portion of diseases, (say some three per cent.,) the Chinese imagine the patient to be possessed of a devil or strange spirit, which, though benevolent towards the inhabitants of the particular house in which he may dwell, is bitterly hostile to the inhabitants of all other houses. Their suspicion that a patient is laboring under a supernatural agency, is fully confirmed, should delirium be one of the symptoms of the disease. In that case, the friends take the management of the case into their own hands. They proceed at once to make offerings of tea, and rice, &c., to the evil spirit, and then, opening the door and placing themselves behind the patient, kindly invite the spirit to be appeased and leave the house; then they cast the offerings out of the door into the street, and having closed the door, wait patiently for the subsidence of the delirium.

The Chinese have little or no knowledge of anatomy, and their Materia Medica, and rules of medical treatment, have no regular basis. While native practitioners confine themselves almost wholly to some 200 or 300 vegetable remedies, they derive some from the animal kingdom. They administer centipedes for syphilis, and in malignant or black gangrenous abscesses or ulcers, will apply a poultice or a toad fresh opened. Medicines from the mineral kingdom are almost entirely unemployed by the Chinese practitioners.

Those who are principally charged with the medical care of the people of Canton, may be seen in all parts of the city sitting in the streets and surrounded by a medley assortment of gallipots, roots and herbs, waiting for patients. There are also very many medicine shops scattered about the city, some of which are fitted up in a style that would not disgrace even Broadway. There is this exception, however, to such a comparison: the work of pulverizing, mixing and slicing the medicines, is all carried on in full view of passers by. And yet this can scarcely be said to detract from the elegance to a stranger's eye, because the fanciful attire of the men, the grotesque appearance of the tools, and the antique aspect of the whole, are in perfect keeping with the large blue and white figured gallipots that fill the red and gilt shelves. Some of the door-posts of these doctors' shops are strangely ornamented (?) by being covered with scores and hundreds of old worn-out plasters of all sizes and colors. These were placed there by the grateful patients, as tokens of the cures effected by the medicine sold within. The sight of these used strongly to remind me of the waxen arms, legs, and crutches suspended about the altars of Mary and other canonized saints in Europe as tokens of gratitude for health restored by means of their intercession.

The corners of the streets are covered with medical placards, inviting the sick to resort to this or that practitioner for a cure. In these announcements the names and symptoms of many diseases are published with such a repulsive exactness and plainness, that they need their expression in a foreign character to shield them from the eye of Christian decency.

There are no public hospitals for the sick. There is an institution, however, at the eastern gate of the city, devoted to the outcasts of Canton,—the lepers. But it is rather an asylum than a place of treatment; for no medical means are employed for the sick. This institution is supported by the emperor, and is in no wise connected with, or dependent on the benevolence of the people.

A COURTEOUS RETORT.

A Baptist minister from England, says the Philadelphia Chronicle, who was settled some years since in that city, was distinguished in his native country for disinterested labor and ready wit. He devoted several years of the last part of his life to gratuitous labor in a populous town about three miles from his residence, to which place he walked every Sunday morning, preached three times, and then walked home. One Sunday morning, as he walked along, meditating on his sermons for the day, he met one of those important personages, called parish priests, a race happily unknown, at least in the plenitude of his persecutive power, in this country.

"Well, ———," said his reverence, "I suppose you are on your way to preaching again?"

"Yes, sir," was the modest reply of the humble Baptist minister.

"It is high time the government took up this subject, and put a stop to this kind of traveling preaching; indeed, there is something like it intended."

"They will have rather hard work, sir," said the imperturbable Baptist.

"I am not very sure of that," rejoined the priest; "at any rate, I will see whether I cannot stop you myself."

"I judge," said the worthy man, "you will find it more difficult than you suppose. Indeed, there is but one way to stop my preaching, but there are three ways to stop yours."

"What, fellow, do you mean by that?" asked his reverence, in a towering passion.

"Why, sir," replied the little Baptist preacher, with most provoking coolness, "why, sir, there is but one way of stopping my preaching, that is by cutting my tongue out. But there are three ways to stop yours; for, take your book from you, and you can't preach; take your gown from you, and you dare not preach; take your pay from you, and you won't preach."

The parson vanished.

THE CHILD AND THE QUEEN.

[Translated from the German.]

Befurchte (gardner to Elizabeth, consort of Frederick II.) had one little daughter, with whose religious instruction he had taken great pains. When this child was five years of age, the Queen saw her one day while visiting the royal gardens at Shonhausen, and was so much pleased with her, that a week afterwards she expressed a wish to see the little girl again. The father accordingly brought his artless child to the palace, and a page conducted her into the royal presence. She approached the Queen with untaught courtesy, kissed her robe, and modestly took her seat, which had been placed for her, by the Queen's order, near her own person. From this position she could overlook the table at which the Queen was dining with the ladies of her court, and they watched with interest to see the effect of so much splendor on the simple child. She looked carelessly on the costly dresses of the guests; the gold and porcelain on the table, and the pomp with which all was conducted, and then folding her hands, she sang with her clear, childish voice, these words:—

"Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
Are all my ornament and dress;
Fearless, with these pure garments on,
I'll view the splendors of thy throne."

All the assembly were struck with surprise, at seeing so much feeling, penetration, and piety, in one so young. Tears filled the eyes of the ladies, and the Queen exclaimed, "Ah, happy child! how far are we below you!"

[Episcopal Recorder.

BE COURTEOUS.—Dr. Humphrey was once seated in a stage-coach, when a gentleman and lady, on their bridal tour, wished to be accommodated with seats inside. There being but one vacant seat, the newly married pair were subjected to a separation, unless some passenger relinquished his place. This no one appeared disposed to do, when the Doctor mounted the outside, insisting upon the gentleman occupying his seat with his bride. Subsequently the Doctor was collecting funds for the College over which he presided, and was presented with a handsome donation from the stranger he had met in the stage-coach, with the remark that he knew nothing of Dr. Humphrey, or Amherst College, save that its President was a gentleman.

ANCIENT LAW AGAINST THE BAPTISTS.

The following law was passed on the 13th of November, 1644, by the General Court of Massachusetts. Mr. Benedict, from whose history it is taken, says this was the first law made against the Baptists in that Commonwealth:—

"Forasmuch as experience hath plentifully and often proved, that since the first rising of the anabaptists, about one hundred year since, they have been the incendiaries of commonwealths, and the infectors of persons in main matters of religion, and the troublers of churches in all places where they have been, and that they who have held the baptizing of infants unlawful, have usually held other errors or heresies therewith, though they have (as other heretics used to do,) concealed the same, till they spied out a fit advantage and opportunity to vent them, by way of question or scruple: and, whereas, divers of this kind have, since our coming into New-England, appeared among ourselves, some, whereof (as others before them,) denied the ordinance of magistracy, and the lawfulness of making war, and others the lawfulness of magistrates, and the inspection into any breach of the first table; which opinions, if they should be connived at by us, are like to be increased amongst us, and so must necessarily bring guilt upon us, infection and trouble to the churches, and hazard to the whole commonwealth; it is ordered and agreed, that if any person or persons within this jurisdiction, shall either openly condemn or oppose the baptizing of infants, or go about secretly to seduce others from the approbation or use thereof, or shall purposely depart from the congregation at the ministration of the ordinance, or shall deny the ordinance of magistracy, or their lawful right and authority to make war, or to punish the outward breaches of the first table, and shall appear to the court wilfully and obstinately to continue therein, after due time and means of conviction, every such person or persons shall be sentenced to banishment."

THE PROPHET THAT COULD NOT PRAY.

Jonah embarked; with what feelings? His commission lay upon him as guilt! He longed for an auspicious gale to carry him to a distance, as he hoped, from the peculiar province of God's dominion! so that he might say, "Happily, here is less and less of the divine presence!" But what providence did he invoke? Would he go unprotected over seas and to strange lands, contented with some secondary and dubious providence? In what terms did he pray before he went to sleep? Like other men, when conscious they are going about something wrong, he could not pray. And supposing there were some one devout Israelite there, that did pray in his hearing, he could not say "Amen!"

He slept, but it is not wise to sleep in guilt. How did he deserve to be awaked? He shall not sleep long; for there is a power that can awake the tempest! The God that is disobeyed on the land, can make the sea avenge him. And here, again, the very first thing is a pointed, direct infliction on his conscience—for it is a summons to pray! "Awake, and call upon thy God!" And to think that a prophet of the Lord should be the only one in the company that could not, dared not, do this! Observe, there is no situation more pitable than that of a religious man who has disabled himself to take the benefit of his religion. His associates had various gods; but they could all pray earnestly to their objects of adoration. He could not; he who knew the real Lord of the land and of the ocean. [Foster.

THE BOY THAT WOULD N'T GET MAD.

I once heard an interesting story about two brothers. One of them was ten years old, and the other eight. The oldest boy had, within a few months past, indulged the hope that God had given him a new heart. He thought he was a Christian, that he loved the Lord Jesus Christ. But his little brother did not believe that his heart had been changed. He thought his brother was no more a Christian than he had always been. He said he could not see any difference. Yet he meant to try him and see; for, as his brother now appeared more sober than usual, and was more willing to go to meeting than before, he did not feel quite certain that he was not a Christian.

Now, how do you think this little boy, eight years old, undertook to find out whether his brother was really a Christian? Why, every time he could get a chance, he would tread on his brother's toes, kick his heels, or pinch his arms, to see if he wouldn't get mad, as he used to. But his brother bore it all with meekness and good nature, without an angry word or look. This was very different from what he used to do. He had before always been ready to take revenge on the spot for such an abuse.

The youngest brother was quite sure that he could not do so; for he knew he should get mad if anybody should treat him so unkindly. He soon became convinced that his brother was a Christian, and that he was not. He became very anxious about the salvation of his soul, and in a short time he too indulged the hope that God had pardoned his sins, and given him a new heart. [Stories for Children.

EXPENSE OF PUBLISHING RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

The general opinion seems to be, that every Christian denomination, however small, ought to publish at least one religious newspaper, through which its distinguishing sentiments may be advocated, and its various benevolent enterprises set forth. But a great many persons, who profess to hold this opinion, strangely contradict it by their practice. Such are they who never subscribe for a paper themselves, but are satisfied to read a borrowed copy. Such are they who subscribe for a paper, but never pay for it, thus raising hopes only to disappoint them. Such are they who subscribe for a paper this year, discontinue it the next, commence taking it the third, and so keep the publishing interest always in a state of uncertainty as to future prospects. Now, we do not believe this class of persons would be so numerous, if the expense of publishing religious newspapers, and the consequent necessity of their being regularly and liberally sustained, was well understood. With a view to help our readers understand this matter, we give them below the experience of several persons who have been engaged in the business of publishing, some of them for a long series of years. The first speaker shall be the publisher of the "Presbyterian of the West," who, when about to quit the business, and of course free from any temptation to misrepresent the case, says :—

"Subscribers who are unacquainted with the expense of publishing a paper, will scarcely believe me, that what I received for the two years I have published it, has been expended in paying for work and materials. So far I have managed to keep out of debt, but have not realized anything for the labor of myself and others connected with the office."

The next speaker shall be the editor of the "Christian Observer," published in Philadelphia, a paper which is understood to be the organ of a large branch of the Presbyterian Church. He says :—

"Those who preceded us in charge of the paper, which we removed to this city in 1839, sacrificed thousands to sustain it, and left it without a dollar for their labors. Of our predecessors in this city, one expended about $5000 more than he received, and to those that succeeded him it was a losing concern—to such an extent that it was soon abandoned."

Then comes the editor and proprietor of the "Watchman of the Valley," who seems to have commenced the business of publishing with very flattering prospects :—

"I embarked with my capital in this service in compliance with a specific request from the most approved source. I was encouraged to believe that it would be a safe investment of capital, and not a perilous one, as my friends apprehended. This request received the sanction of the three Synods of Ohio, Cincinnati and Indiana, who, by their votes, have repeatedly commended my paper to the patronage of the churches. In fulfilling the duties thus assigned me by the churches, I have given them my whole time for nearly seven years, without realizing a farthing for my services, and have cast into this sinking fund, besides, between three and four thousand dollars of my cash, over and above the Watchman's receipts, without realizing a dollar from the paper myself. I have paid $1000 for the services of an assistant Editor, which I consider a clear gift to the churches from my own pocket."

The veteran editor of the Christian Mirror, published at Portland, Me., shall be the last witness. In a long article upon the expenses and advantages of religious newspapers, he says :—

"The publishing and sustaining of a religious newspaper is indeed a very costly enterprise. The printing apparatus is all a cash expense—the furnishing, the rents, the labor, are all subject to cash payments. The paper used for printing is wholly a cash article, and in our own little establishment to the cost of more than $1200 a year. And nothing short of the utmost industry, and vigilance, could keep our little concern alive. Many local papers, conditioned somewhat like our own, have given up the ghost. Others have been kept alive by the process of changing hands—bankrupting several proprietors in succession. We assure our friends and readers, that it is an extremely laborious business to keep a religious paper alive."

Such is the testimony of experienced men. In view of it, and "by way of application," as the ministers sometimes say, we wish to offer a suggestion or two relative to the Recorder. A great proportion of our subscribers are warm friends of the object for which our paper is published, and have given proof of their friendship, not only by approving words, but by prompt payments of their own accounts and vigorous efforts to increase the number of our subscribers. There are some, however, who have given us more approving words than prompt payments, in consequence of which we are put to not a little inconvenience. To the latter we would respectfully suggest, that an early payment of the "small bills" due the establishment, would be a great help and encouragement, and would furnish conclusive evidence that the expense and labor of publishing a religious newspaper is to some extent appreciated. To the former we would say, that we need your continued support, both in the form of prompt payments and of efforts to increase our subscription list. You have done well, and have our hearty thanks. But good men sometimes become weary even in well doing. Let it not be so with you. A very large list of subscribers we cannot reasonably expect; but with the cooperation of those who approve our enterprise, we may expect a living list. To merit such a list, we shall spare no pains or expense, and we confidently hope to have it.

Benedict's History of the Baptists.—"A General History of the Baptist Denomination in America and other Parts of the World," is the title of the long-expected work of David Benedict, which has just been published by Lewis Colby & Co., of New York. It is a large octavo volume, of nearly one thousand well-printed pages. Mr. Benedict begins with Foreign Baptists, and gives a history of the Dissenting Parties up to the time of the Waldenses—a sketch of the Waldenses, Albigenses, German Anabaptists, English, Irish, Scotch, and other Baptists, and of the various foreign writers in the baptismal controversy. Then follows a history of American Baptists, containing the substance of his former work, with such additions and alterations, as thirty years farther study of the subject has enabled him to make. We regret the circumstances which compelled Mr. Benedict to abbreviate the articles near the close of his volume, particularly that in relation to the Seventh-day Baptists. But his sketch, though brief, is true and liberal. The work will be regarded as a valuable addition to the stock of Baptist literature.

THE SCRIPTURAL CALENDAR.

We have received from the author, William Henry Black, Elder of the Sabbath-keeping congregation in Mill Yard, London, a forty-eight page pamphlet, entitled, "The Scriptural Calendar, and Chronological Reformer, for the Statute Year 1848, including a review of tracts by Dr. Wardlaw and others on the Sabbath question."

One object of the author of this little book is "to exhibit the rudiments of the true notation of time, with a view to the establishment of sound and Scriptural principles of Chronology, the correction of vulgar errors therein, and a demonstrative distinction between time sacred and time common;" he being persuaded, as many others are, that neither Jews, Mohammedans, nor Deists, can be converted to Christianity, until the holy law of God on this point be obeyed by Christians, and their faith, worship, and practice be cleansed from the corruption of human traditions, of which the pretended change of the Sabbath is none of the least. In carrying out his plan, Mr. Black has arranged a calendar in which the months are designated by the ordinals first, second, third, &c., instead of January, February, March; and the days of the week are designated in the same way, except the seventh, which is called Sabbath. He has also set texts of Scripture against the successive seventh days, to afford a continuous chain of argument for their immutably sacred and sabbatic character. Against the first days he has placed texts, a right interpretation of which opposes the substitution of that day for the Sabbath. This arrangement of the calendar, accompanied as it is with an article on the Sacred Division and Notation of Time, can hardly fail of doing good, by awakening the curiosity and fixing the attention of even cursory readers.

Another object of the author is to review certain tracts on the Sabbath, and apologize for not continuing his series on that subject. In 1838, '39, '40, Mr. Black published several tracts; but the series remains incomplete for want of sufficient leisure to perfect it. Meanwhile fourteen or fifteen tracts have been announced in London under the general title, "The Sanctification of the Sabbath illustrated and enforced, in a Series of Tracts for the Times, by ministers of various denominations;" the principal aim of which is to prevent traveling by railways on the first day of the week. Only four have as yet appeared, each of which is here brought under review, and its inconclusive and unscriptural reasonings shown; to the great advantage, as we think, of the Sabbath cause. Most heartily, therefore, do we wish success to the Scriptural Calendar.

Labors of Mr. Gutzlaff.—Galignani says that letters from the celebrated M. Gutzlaff, missionary and Consul-General of England in the Celestial Empire, have just been received at Munich. They are dated at Hongkong, and give an account of the labors of that eminent individual, which approach the marvelous. He has just terminated a voluminous history of the Chinese Empire, and has sent the manuscript of it to M. Cotts, the publisher, at Stuttgardt. He has published, at Hongkong, a universal geography in the Chinese language, with sixty large maps. He has begun to compose a complete dictionary of the Chinese language, which will, he says, absorb all his leisure for the next three years. It is only in his leisure hours that he can occupy himself with literary and scientific labors, all the rest of his time being devoted to his missionary labors and his consular duties. M. Gutzlaff announces that he has addressed some long memoirs on the geography of China to the Geographical Society of London, which it is expected will shortly be published. M. Gutzlaff still maintains the opinion, that Christianity and European civilization can only be successfully propagated in China by the Chinese themselves. He has accordingly founded a Chinese Society, which already possesses 600 members, many of whom are mandarins, and some native savans of the first rank. This Society employs its efforts on all the countries situated to the south of the river Jang-tse-Kiang, and it has already published a great number of popular works.

ORIGIN OF THE NAMES OF THE DAYS OF THE WEEK AND THE MONTHS OF THE YEAR.

The Saxon-Germans, when they were pagans, consecrated the first day of the week to the Sun, as prince of the planets, whose image they placed on a pillar in a temple, fashioned like a man half naked, his face as it were brightened with gleams of fire, and holding with his arms archwise a burning wheel before his breast; the wheel being to signify the course which he runneth round the world, and the fiery gleams, the light and heat wherewith be warms and comforts all that live and grow.

The second day they appropriated to the special adoration of the Moon, as the second planet in the heavens. It is still called, in High-Dutch, Mon-tagh, or moon-day; hence Monday.

The third day is called, in High-Dutch, Dieutagh, from a word that signifies strife, and was so named in honor of Mars, the god of battles. The origin of the name Tuesday is from the ancient Teutonic, in which language it was called Tuisco's-day, in honor of Tuisco, who, they say, was the founder of the German nation from the tower of Babel.

The fourth day is called Wednesday, from Woden, who was a most valiant prince and victorious captain among the ancient Saxons; his name signified furious. After his death he was honored as a god.

The fifth day is corrupted into Thursday from Thor's-day, Thor being an idol god that they worshiped, supposed to be the same as Jupiter, or the thunderer; hence, in High-Dutch it is still called Donners-dagh, i. e., thunder-day.

The sixth day they appropriated to Venus, the goddess of love; which, in their tongue, they called Friga; hence Fri-tagh, corrupted into Friday.

The seventh day they called Sater's-tagh, or Samp's-tagh, from the supposition that the god Saturn challenged to himself the dominion of this day; hence Saturday.

This heathenish custom has also brought in polluted names among the months.

The Romans appointed the beginning of the year to be the calendar of January, because on the first day of this month their consuls were first created, when that form of government was set up among them. This month derives its name from Janus, a heathen god. Janus is represented as having two faces, seeing things past and to come; superstitious antiquity consecrating to him the beginning of things.

February has its name from Februa, or Fruüs, the god of purging by sacrifices; to whom Numa dedicated this month. This Februa was the same as Pluto, the god of hell.

March is so called from Mars, the god of battles, to whom this month was dedicated, it being believed he was the father of Romulus, the founder of the Roman nation.

April has its name from a Greek word which sets forth Venus, the goddess of love, as sprung from the froth of the sea, this month being dedicated to her.

May is so named from Maia, the mother of Mercury. In this month, the merchants sacrificed unto her.

June is so called from Juno, a goddess, the daughter of Saturn and Ops, the sister and wife of Jupiter, or Junius Brutus, the author of Rome's liberty, who was made Consul in this month.

July is so named from Julius Cæsar, because he was born in that month.

August from Augustus Cæsar, and for his honor.

September from septem; being in part the seventh month of the Jewish year, beginning with what we call March.

October, the eighth month, from octo.

November, the ninth, from novem.

December, the tenth, from decem.

Having thus given the reader some account of the pagan origin of days and months, how can I but bewail that carnal compliance with heathen customs and superstitions which these things show of the greater part of the Christian world!

Why is there such a lukewarmness, especially in them who call themselves of the reformed religion, to bring names and things to scripture language? O how much it would make for the purity of the churches of Christ to bring all things to the word and will of God!

The true and proper names of the days of the week, according to Scripture, are first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh or Sabbath. See Gen. 1: 5 to the end, and chap. 2: 2, 3.

The several months of the year are named in Scripture after the same manner; as first, Ex. 12: 2; second, Gen. 7: 11; third, 1 Chron. 29: 5; fourth, Ex. 1: 1; fifth, Zec. 7: 3, 5; sixth, Ezek. 8: 1; seventh, Gen. 8: 4; eighth, 1 Chron. 27: 11; ninth, Hag. 2: 10, 18; tenth, Jer. 39: 1; eleventh, 1 Chron. 27: 14; twelfth, Esther 3: 13. Some of the months have other names in Scripture, but these are in the most common use.

Why should these things appear to us, or be treated, as unimportant things, when the Spirit of God has seen fit to treat them as of sufficient importance for those special directions contained in the Scriptures afore-cited? Are not our feelings respecting things very much influenced by the ideas we associate with names of things which we use? May we not expect, then, these things will have an influence on Sabbath-keeping! If we would venerate the Sabbath as we ought, we must venerate the name.

John Quincy Adams.—The Salem Register says that the habits of Mr. Adams were pure, simple, and unostentatious, even to awkwardness. He always rose before day, and, when in health, made his own fire. He used much exercise, and was peculiarly fond of bathing and swimming. No one was ever more industrious, or sacrificed less of his time. He was one of the most prolific writers of the age. His journal, which he kept from early life, and which embodies all his conversations with distinguished men of his own and other countries, is, no doubt, a richer legacy to his children, than the ample fortune he leaves. Mr. Adams leaves also copies of every letter he ever wrote, and amongst his voluminous productions, are most able eulogies on Madison, Monroe, and La Fayette.

Meeting in Behalf of the Mormons.—A meeting was held in New York last week to consider the case of the suffering Mormons in the western wilderness. Col. Kane, of Philadelphia, stated the circumstances connected with his becoming acquainted with the Mormons, and gave his views of their present and prospective wretchedness. Mr. Little, a Mormon delegate, was also present, and addressed the meeting. Resolutions were passed recommending to the favorable consideration of the citizens an application about to be made for donations to relieve the emigrant Mormons in their present necessities.

Probable Death of Mr. Raymond.—A letter received in New York, from the supercargo of a ship, dated Sierra Leone, Dec. 9, '47, says that Mr. Raymond, the manager of the Mendi Mission, died about the first of that month, of black vomit, which has prevailed to an alarming extent for some months. It is feared that this report is true.

Effect of Giving for Foreign Missions.—The following letter, copied from the Day-Spring, is one of the best illustrations that we have ever seen of the effect of contributing liberally to send the gospel to the heathen. We commend it to the attention of those pastors who think their people can do nothing for foreign missions, because they find so much difficulty in supporting the ministry at home :—

"I received your circular, read it to my people, preached them a long sermon on the subject, and then directly asked them for their money, and the result has been sixty dollars deposited with me for your treasury (Foreign Missions.) And yet one-fourth part of my salary comes from the Home Missionary Society.

"The sum we have raised is twice as much as any one of us expected, yet it was easily done; and what is interesting, to me at least, is the fact, that the week following this effort, and even before it was completed, our people held a meeting to devise means for the support of the gospel at home, and resolved, instead of raising "three-fourths" of my salary, to raise "four-fourths" of it; and probably will succeed, though their ordinary ability is no greater now than it was a year ago. Hence it is very evident, that giving sixty dollars to the Lord has done us no harm. Enclosed is the sixty dollars."

Mr. Abbott at Calcutta.—A letter received in this country from Mr. Abbott, announces his arrival at Calcutta on the 6th of November last, after a voyage from England of forty-four days. He says :—

"Thus the object of the Executive Committee in sending me 'over-land,' is happily accomplished. But it had well nigh failed. I had a severe attack of illness in England. The truth is, I sailed from Boston ill of what proved to be pleurisy, which terminated in inflammation of the lungs. I recovered from the severity of those attacks, but found I had a cough and chronic inflammation of the lungs, from which I could not so readily get deliverance. When the day arrived, I went on board the ship and sailed for India, an invalid, contrary to the advice and warning of friends, and a physician in whom I had the fullest confidence. They assured me that, although I might live to reach Egypt, I could never cross the desert, and might be left there without a friend. But I passed through those 'deep waters,' as I had done before, and arrived at Calcutta, the other side of the world, in good health. O Lord, how wonderful are the dispensations of thy grace!"

WHITE SLAVERY.

The Cleveland True Democrat has been furnished with the following facts in regard to White Slavery at the South by a gentleman now there. Such things are to be expected. He that would enslave a colored person for money, would also a white person. A conscience that would permit the one would the other also. It was truly said by the Rev. John Wesley, that "Slavery is the sum of all villainies." Indeed, it is difficult to imagine a crime which is not committed under its guardianship.

A White Slave.—Washington, a white boy, was taken from Virginia to South Carolina, at the age of seven, and thence to Georgia, and sold to Col. B. His daughter, the lady of a lawyer, related to me the fact, saying that the little fellow used to tell the story to their children, and weep. His tale was this: that his mother was very poor, and at a time when she was sick, he was placed in a "negro quarter," in the care of a negro woman, and at night a man came and tied his feet and hands, and took him on horseback. He wept, and tried to scream; but the wretch placed his hands over his mouth. Col. B.'s wife prohibited his telling the story to the children, because it made them weep and unhappy. "Wash" died the slave of Col. B., at the age of 22.

Another.—Eliza was the offspring of parents n Virginia, in high life; but to conceal their guilt, their child, when an infant, was placed with a nurse at the "negro quarter," and was there raised. She was a few years ago sold, and is now owned by Mr. P. in a Southern city. She is white, and has no negro blood in her composition, and has raised up a family of colored children. She is very badly treated. This fact was told me by a lady, the wife of Judge *, a slaveholder, who resides in the same city.

Still Another.—A few years ago, a "negro trader" exchanged a colored slave for a little girl. On his arrival in Alabama, two or three slaveholders protested that the child was white, and finally paid $400 for her, and returned her to Georgia, where it was ascertained that her parents died poor, and that she was sold into slavery. The gentleman sent her to her kindred in North Carolina. The lady who told me this story, says she saw the little girl, and she was a most beautiful child.

Constitution of Wisconsin.—Somebody has sent us a copy of the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin, adopted in Convention, at Madison, on the first day of February, 1848. The following sections in relation to slavery, religion, and suffrage, will interest readers in other States as well as Wisconsin :—

Art. I., Sec. 2.—There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in this State otherwise than for the punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Art. I., Sec. 18.—The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience, shall never be infringed, nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; nor shall any control of, or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship, nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies or theological or religious seminaries.

Art. I., Sec. 19.—No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust under the State, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of his opinions on the subject of religion.

Art. III., Sec. 1.—Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, of the following classes, who shall have resided in this State for one year next preceding any election, shall be deemed a qualified elector at such election. 1st. White citizens of the United States. 2d. White persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization. 3d. Persons of Indian blood who shall have once been declared by law of Congress to be citizens of the United States, any subsequent act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. 4th. Civilized persons of Indian descent not members of any tribe. Provided, that the legislature may at any time extend by law the right of suffrage to persons not herein enumerated, but no such law shall be in force until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the people at a general election, and approved by a majority of all the votes cast at such election.

Letters and Parcels for our Missionaries.—To save answering several letters on hand, and also to inform all whom it may concern, I wish to say a few words about sending letters and parcels to our missionaries in China:—

1st. At the request of Br'n Carpenter and Wardner, I was appointed by the Board of the Missionary Association their agent in New York to receive and forward to them letters, papers, and parcels of every description—a duty for which I wish no other compensation than the consciousness of serving those who deserve it.

2d. Since they left, I have forwarded letters and papers by nearly every ship from New York for China, averaging as often as once in two months.

3d. I do not always know of the sailing of ships long enough before-hand to make the publication of notices serviceable.

4th. If you have letters or parcels for the missionaries, send them to me when they are ready, and they will go by the first ship. Letters should be sent in an envelop directed to me; and if sent by mail, the postage to New York should be paid by the sender. Parcels, also, should be paid for to New York, and I will see to the rest. Geo. B. Utter.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Senate.

A great part of the Senate's time last week was spent in considering the Treaty, in executive session. No decision was arrived at. For a time it was thought by the letter-writers that the Treaty would not be ratified. It is now thought that it will be adopted with few and slight modifications. The final vote will not probably be taken before third-day, March 7, and perhaps later.

The following are the principal items of general interest in the reports of the doings of the Senate:—

Mr. Clarke presented resolutions of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, in favor of bringing the war with Mexico to a close, &c. Mr. C. also presented a petition of a number of citizens of Rhode Island, praying that the war with Mexico may be brought to a speedy termination.

Mr. Hale presented numerous petitions from Ohio, Massachusetts, Illinois, Maine, Pennsylvania, and New York, praying for the withdrawal of the United States troops from Mexico, and the speedy termination of the war. Mr. H. also presented a number of Anti-Slavery petitions.

The bill conveying the franking privilege to Mrs. Louisa Catharine Adams, was received from the House, and was taken up, considered, and passed.

Among the petitions presented was one by Mr. Johnson of Maryland, from citizens of Baltimore, in favor of reducing postage on letters to a uniform low rate.

Mr. Webster presented a petition numerously signed by the citizens of Massachusetts, praying for a specific duty on fish imported from foreign countries.

Mr. Dayton of New Jersey, presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of said State instructing their Senators and Representatives, to support Mr. Whitney's plan of a railroad to the Pacific.

House of Representatives.

Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll of Philadelphia, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill granting to Mrs. Adams, widow of the late distinguished Ex-President, the franking privilege during life. The bill was passed unanimously and without discussion.

On motion of Mr. Marsh of Vt., the Speaker of the House was authorized to fill the vacancy in the Chairmanship of the Committee on the Congressional Library, caused by the death of John Quincy Adams. Mr. Palfrey of Mass., was appointed.

Mr. H. Putnam of N. Y., offered a resolution in favor of excluding slavery from all territory to be acquired from Mexico.

The bill providing for deficiency of appropriations for the current fiscal year, was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, but no action was taken.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamship Britannia arrived at Boston on Sabbath last, with two weeks later intelligence from Europe. Cotton is said to have risen, and grain declined, since previous advices.

The British Parliament had re-assembled, and the first debate of importance arose upon a motion for a select committee to inquire into the condition and prospect of the West India colonies. The Jewish disabilities bill, for enabling them to sit in Parliament, has been read a second time.

The inquiry into the state of the national defenses has ended in the determination of government to double the artillery force and embody 150,000 militia. The country at large is opposed to the measure.

Lord Palmerston has signified to the Austrian Court that any farther armed intervention with the Papal States, will be considered by Great Britain as a declaration of war.

The venerable Archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, died on the morning of the 11th ult., in the 82d year of his age.

The accounts from Ireland are truly distressing; deaths from starvation are stated to have taken place throughout the land. Political strife runs high between the three national parties there. The subdivided party from the young Ireland are vehement in their incitements for an immediate appeal to arms against England, but reprobated by the others.

The news from France is of little interest. The King's health is good. Le Courrier Francais says it has been arranged that Abd-el Kader, accompanied by four members of his family, shall come to Paris, on a visit to the King. The ex-Emir will then quit the capital, and fix his residence in one of the southern towns of France.

The people of the Two Sicilies have at length triumphed over the King. A form of constitution has been agreed to, founding a liberal legislative representation. The Roman Catholic religion alone will be tolerated.

A Funeral instead of a Bridal Ceremony.—Miss Nancy Bailey, of Merrimac, formerly employed in the factories here, visited Nashua last week, for the purchase of her wedding dress, bonnet, and bridal cake, &c., preparatory to her marriage on Wednesday. She had completed her purchases, and was on her way to the depot, Saturday evening, when the cars left. She therefore returned to the house of a friend, Mr. Mitchell, on Canal-st. About half-past three an Sunday afternoon, as she sat at the window, she threw up both hands, exclaiming, "Why, there is Mr. Drew!" [the name of the young man to whom she was to be married, and who is a resident of Concord, Vt.] Mrs. M. went to another window, but no one was in sight. At this moment a crash of glass called her attention to Miss Bailey, who had fallen forward against the window. Help was instantly called, and she was placed upon the bed, but with two gasps she lay a corpse. And when the bridegroom came it was to lay her in the grave whom he had hoped so soon to call his wife. [Nashua Oasis.

SUMMARY.

A lady called upon Dr. Meredith, a dentist in Cincinnati, on the 23d ult., for the purpose of having some teeth pulled. The chloroform was administered, and the doctor commenced operations. Previous to the extraction of the last root, the lady raised her hand as though wishing the dentist to desist, when he remarked to her that it was the last one, and could be done with ease, wishing her to put down her hand. With this request she complied, and placed her hand on the chair in a favorable position. A short time after this root was taken out, she seemed to revive for a moment, and was then seized with violent convulsions, after the cessation of which, she became gradually insensible. Every effort was made to restore her, but in vain; the vital spark had fled.

The St. Louis Reveille states that a villain, by the name of Pittis, some sixty years of age, recently paid his addresses to a handsome young widow, residing on McGoopin Island. Being rejected in his suit, he armed himself and went to the house; on her still persisting in refusing him, he struck her on the head with a hammer, and with a bowie knife attempted to cut her throat. Foiled in this attempt, and seeing a young man approach the house, he seized her by the nose and cut it off.

Late accounts from South America state that one of Morse's Telegraph apparatus has been received, and was to be put in operation between Lima and Calleo, a distance of about ten miles. The invention has been received with much favor, and the establishment of a regular telegraphic communication between the principal cities of the Pacific coast is recommended.

On Tuesday evening, while the other members of the family were in an adjoining room, an infant daughter of Mr. J. A. Schermerhorn of Lambertville, in New Jersey, who was lying in her cradle, was heard to cry violently, and upon searching for the cause, it was ascertained that a large rat had entered the apartment and attacked the child, who was found covered with blood. The voracious animal had bitten one hand entirely through in two places, which is much swollen and inflamed.

The Board of Canal Commissioners of Pennsylvania adopted the following resolution on the 25th ult.—"Resolved, That the several lines of the public works be opened for navigation as follows: The Delaware division, on the 1st of March next. The main line from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, on the 10th of March. The Susquehanna, and North and West Branches, on the 15th of March.

The colored inhabitants of Philadelphia and its vicinity contemplate making some public demonstration of respect to the memory of John Quincy Adams, and have a committee appointed to confer with the Mayor of the city, with the view of ascertaining whether a procession of the various societies to which they belong, will meet his approbation.

Judge Geo. W. Campbell of Nashville, Tenn. died on the 18th inst. The deceased has occupied seats in each House of Congress, was Chairman of the most important Committee in the House during Mr. Jefferson's Administration, and was Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate when war was declared. He was also Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Madison, and was afterwards appointed Minister to Russia by Mr. Monroe. He was, at the time of his death, 79 years of age.

The ship fever is prevailing extensively in New Orleans. The Charity Hospital had more than one thousand invalids, upwards of one-half of whom were sick with this disease. The establishment was calculated for only 350, and was therefore crowded to almost suffocation. On beds and over the floor the poor sick were laid. On a single day, 101 patients were brought there.

A singular case of probable murder has come to light at Yarmouth, N. S. A boy of 13 years, named Burke, was missing about two years since, and after a thorough search by the inhabitants, was supposed to have got lost and perished in the woods. The skull of the missing child was found on the 14th ult., near the home of the parents, with marks of shot in it, which leads to the supposition that he was murdered.

The whole of the line of railway between Darlington and York in England is being relaid with new rails, chains, and sleepers. The rail is of new invention, and of a very superior make, and is considered as a great improvement upon the old description, as the surface of the rail being convex, it presents much less surface to the wheel, and thereby the friction is much reduced—a great desideratum.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Delta, writing from New York, says:—"It is true that Mr. Astor has laid aside nearly half a million for the establishment of a free library in the city of New York. He has wisely limited the cost of the building to $60,000, so that his beneficence shall not, like Mr. Girard's, be thrown away on marble and mortar."

An act of the Ohio Legislature, of February 8, 1847, establishes the following as the weight of the bushel:—Wheat, 60 pounds; rye, flaxseed, and Indian corn, 56 pounds; barley, 58 pounds; cloverseed, 64 pounds; oats, 32 pounds.

The Kentucky Legislature has refused to admit a colored mechanic to move into that State from Virginia. Among the reasons assigned was this, that they wanted more white mechanics, and they should never have them until labor was made reputable.

Four hundred and fifty thousand hogs have been packed in Cincinnati the present season. The cause of the increase is said to be the great quantity of corn and the condition of the corn market.

In the New York State Lunatic Asylum, the weekly consumption of food is about 16 barrels wheat flour—1,800 pounds of beef and mutton—280 pounds salt fish—620 pounds butter, and 30 bushels potatoes, beside sundries, Indian meal, tea, coffee, &c.

At Mobile, on the 18th, while in a fit of jealousy, Francis Conklin, an engineer, caught his wife by the head, and inflicted a deadly wound with a razor. He then made an attempt to kill three other women who were present. Afterward he cut his throat—expiring immediately.

The Philadelphia North American says that when John Quincy Adams was stricken down, and it was known that he could not recover, there seemed a general melancholy wish that he might die on Washington's birth-day, as his father and Jefferson had died on the 4th of July. He lingered, however, until the 23d; but as this date is New Style, he actually expired on the anniversary of Washington's birth, which was the 11th of February, Old Style, which brings the anniversary correctly on the 23d, adding the twelve days for New Style.

The Methodist Church in Newport, Ky., was crowded on the night of the 18th ult., to overflowing, on the occasion of the presentation of a banner to the Sons of Temperance, by the ladies of that city. Just as the presentation speech was concluded, a crash was heard, and the crowd rushed for the doors and windows in terrific haste. One of the pillars in the basement had given way. The scene is represented as truly alarming. The cries of the ladies and the rush of the multitude, were terrible to hear. Fortunately no one was seriously injured.

The Chicago Daily Tribune says that David Kennison, one of the survivors of the famous party who made a dish of tea in Boston Harbor, is living in that city, at the advanced age of 114 years.

The Blackstone Chronicle, a new weekly gazette, independent in politics, but favorable to all true reforms, has just been started by Oliver Johnson, for many years an assistant in the editorial conduct of the New York Tribune. Of the old notes of the Chester County Bank, $420,000 were destroyed last week, by order of the Directors. The honest portion of the old issue now out, has been reduced to such a trifling amount that the bank robbers will not profit much by their ill-gotten booty.

A general meeting of the Professors of the University of Konigsberg (Prussia) was held lately, at which, by a majority of 22 against 7, the resolution was carried, that in future, Jews as well as Catholics, should be admitted to the professional chairs of that University.

A telegrapic dispatch to the New York Tribune, dated at Cincinnati, Feb. 28, says that the steamboats Hendrik Hudson, the Trenton, the Circassian, and a Maysville wharf boat, were all destroyed by fire this morning, a little after midnight, while moored to their landing in this city. The loss of property is very great. The Hudson was full freighted with a valuable cargo, and ready to leave for New Orleans, all of which is a total loss. Beside this lamentable destruction, there were four lives lost by fire and accident attending the calamity.

Lieutenant Mayne Reid, whose death was reported some time since, is about to be married to Signorina Guadeloupe Rozas, a beautiful lady, daughter of Senator Rozas, and said to be the wealthiest heiress in the valley of Mexico.

The Brunswick (Me.) Advertiser, states that among the medical students at the present session of the medical school at that place are several colored men.

Dr. Palmer, of Poughkeepsie, mentions a lady from whose mouth he removed seventeen diseased teeth while under the influence of chloroform. The lady in question is doing well, and is very grateful for escaping so much pain.

The Tribune says that a tract of land containing something like a thousand acres, hitherto entirely unimproved, south of Hicksville, Long Island, has been purchased for a company of Germans, who are to take possession in the Spring. As the land has not been tilled within the memory of man, its cultivation will be so much clear gain to the community, who will also gain by the addition of a body of honest and industrious Germans to their number.

The remains of Mr. Adams were to leave Washington on Monday, the 6th, and be conveyed to Baltimore on that day, conveyed to Philadelphia on Tuesday, to New York on Wednesday, and to Hartford, New Haven, &c., on Thursday.

Cotton Duck is manufactured at three factories near Baltimore. The American of that city states that last year they used of raw Cotton to the value of $246,659, and paid $90,102 in wages, and manufactured over 2,000,000 of yards of Duck. Formerly the cash went to Russia.

The scarlet fever, or throat distemper, as it is sometimes called, is a common disease in New England at the present time. It often defies the skill of the physician, and carries great alarm into families where it makes its appearance.

The number of copies of Sunday papers which are sold in this city every Sunday, is estimated among the paper-dealers to average 40,000.

The Legislature of New York has passed a general law for the establishment of manufacturing companies in the State. Under its provisions companies can be formed without any farther legislation. The provisions of the law are said to be very judicious, and well calculated to guard the public from loss.

REPUBLICATION OF
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

DWIGHT'S AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

THIS amusing and interesting Family Work, illustrated with many engravings, and containing an extraordinary variety and amount of valuable reading matter has closed the third volume, and subscribers to the fourth are invited. The character of this work is attested by the religious and secular press. It is warmly recommended to every family by the New-York Observer, Christian Advocate, Recorder, Express, Courier, &c.

The fourth volume, (beginning with January, 1848,) will be sent in numbers of 48 pages large octavo, for $2 a year, in advance, (free of postage.) The January number will be highly illustrated with about 25 engravings, some of them large and of the finest style. Among the original matter will be the first chapter of Carlo Carbonaro, or real adventures and scenes in Italy. The history of New York Public Schools, and Mr. Squier's discovery in the Western Mounds, both with illustrations, will be also in this number.

Vols. 1, 2, and 3, (each with about 800 pages and 150 engravings,) for sale in muslin, or half bound, at $2 50 each. For $10 those three volumes, and any work in the market, not over $1 50, will be delivered at the houses of purchasers in Boston, Buffalo, Baltimore, and intermediate places, free of charge; and volume fourth will also be sent monthly, as above.

Valuable seeds sent to subscribers. Seven copies of volume four for $10; three copies for $5.

Edited by Theodore Dwight, Express office, 112 Broadway.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

TEN YEARS AGO—TO MY WIFE.

BY GEO. W. DEWEY.

Come, draw thy chair beside me, love,
The present cares beguile;
What though the Winter croons around,
There's Summer in thy smile!
Let all thy smiles beam on me now,
And o'er the Future throw
The radiance of the joy we shared,
This day, ten years ago!

Ay, lean upon me lovingly,
And with those eyes of thine
Gaze, fondly, down the pictured Past,
As I do now with mine:
And may the golden light, which shone
Upon Hope's rosy glass,
Illumine all the mirror's disk
Whereon the visions pass.

How like the mirror on the wall—
Obscured by mists awhile,
Reflecting still the image there
When sunshine spreads a smile—
Is now the inward glass we search
For faded scenes of yore,
Which, warming in the light of love,
Will every tint restore.

Entwine thine arms around me, love,
Recalling by-gone hours,
The Present, to the Past, shall be
A rosary of flowers:
And as we reckon up the buds—
Some withered ere the bloom—
A tear shall mark the vacant spot
Of one within the tomb.

A cherished one, whose voice rung out
With music of the spheres,
Where now, in anthem melody,
A vocal part she bears.
Ah! vividly the glass restores
That rosy face of glee,
Which, though a semblance of myself,
An image was of thee.

We would not wish her here again,
For now we ever see
A cherub in the child we lost—
A sacred memory;
And, had she lived, a thing of earth,
To yield us earthly love,
We now would have no angel guide
To lead our thoughts above!

A DUMB LOVER.

At the time that Francis the First of France was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, one of his officers, the valorous Chevalier Bauregard, smitten by the charms of an Italian lady named Aurelia, of a noble family, declared his passion to her. Aurelia, although she was flattered by the declaration, refused his solicitations, on the ground of the levity of the French character, and their national indiscretion. The extreme violence of the chevalier's love urged him to propose to the lady to try his constancy. Aurelia accepted the proposition, and engaged to marry him if he would consent to remain dumb for six months. The chevalier promised, and from that moment never opened his lips. He returned to Paris, among his friends and relations, who lamented the singular infirmity he had brought with him from the army. Bauregard expressed only by signs, and the physicians were sent for. He refused their assistance. The captive king was at length restored to his people: but his joy at his return was diminished by the unfortunate chevalier, who was honored by the king's particular friendship. Francis sent his best doctors to his favorite, who this time accepted the medicine, but with no effect. The king went so far as to employ the charlatans, who then, as well as now, pretended to possess specifics for all evils. He then called in those who dealt in charms, but all to no purpose. All the court were hopeless of his cure, when a fair fortune-teller presented herself, and wrote to the king that she would undertake to restore the chevalier's speech. Being sent for, she was introduced to Bauregard, when she addressed him by that word, "Speak!" Bauregard immediately recognized in the stranger his beloved Aurelia, who had long witnessed his constancy and devotion. Francis was sensibly affected at the event, and presented him with a rich marriage portion.

MEHEMET ALI.

Mehemet Ali, the Pacha of Egypt, was a native of Albania, and appears to have been born in poverty. His father had ten children: and such was the spirit of Mehemet while yet a boy, that no one ever dared to contradict him. Before he was yet a man, he left his country, and traveled about, meeting with various adventures. Coming to Egypt, he enlisted as a soldier. He soon rose to the rank of captain, and, advancing by degrees, he attained the supreme command of the army. From this position it was an easy step to the throne. He became pacha or king of the whole country.

The disposition of Mehemet was despotic, and he is said to have boasted that he never had a master. He was not, however, like the preceding governors of Egypt. These were ignorant and selfish men, who ruled only to gratify themselves. They looked upon their subjects but as slaves created for the pleasure of their prince.

Mehemet had more elevated views, and was desirous of improving his country; but here a serious obstacle was in his way. The Mamelukes, a body of soldiers collected from various countries, had long exercised a powerful sway in Egypt. No pacha had yet dared to oppose them, or interfere with their wishes. Mehemet thought it necessary to get rid of them, and resorted to a terrible expedient for this purpose. In 1811, he invited them as if to a feast in the city of Cairo, the capital. When they were all assembled, amounting to several thousands, the cannon, which had been placed ready for the purpose, were discharged upon them at a given signal. The slaughter was terrible; all the proud Mamelukes were slain, except a few, who fled to other countries never to return.

Mehemet is absolute in his authority, but he governs according to certain rules and regulations. He has a council, consisting of his chief officers and the governors of provinces. He administers impartial justice to all his subjects, without regard to race or religion; has established regular judicial courts, and a good police; has abolished tortures and other barbarous punishments; has encouraged instruction to a certain extent; has removed most of the ignorant prejudices, which existed among his subjects, against the art and learning of Europe, and has introduced European manufactures and machinery. He keeps a printing-office, and publishes a newspaper; has formed schools and colleges for the arts and sciences, and for military and naval tactics.

A recent traveler states that Mehemet Ali was born in 1769, the same year which gave birth to Napoleon and Wellington. We are not disposed to give much faith to this statement; for, as the pacha never learned to read till he was forty years old, it is probable that his own recollection of the year of his birth was not very clear, and the wish must have been father to the thought of fixing the date as above. In person, he is of middle size, and dresses very simple. He thinks much of his reputation, and of the name which he will leave to posterity, and has for some years past employed his leisure hours in writing his own history. He has the foreign newspapers translated into Turkish for his perusal, and is not insensible to any calumnies which they contain against him.

His activity is very great. In studying history, it is hardly necessary to state that the lives of Alexander the Great and Napoleon have given him the greatest satisfaction. He has always shown the utmost degree of toleration in religious matters, and, in spite of the prejudices of the people, has, in some instances, raised Christians to the rank of bey—a thing before unheard of among Mussulmen.

MANAGEMENT OF HENS.

Hens, when properly attended, and supplied with good quarters, will lay as well in winter as in summer. We have published many facts which justify this assertion. One winter we fed our hens well with water and grain, but they had no extra care, and they did not lay well. The next winter we gave them extra attention, supplied them with various kinds of food, and generally with a warm breakfast of boiled potatoes, meal, &c., and they laid abundantly.

The eggs they laid in January were worth, at the market price, three times the amount they consumed. These experiments were with the same hens, with the disadvantage of being one year older the second year. In an account of managing hens from J. S. Sayward, Esq., of Bangor, he stated that 150 hens produced 1,900 eggs in the cold month of January—in a cold part of the country too.

Hens should have a warm house. It should face the south, and there should be glass to let in the sun. The situation should be a dry one, and well sheltered from cold winds. The house should be kept clean. The manure should be often removed, as the ammonia arising from it affects the eyes of fowls, and it produces diseases of various kinds. The best way is to catch the manure on a floor under the roosts, and remove it often, drying up the moisture on the floor with plaster, ashes, or saw-dust. The dung of hens is used by tanners, who often give a good price; it is also valuable for manure, being worth more than guano. The house should be warm, yet well ventilated in mild weather.

Give fowls plenty of food and grain, at all times, and occasionally a variety of other food, some of which should be animal. Keep them constantly supplied with pure water, gravel, ashes, and if convenient, with old lime mortar, pounded bones, chalk, and pounded oyster shells. Sunflower seed is good; so are all kinds of grain, and that kind may be used mostly that is cheapest, though it is best to keep two or three kinds by fowls, and let them take their choice, as they know best what they need.

CORK.

Many persons see corks used daily without knowing whence came these exceedingly useful materials. Corks are cut from large slabs of the bark of the cork tree, a species of the oak, which grows wild in the countries south of Europe. The tree is generally stripped of its bark at about fifteen years old, but before stripping it off, the tree is not cut down, as in case of the oak. It is taken while the tree is growing, and may be repeated every eight or nine years,—the quality of the bark continuing each time to improve as the age of the tree increases. When the bark is taken off, it is singed in the flames of a strong fire, and after being soaked for a considerable time in water, it is placed under heavy weights in order to render it straight. Its extreme lightness, the ease with which it can be compressed, and its elasticity, are properties so peculiar to this substance, that no efficient substitute for it has been discovered. The valuable properties of cork were known to the Greeks and Romans, who employed it for all the purposes for which it is used at present, with the exception of stopples for bottles; the ancients mostly used cement for stopping mouths of bottles, or vessels. The Egyptians are said to have made coffins of cork, which being spread on the inside with a resinous substance, preserved dead bodies from decay. In modern times, cork was not generally used for stopples for bottles till about the close of the 17th century, wax being till then chiefly used for that purpose. The cork imported into Great Britain is brought principally from Italy, Spain and Portugal. The quantity annually consumed is upwards of 500 tons.

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL PUTNAM.

During the war in Canada, between the French and English, when General Amherst was marching across the country to Canada, the army coming to one of the lakes, which they were obliged to pass, found the French had an armed vessel of twelve guns upon it. The General was in great distress; his boats were no match for her, and she alone was capable of sinking his whole army, in the situation in which it was placed. General Putnam came to him and said, "General, that ship must be taken." "Ay," said Amherst, "I would give the world if she was taken." "I will take her," said Putnam. Amherst smiled, and asked how. "Give me some wedges, a beetle, (a large wooden hammer or mallet, used for driving wedges,) and a few men of my own choice." Amherst could not conceive how an armed vessel was to be taken by a few men, a beetle and wedges. However, he granted Putnam's request. When night came, Putnam, with his materials and men, stole quietly in a boat under the vessel's stern, and in an instant drove in the wedges behind the rudder, in the little cavity between the rudder and the ship, and left her. In the morning, the sails were seen fluttering about, she was adrift in the middle of the lake, and being presently blown ashore, she was easily taken.

TRUE INDEPENDENCE.

Soon after his establishment in Philadelphia, Franklin was offered a piece for publication in his newspaper. Being very busy, he begged the gentleman would leave it for consideration. The next day the author called and asked his opinion of it. "Why, sir," replied Franklin, "I am sorry to say that I think it highly scurrilous and defamatory. But being at a loss on account of my poverty whether to reject it or not, I thought I would put it to this issue—At night, when my work was done, I bought a two-penny loaf, on which, with a mug of water, I supped heartily, and then, wrapping myself in my great coat, slept very soundly on the floor till morning; when another loaf and mug of water afforded me a pleasant breakfast. Now, sir, since I can live very comfortably in this manner, why should I prostitute my press to personal hatred or party passion, for a more luxurious living?" One cannot read this anecdote of this American sage, without thinking of Socrates' reply to King Archelaus, who had pressed him to give up preaching in the dirty streets of Athens, and come and live with him in his splendid courts—"Meal, please your Majesty, is a half-penny a peck at Athens, and water I can get for nothing."

Chloroform in Cases of Insanity.—At the Alms House in Baltimore, the wonderful effects of that remarkable agent, chloroform, were exhibited in a most striking and useful manner. It became necessary to remove to another department a man who had been brought in about a week since, a violent maniac, and who had continued in a condition of raving insanity, endangering all who approached him. The attending physician, Dr. Baxley, having been consulted by the overseer relative to his removal, determined to place him under the influence of chloroform, and with the aid of his assistant, in three-fourths of a minute, reduced him from a state of ungovernable fury and resistance, to one of perfect quietude and apparent sleep, thus enabling the proper officers to put on him a straight-jacket, and to remove him to a distant part of the building in a condition of non-resistance. When he awakened he was perfectly tranquil, conversed calmly and intelligently with his physician, and observing some one smoking in the room, expressed a wish to have a cigar, which was given him, and he presented a spectacle of singular composure and happiness, as contrasted with his raving madness a few minutes before.

A Human Divining Rod.—Among the smaller lions of Paris at present is an individual possessing great interest—the Cure Paramelle, the humble village priest—who has been sent for by the Academie des Sciences to enlighten that respectable corps of savans concerning the extraordinary gift which he possesses of discovering hidden springs beneath the earth. The Paris papers say that he has a touching simplicity of manners, and utter unconsciousness of the importance of the gift with which it has pleased Heaven to bless him. It appears that his powers are most extraordinary, that he has never once been deceived, but told on the instant, without hesitation, the exact spot where water may be found. He is singular among those who have hitherto possessed the art, in his utter independence of the divining rod, which he has never needed. He describes the sensation he experiences when walking over a spring, to be that of a keen and pricking pain in the throat and nostrils, like that occasioned by the inhaling of phosphorus or too strong a pinch of snuff.

Consumption.—Dickens gives the following description of this sad disease, which is constantly carrying sorrow and desolation into thousands of families:

"There is a dread disease, which so prepares its victims, as it were, for death; which so refines it of its grosser aspect, and throws around familiar looks, unearthly indications of the coming change—a dread disease, in which the struggle between the soul and body is so gradual, quiet, and solemn, and the result so sure, that day by day, and grain by grain, the mortal part wastes and withers away, so that the spirit grows light and sanguine with its lightening load, and feeling immortality at hand, deems it but a new term of mortal life—a disease in which death and life are so strangely blended, that death takes the glow and hue of life, and life the gaunt and grisly form of death—a disease which medicine never cured, wealth warded off, or poverty could boast exemption from—which sometimes moves in giant strides, and sometimes at a tardy, sluggish pace, but slow or quick, is ever sure and certain."

Tight Lacing and Red Noses.—If a foolish girl, by dint of busk and bones, and squeezing and bracing, secures the conventional beauty of a wasp-waist, she is tolerably certain to gain an addition she by no means bargained for, namely, a red nose, which, in numberless instances, we know is produced by no other cause than the unnatural girth obstructing circulation, and causing stagnation of the blood in that prominent and important feature. Often, in assemblages of the fair, have we seen noses, faultless in form, but tinged with the abhorred hue, to which washes and cosmetics have been applied in wild despair; but alas, in vain! If the lovely owners could have known the cause, how speedily the effect would have vanished; for surely the most perverse admirer of a distorted spine and compressed lungs, would deem the acquirement of a dram-drinker's nose too heavy a condition to be complied with.

The Jarra Tree.—This extraordinary timber grows to a size that would appear incredible. It is perhaps only manageable and remunerative from 50 to 60 feet, but in some of the districts of Africa it is found growing 120 and 150 feet in height before the first branch appears. Lander and his servant took refuge once from a storm in the hollow of an old Jarra tree, which not only sheltered themselves, but their horses, and the interior actually measured in diameter three times the length of the largest horse, an animal sixteen hands high and very long backed. The same parties found a Jarra tree, which had fallen completely across a broad and deep river, (called the Deep River) running between high and precipitous banks, thus forming a natural bridge, along which a bullock cart might have passed.

Rich.—A correspondent of an exchange gives the following specimen of evidence, given before a country "Justice of the Peace," by a novel reading milk-maid, who thought she must discourse like a book upon the whereabouts of a pedlar:

"On a pleasant morning, in the month of May, as the sun was rising majestically over the hills, in all its splendor, and the birds, awakened from their slumbers in the lofty trees, began to twitter and carol, and the mists began to rise like incense from the meadows, I took my pail and went forth to the barn-yard to milk the cows! I approached old Brindle, as she reclined rolling her cud sweetly, as she chewed it! She arose to her feet, and I commenced my morning task, when, as I sat upon the stool, James Pendleton came into the yard, with two tin chests, and said he was going to give me a present of a new gown, and he gave me the one I've got on, and then, taking an affectionate farewell, said he was going a peddling, and I guess he is peddling yet."

Bankruptcy in China.—The bankrupt system of the Chinese is said to be peculiar. All payments are required to be made before the close of their calendar year. If, in the last night of the old year, a debtor has left an account unsettled, he is visited at his house by his creditor, who seats himself, and, in unbroken silence, "watches the old year out and the new year in." When midnight has passed, the creditor arises, congratulates his debtor on the new year, and retires. The insolvent has then lost face. There is no credit for him afterwards.

VARIETY.

An "American Benefit Building Society" has been organized in New York. Its essence, says the Tribune, is this: Five or six hundred laboring poor men club together and pay in $2,50 each per month to form a Building Fund, which is intended to make each of them the owner of a small dwelling within ten years. The moment a few hundred dollars are paid in, it is advanced on mortgage to some one of the associates to buy him a house; the next sum to another, then another, until each one has his own house, all paid for by these small savings advantageously applied.

In the books of Darlington parish church, the following items appear, showing that, in the olden time, provision was made for comforting the inner man:—"Six quarts of sack to the minister who preached when he had no minister to assist, 9*s*. When the Dean of Durham preached here, spent in a treat in the house, 3*s*. 6*d*."

The process of hanging a cable across the gorge below Niagara Falls, where the International Bridge is to be suspended, was, as we learn from the Lockport Courier, accomplished in the following manner: A twine was first sent across the chasm attached to a kite. This done, the process of drawing over cords of increased size and strength, was an easy and simple task.

" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Instittnion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

THE HOLY LAND.—BY HARRIET MARTINEAU.

NAZARETH AND MOUNT CARMEL.

After mounting a very steep pass, and coming to a well, and winding round a hill once more, we came suddenly in sight of pretty Nazareth. Its basin of fertility is charming—its little plain, full of gardens and groves and fields, surrounded, as it seemed, completely by hills. The town is in fact a poor one; but, built of stone, and covering a good deal of ground, and extending a little way up the western slopes, it looks well from above.

Here, then, we had before our eyes the scenery amid which Jesus grew up. Its character cannot have changed very much since his day. A fertile basin among the everlasting hills, and the primitive little town which they protect, must bear much the same aspect from age to age. The great addition is the convent and church of the Latin monks; but these buildings do not stand out offensively to the eye, but mingle well with the flat-roofed stone houses of the town. In this convent we had to take up our abode. We longed to pitch our tents on the green below the town; but there was apprehension of rain, and it was thought better to go under the convent roof; which is truly a hospitable one.

I do not know what it is about the services of this church which is so affecting to strangers; but I observe that all travelers speak of the strong emotions excited here. Few believe that the places under the church are what they are said to be. Few believe that the little caves shown by the monks are the kitchen and sitting-room of the parents of Jesus; and that the spots marked out by two granite pillars are those where Mary and the Angel stood at the time of the annunciation. I do not at all believe that these places were thus consecrated; yet I have seldom been so moved as I was this afternoon in the Church of the Annunciation at Nazareth. We were at least in the place of residence of Jesus, and saw what he saw every day;—the hollows of the valleys, the outlines of the hills, the streams in their courses, and the wild flowers which every where on the slopes spread under foot. We were in the place which he called home. Entering the church with these impressions on our minds, we were saluted with a chant from a full choir;—a chant sonorous, swelling, and exact;—the best music, incomparably, that I heard abroad. It told upon our very hearts.

Of course, we visited the rocky recesses below the church which are called the abode of Joseph and Mary; and saw no reason to suppose that, while citizens of Nazareth, they lived in a grotto, rather than a house. We were shown, too, a portrait of Jesus, which the monks believe to have been copied from an original taken in his life time!—as if there had been portrait painting of that kind in those days! and as if the Jews would have considered it lawful if there had! Such ignorance on the part of the monks prevents our relying on any traditions given by them; and I will therefore say nothing of the other places pointed out as sacred by them. Nazareth itself is sacred enough; and it is merely offensive to one's feelings to speak of some of the strange stories the monks tell, and really believe, about Jesus and his family, in exhibiting what they declare to be the scenes of his life and daily actions.

The next day, the uppermost feeling throughout was of delight at the thought of the natural beauty amid which Jesus was reared. From the hights above the town we looked down into dells full of verdure; and abroad over the rich plain we had crossed the day before, and over toward Carmel, where we were going to-day. We rode among the hills for two hours, observing that clumps of forest trees became more frequent, and that the scenery was changing its character; and then we entered upon a tract which was so like the outskirts of an English nobleman's park, that I could hardly believe we were in the Holy Land. Rich grasses covered the slopes and levels, and clumps of ilex wooded every recess. We wound along under these clumps, and along the glades of the scattered forest, and upon broken banks, and then again through reaches of chequered shade. And how could we help thinking at every step who had once been here before us?

We were almost sorry to leave these park-like hills, though we were descending into the plain of Zebulon, and Carmel was before us, and we were about to cross the old river Kishon which Elijah knew so well when he lived in this region; and the blue sea was in sight; that sea from which Elijah's servant saw the cloud arise which was no bigger than a man's hand.

We rode at the foot of Carmel, keeping the river Kishon for the most part on the right hand. There could not be a finer place of assemblage than this plain for the children of Israel and the worshipers of the Sun (Baal) when Elijah summoned them to meet. From the foot of Mount Carmel, which stands out boldly into the sea, the beach stretches northward in a fine sweep of fifteen miles to Acre, and the old Tyre. The plain of Zebulon, thus inclosed between the Galilean hills, Carmel, and the sea, held the assembled multitude on that great day. The worship of the Sun was very imposing in all the countries where it subsisted. We have all heard of it as the worship of Apollo in Greece. I saw mighty temples to the same god, under the name of Ra, in Egypt and Nubia; and under the name of Baal, at Baalbec,—a few days' journey from this place at the foot of Carmel, where his host of priests was defied by Elijah. (1 Kings, xviii.) Here stood his four hundred and fifty prophets, in all their pomp.

Next we ascended the mountain itself; and we spent two nights in the convent on its hights; so that the whole scene is well impressed on my memory. We went down the mountain-side that afternoon, to see the caves where the schools of the prophets used to be; where the young men were gathered together to learn what was known of religion, and to prepare themselves for its administration. Whether the principal cave was really thus occupied or not, some use was certainly made of it in ancient times. We found it a large square grotto; a spacious apartment in the mountain-side,—cool, shadowy, and solemn. All about its entrance, and over all that side of the mountain, from the beach below to the convent on the hight, was a perfect jungle of hollyocks, ilex, odoriferous shrubs, herbs of many savors, and wild flowers as gay as the rainbow. Dry and drooping was all this vegetation when Elijah came hither at the end of the long drouth and cast himself down upon the earth while his servant watched on the ridge above. But oh! what an expanse of sky and of blue sea was there for the man's eye to range over while looking for a token of approaching rain! To-day there was not in all the sky a cloud so big as a man's hand; but instead of a cloud, there was, at evening, the everlasting sign of the silver bow. When the sun had sunk beneath the waters, and left a golden glow on both sea and sky, the young moon hung in the west yet a little while before the mild Spring night veiled from my watching eyes "the excellency of Carmel."

THE SABBATH.

There is nothing more derogatory to the dignity of human nature, than our prevailing blindness to good in those of another party or another faith. Like sheep we all follow our bell wethers, and each has no charity for any thing that can be done in an opposing flock. What we would laud our own party or sect for doing, we blame in an opposing party or sect. Lawful though it be, we cannot bear to learn of an enemy or a rival. If some other nation makes a valuable discovery, we either refuse to adopt it, or, if that cannot be done, we adopt it and claim that we discovered it first. The nation, party, sect, church, or clique that is not affected by this miserable weakness is hard to be found. Multitudes of examples of it might be gathered from all quarters, but the task is not pleasant. We would not speak of even one, if the road to the better country did not lie through the valley of humiliation.

Some weeks ago appeared in the Liberator a very ably drawn call for what was oddly enough denominated an "Anti-Sabbath Convention." From its object, as set forth, we should call it decidedly a Pro-Sabbath Convention—the only thing proposed to be done being what the fastest friends of the Sabbath should themselves be the first to do. We cannot for our life see why the Rev. Dr. Edwards, who is compassing sea and land to promote the better observance of the Sabbath, should not heartily join in it. But the press, and especially the "religious press," is raising the alarm against it as if it were the Asiatic Cholora. Why? Attached to the call are the names of William Lloyd Garrison, Theodore Parker, Mrs. Chapman, Stephen S. Foster, Abby Kelley Foster, Parker Pillsbury, Henry C. Wright, and others, in all thirty, of the same stamp.

Well, we don't agree with all these people, and perhaps not with any of them, in a great many things they say and do. But what a beautiful reason that would be for not acting with them on subjects where we do agree! What a beautiful reason for rejecting every thing which comes from them—right or wrong—without examination! If there is any such thing as human brotherhood—if there is in the human race any thing worth a journey from heaven to save it—then we should take special pains to coöperate with our opponents, with our enemies, with infidels, with heretics, with the vicious, with the rabid, with the almost lost, so far as they present any thing good to coöperate with. If there is a Christian in the land that will show us any other doctrine, we will show him that it is not Christ's.

This Convention goes for abolishing all penal laws for enforcing the "religious observance of the first (or any other) day of the week as the Sabbath"—nothing more, whatsoever.

The Harbinger pronounces this object a "silly affair." But we beg leave to differ entirely from that able and generally correct journal. It is of the very substance of that religious liberty from which all our other liberties sprung. To one who despises all religion, as the Harbinger certainly does not, it may be a silly affair. But to one who prizes the religious as the highest of all human sentiments, as a matter not of priestly stock-in-trade, but the avant-courier of the upward progress of the individual and the race—a sentiment which saves and ennobles every moment of our mortal existence by binding it to the eternities—it is by no means a small affair. Such a one shudders at nothing more than to see religion represented by a constable and a club, saying, "Be holy or be fined, go to Heaven or to the House of Correction."

Have we not boasted of giving up this mode of promoting religion long ago? Have we not said to Europe and all Christendom, "See what the voluntary principle will do in religion?" Are we not sending missionaries to convert the old world from popery? Have we not utterly divorced church and state? And is all the improvement we have effected from the dispensation of Moses, that, whereas a man was stoned to death under that for picking up sticks on the Sabbath, he is now only fined two dollars and costs or sent to jail for a month?

It is religion that is interested in this question—ay, Sabbath-keeping, church-going religion even—as to irreligion, it could not be better pleased than with the laws as they now are, in all our States but Louisiana. In Louisiana there may be more horse-racing and dancing and theatre-going on Sunday, but there church-going religion can say, "The people I draw are mine; they are not made hypocrites by law; they are not driven to church. I have full play upon the conscience and the heart."

In New England, if you say, "No thanks to Christianity for these full churches," the only reply is, "The law is a dead letter." Then let it be buried; and let not the atmosphere any longer be polluted by its putrescence. Surely this is a work worth the time it will cost to all the friends of religion and humanity. These penal laws for the observance of the Sabbath are a part of a code which has long ago been consigned to the bats, and why they should stay on our statute books any more than laws compelling tithes to the parsons or forbidding us to eat meat on Friday, is more than any rational man can tell. The state does not depend on the church, why should the church depend on the state? What, in the name of common sense, has the state to do with the way I choose to spend the first day of the week, provided I do not invade the rights of my neighbor, or harm any thing which is not mine?

It is true that those who have called the Convention believe all days of the week alike. This is a controversy between them and the majority of the people, and especially the ecclesiastics. In this they may be wrong, but it will be difficult for their opponents to convince the people they are so, till they take away the penal laws. They have far more interest in abolishing the laws than the Anti-Sabbatarians have. At present the latter, if they have not the best argument, have the best fulcrum to use it on.

A TOUCHING MEMORIAL.

Few of our readers but will read with deep and even tender interest the following copy of verses, written by Mr. ADAMS on the day preceding his fatal attack of illness, and designed to accompany his autograph signature, which had been requested by a female friend:

Written for Miss C. L. Edwards of Massachusetts, on the day preceding his attack.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
QUINCY, MASSACHUSETTS.

In days of yore, the poet's pen
From wing of bird was plundered,
Perhaps of goose, but, now and then,
From Jove's own Eagle sundered.
But, now, metallic pens disclose
Alone the poet's numbers;
In iron inspiration glows,
Or with the minstrel slumbers.

Fair Damsel! could my pen impart,
In prose or lofty rhyme,
The pure emotions of my heart,
To speed the flight of time;
What metal from the womb of earth
Could worth intrinsic bear
To stamp with corresponding worth
The blessings thou should'st share?

HENRY BOYD.

HENRY BOYD was a slave in Kentucky. Of imposing stature, well-knit muscles, and the countenance of one of nature's noblemen, at the age of eighteen he had so far won the confidence of his master, that he not only consented to sell him the right and title to his freedom, but gave him his own time to earn the money. With a general pass from his master, Henry made his way to the Kanawha salt works, celebrated as the place where Senator Ewing, of Ohio, chopped out his education with his axe! And there, too, did Henry Boyd chop out his liberty. By performing double labor, he got double wages. In the day-time he swung his axe upon the wood, and for half the night he tended the boiling salt kettles, sleeping the other half by their side. After having accumulated a sufficient sum, he returned to his master and paid it over for his freedom. He next applied himself to learn the trade of a carpenter and joiner. Such was his readiness to acquire the use of tools, that he soon qualified himself to receive the wages of a journeyman. In Kentucky, prejudice does not forbid master mechanics to teach colored men their trades.

He now resolved to quit the dominions of slavery, and try his fortunes in a free state, and accordingly directed his steps to the city of Cincinnati. The journey reduced his purse to the last quarter of a dollar, but with his tools on his back, and a set of muscles that he knew how to use, he entered the city with a light heart. Liitle did he dream of the reception he was to meet. There was work enough to be done in his line, but no master-workman would employ "a nigger." Day after day did Henry Boyd offer his services from shop to shop, but as often was he repelled, generally with insult, and once with a kick! At last he found the shop of an Englishman, too recently arrived to understand the grand peculiarity of American feeling. This man put a plane in his hand and asked him to make proof of his skill. "This is in bad order, sir," said Boyd, and with that he gave the instrument certain nice professional knocks with his hammer, till he brought it to suit his practised eye. "Enough," said the Englishman; "I see you can use tools." Boyd, however, proceeded to dress a board in a very able and workmanlike manner, while the journeymen from a long line of benches gathered round with looks that bespoke a deep personal interest in the matter. "You may go to work," said the master of the shop, right glad to employ so good a workman. The words had no sooner left his mouth, than his American journeymen, unbuttoning their aprons, called, as one man, for the settlement of their wages. "What, what!" said the amazed Englishman, "what does this mean?" "It means that we will not work with a nigger," replied the journeyman. "But he is a first-rate workman." "But we won't stay in the same shop with a nigger. We are not in the habit of working with niggers." "Then I will build a shanty outside, and he shall work in that." "No, no; we won't work for a boss who employs niggers. Pay us up and we'll be off." The poor master of the shop turned with a despairing look to Boyd—"You see how it is, my friend, my workmen will all leave me. I am sorry for it, but I can't hire you." Even at this repulse our adventurer did not despair. There might still be mechanics in the outskirts of the city, who had too few journeymen to be bound by their prejudices. His quarter of a dollar had long since disappeared, but by carrying a traveler's trunk, or turning his hand to any chance job, he contrived to exist till he had made application to every carpenter and joiner in the city and its suburbs. Not one would employ him. By this time the iron of prejudice, more galling than anything he had ever known of slavery, had entered his soul. He walked down on the river's bank below the city, and throwing himself upon the ground, gave way to an agony of despair. He had found himself the object of universal contempt; his plans were all frustrated, his hopes dashed, and his dear-bought freedom made of no effect! By such trials, weak minds are prostrated in abject and slavish servility, stronger ones are made the enemies and depredators of society, and it is only the highest class of moral heroes that come off like gold from the furnace. Of this class, however, was Henry Boyd. Recovering from his dejection, he surveyed the brawny muscles that strung his herculean limbs. A new design rushed into his mind, and new resolution filled his heart. He sprang upon his feet and walked firmly and rapidly towards the city, doubtless with aspirations that might have fitted the words of the poet—

> "Thy spirit, INDEPENDENCE, let me share,
> Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye."

The first object which attracted his "eagle eye," on reaching the city, was one of the huge river boats laden with pig-iron, drawn up to the landing. The captain of the craft was just inquiring of the merchant who owned its contents, for a hand to assist in unloading it, "I am the very fellow for you," said Boyd, stripping off his coat, rolling up his sleeves, and laying hold of the work. "Yes, sure enough, that is the very fellow for you," said the merchant. The resolution and alacrity of Boyd interested him exceedingly, and during the four or five days whilst a flotilla of boats were discharging their cargoes of pig-iron with unaccustomed dispatch, he became familiar with his history, with the exception of all that pertained to his trade, which Boyd thought proper to keep to himself. In consequence, our adventurer next found himself promoted to the portership of the merchant's store, a post which he filled to great satisfaction. He had a hand and a head for everything, and an occasion was not long wanting to prove it. A joiner was engaged to erect a counter, but failing by a drunken frolic, the merchant was disappointed and vexed. Rather in passion than in earnest, he turned to his faithful porter: "Here, Henry, you can do almost anything, why can't you do this job?" "Perhaps I could, sir, if I had my tools and the stuff," was the reply. "Your tools!" exclaimed the merchant in surprise, for till now he knew nothing of his trade. Boyd explained that he had learned the trade of a carpenter and joiner, and had no objection to try the job. The merchant handed him the money, and told him to make as good a counter as he could. The work was done with such promptitude, judgment and finish, that his employer broke off a contract for the erection of a large frame warehouse, which he was about closing with the same mechanic who had disappointed him in the matter of the counter, and gave the job to Henry. The money was furnished, and Boyd was left to procure the materials and boss the job at his own discretion. This he found no difficulty in doing; and what is remarkable, among the numerous journeymen whom he employed, were some of the very men who took off their aprons at his appearance in the Englishman's shop! The merchant was so pleased with his new warehouse, that he proceeded to set up the intelligent builder in the exercise of his trade in the city. Thus Henry Boyd found himself raised at once almost beyond the reach of the prejudice which had well-nigh crushed him. He built houses and accumulated property. White journeymen and apprentices were glad to be in his employment, and to sit at his table. He is now a wealthy mechanic, living in his own house in Cincinnati, and his enemies who have tried to supplant him have as good reason as his friends to know that he is a man of sound judgment and a most vigorous intellect.

Without having received a day's schooling in his life, Henry Boyd is well read in history, has an extensive and accurate knowledge of geography, is an excellent arithmetician, is well informed in politics, having been for several years a regular subscriber to several of the best newspapers published at the west. He is public spirited, and is remarkable for his morality, generosity, and all those traits which mark a noble character.

"DEAL GENTLY."

It is a mistaken notion, that the man who has "bowed down to drunkenness," may be reformed by coercion—by rigid and uncharitable treatment—or by admonition clothed in harsh and repulsive language. There is something in our very nature that will not brook dictation; there is a stubborness, if you choose so to term it, in the human heart, which will yield only to the spirit of kindness. Our word for it, if the advocates of the temperance cause would seek out the victims of the intoxicating bowl, and strive to win them back to the paths of soberness by kind acts and gentle but not officious persuasion, they would have but little need to wage a political warfare against the venders of ardent spirits. Use all gently—

"Where'er an erring brother
Departs from Honor's path,
Rebuke him not too harshly,
Nor turn away in wrath;
But point out to him kindly
The path he should have trod
And thou wilt gain his blessing,
And the approval of thy God."

GEORGE WHITEFIELD AND JOHN WESLEY.

Few characters could be more completely the converse, and in the church's exigencies more happily the supplement of one another, than were those of George Whitefield and John Wesley; and had their views been identical, and their labors all along coincident, their large services to the gospel might have repeated Paul and Barnabas. Whitefield was soul, and Wesley was system. Whitefield was a summer cloud, which burst at morning or noon in fragrant exhalation over an ample tract, and took the rest of the day to gather again. Wesley was the polished conduit in the midst of the garden through which the water glided in pearly brightness and perennial music, the same vivid stream from day to day.

After a preaching paroxysm, Whitefield lay panting on his couch, spent, breathless, and deathlike; after his morning sermon in the Foundry, Wesley would mount his pony, and trot and chat and gather simples, till he reached some country hamlet, where he would bait his charger, and talk through the little sermon with the villagers, and remount his pony and trot away again. In his ærial poise, Whitefield's eagle eye drank lustre from the source of life, and loved to look down on men in assembled myriads; Wesley's fallen glance did not sweep so far, but it searched more keenly and marked more minutely where it pierced. A master of assemblies, Whitefield was not match for the isolated man;—seldom coping with the multitude, but strong in astute sagacity and personal ascendancy, Wesley could conquer any number, one by one. Whitefield was the powder blast in the quarry, and by one explosive sermon, would shake a district, and detach materials for other men's long work; deft, neat, and painstaking, Wesley loved to split and trim each fragment into uniform plinths and polished stones. Or, taken otherwise, Whitefield was the bargeman or wagoner, who brought the timber of the house, and Wesley was the architect who set it up. Whitefield had no patience for ecclesiastical policy, no aptitude for pastoral details; with a beaver like propensity for building, Wesley was always constructing societies, and with a king-like craft of ruling, was most at home when presiding over a class or conference. It was their infelicity that they did not always work together; it was the happiness of the age, and the furtherance of the gospel, that they lived alongside of one another.

PRAYER.

The following beautiful simile, taken from a sermon of Jeremy Taylor, has been admired for more than a hundred and fifty years, and will continue to be admired as long as a taste for fine writing prevails:—

Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our care, and the calm of our tempest.

He who prays to God with an angry or troubled spirit, is like the man who retires into the midst of a battle for meditation, or sets up his closet in the out-quarters of an army. Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer; it is directly opposed to that which presents our prayers in a right line to God. For so have I seen a lark, rising from its bed of grass and soaring upwards, singing as it rises, and hoping to get to heaven, and climbing above the clouds; but the poor bird was driven back by the loud sighing of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconsistent, descending more at every breath of the tempest than it could recover by the vibration and frequent weighing of its wings, till the little creature was found to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over, and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing as though it had learned music and motion from an angel as he passed through the air about his ministries below. So it is when a storm rises in the spirit and overrules the good man; his prayer is broken and his thoughts troubled; his words go upward, toward a cloud, and his thoughts call them back again, and make them without intention.

The good man sighs for his infirmity, but he must recover it when his anger is removed, and his spirit is becalmed and made even as the brow of Jesus, and smooth like the heart of God; then it ascends and dwells with God; until it returns laden with the blessing and dew of heaven.

DEATH OF ADDISON.—Most affecting and impressive was the closing scene of Addison's life, as described by Dr. Young. After a long and manly, but vain struggle with his distemper, he dismissed his physicians, and with them all hopes of life; he dismissed not his concern for the living, but sent for a youth nearly related to him, and finely accomplished, yet not above being the better for good impressions from a dying friend. He came, but life now glimmering in the socket, the dying friend was silent. After a decent and proper pause, the youth said: "Dear Sir, you sent for me; I believe and hope, that you may have some commands; I shall hold them most sacred." May distant ages not only hear but feel the reply! Forcibly grasping the youth's hand, he softly said, "See in what peace a Christian can die." He spoke with difficulty, and soon expired.

"IT BEGAN IN THE PRAYER MEETING."—A brother in a distant field, writing to the Presbyterian Herald concerning an interesting work of grace in his church, says—"I think the work will not stop here. It began in the prayer-meeting, which has been so crowded for weeks past, that often persons were obliged to leave for want of room." The place where it began is one of the best evidences, that it is a genuine work of the Spirit, as well as that it will continue.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New-York, March 16, 1848.

CHINESE TRANSLATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

A fact has been communicated to us respecting the existing translation of the New Testament into Chinese, which we deem of vast and solemn importance. It seems that in this translation the days of the week are arranged after a new order, exactly adapted to mislead the unwary in relation to the day which they ought to keep as the Sabbath. The first day of the week, or Sunday, is called Loi pai, the Sabbath; Monday, Pai ye, the first day after the Sabbath; and so on to Saturday, Pai lak, the sixth day after the Sabbath. Thus the Chinese reader is left to suppose that the Sunday, which immediately follows what is called the sixth day after the Sabbath, is the seventh day of the week, and consequently that in keeping it he is obeying the fourth commandment, which says "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."

Granting the correctness of the foregoing statement, it is easy to see that important results must hang upon this change of language and thought. The difficulty which has long been felt of explaining how the observance of the first day of the week is obedience to the command to keep holy the seventh day, no longer exists. The frequent use of the term Sabbath in the New Testament, without any intimation that the day was to be changed, ceases to trouble the conscientious observer of the first day. Indeed, all those knotty questions which have been raised by the discussion of the subject of the Sabbath in this country and England, are put to rest. The whole matter is so completely wrapped or snarled up, that nobody will think of unraveling it; and so things may go on swimmingly.

There is, however, a possibility of trouble yet remaining. Suppose a Chinese convert should commence the study of theology, and should get possession of some of the standard works upon the subject, in which the change of the Sabbath is discussed. He would naturally want to know about the matter, and might ask questions which it would be difficult to answer. Or, suppose a Sabbath-keeping missionary should set up his standard in China, and should display the fourth commandment upon his banner, accompanied with such explanations as his practice would require; the consequences might be unpleasant to those who had taken the trouble to make the Chinese translation tally so completely with their own practice.

This is really a serious affair, and one to which we intend to allude more at length when we are better acquainted with all the facts. Few persons appreciate the importance and solemnity of the work of translating the Scriptures. It is desirable that those who undertake it should be made acquainted with some of the consequences which may result from consulting their own theories, rather than the original text, in their translations.

The above article was written several weeks ago, on the receipt of the information to which it refers. We have since read a statement by Dr. Devan, one of the Baptist missionaries to China, from which we judge that the new translation which has been made is not likely to give general satisfaction. It seems that in 1843 the Protestant missionaries in China became impressed with the necessity of a better translation of the Bible, and agreed to enter upon the work of preparing one. The following resolution was adopted to guide them:—

"Resolved, That the whole body of Protestant missionaries to the Chinese, do form a General Committee for the purpose of revising the translation of the Scriptures in the Chinese language, and that this Committee be subdivided into local Committees of stations, each to consist of all the missionaries at that station; that the work of revision be subdivided and apportioned to the several stations. That when each local committee has completed its task, a transcript thereof can be sent to each station for further revision, and then these transcripts, with the corrections upon them, shall be submitted to the original revisers. When the whole of the New Testament shall have been thus revised, each station shall select one or more of its most experienced men to act as delegates in a meeting of the General Committee, it being understood that each station will be entitled to one vote only, and these shall be the final judges as to the propriety of each revision, after which the whole shall be submitted to the Bible Societies in Great Britain and America, for their acceptance."

In accordance with this resolution, the various local committees entered upon their work, and prepared their translations, transcripts of which were to a limited extent sent to the several stations for revision. In the early part of 1846, a letter was sent from Shanghai, where the General Committee was to meet, requesting the missionaries at Canton to appoint their delegation to the final meeting. The letter stated that there would not be time to notify Mr. Goddard, of the Baptist mission at Bankok; and that it would be necessary to proceed without his presence. Now it happened, that at that time Mr. Goddard, Dr. McGowan, and Dr. Devan, were the sole representatives of the American Baptist Missionary Union among the Chinese. The former was the only one of the three at all skilled in Chinese literature, and he had fulfilled the part of the revision assigned him, and had forwarded for examination to the several stations a transcript of his work, as the resolution provides, and had reëxamined his effort. But Mr. G. being passed by, and the other two not feeling prepared in literary knowledge and inclination to represent the Union in such an important measure, they did, early in the year 1848, in the name of the American Baptist Missionary Union and the American and Foreign Bible Society, unanimously and formally protest against the publication of the work to be prepared at Shanghai as a work of the combined Evangelical missions to the Chinese.

Thus the matter stood at last accounts. The Baptists will of course be charged with having withdrawn, and blamed therefor. There is reason to hope, however, that their movement will lead to a closer scrutiny of the new translation, and perhaps to its improvement.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP—NO. 3.

Since writing my last communication for the Recorder, the report of an interesting trial in the District Court of the city and county of Lancaster, Pa., has fallen into my hands, which goes to confirm the views taken in a former number, and establishes, not only the position that secret societies do possess the means of evil, and may endanger the liberties of the people and defeat the due administration of justice, but that its members are disposed to avail themselves of that power, and have actually attempted to wield it in a case where a large amount of property was in dispute.

The following is a summary of the proceedings before Judge Hays. Parties in the suit, Jacob F. Markley vs. Abraham Zook, Executor of Mrs. May, deceased. Debt on a bond executed by a testatrix, in May, 1839, for $2,000, with interest. The defense set up was, that the bond was given without consideration, but merely as a loan to plaintiff to enable him to borrow money. The bond was witnessed by George C. Lloyd and Francis X. Zeigler. Defendant called Francis X. Zeigler, who testified to his writing the bond, &c., &c.

Mr. Stephens, attorney for the defendant, asked witness, Have not you heard Markley say something about this bond lately, since you were subpenaed in this suit? If so, state it.

Witness—Yes, about two weeks ago Markley was down with me, and we had some private conversation, but it was private.

Mr. Stevens—No matter, state it.

Witness—It was private.

The Court, Judge Hayes—If it related to the bond, state it.

Witness—He said he wanted justice, nothing but justice, and said some other things.

Mr. Stephens—State those other things exactly as they took place.

Witness—He said he wanted justice in this suit, and he wished me to come into Lancaster and speak to his friends, and—

Mr. Stephens—Was friends the word he used, sir?

Witness—It was not just the word.

The Court—Remember, you are on oath.

Witness—He said he wished I would come into Lancaster and speak to THE BRETHREN, and get them to interest themselves for him, and they would influence the jury in his favor.

Mr. Stephens—Whom did he mean by THE BRETHREN?

Witness—He is an Odd-Fellow, and he meant his brother Odd-Fellows.

Mr. Stephens—Did he call on you as an Odd-Fellow to do this?

Witness—He said he would have been proud to hail me as a brother. I am an Odd-Fellow, but do not meet with them for some time.

Mr. Ford, for the plaintiff—Is there any thing in the obligations of Odd-Fellows, which requires one brother to help another, contrary to justice?

Mr. Stephens—I object to that form of the question, because it gives the inference of witness, which, with members, is always in their own favor. State the oath or obligation of the Odd-Fellows which requires them to aid each other, and the jury will judge of its tendency.

Mr. Ford to the Court—That cannot be done, as the obligations are numerous.

The Court—Let him give the clause of the obligation by which he was called on by the defendant.

Mr. Stephens—Now, sir, state the obligation truly.

Witness—That is one of the secrets of the Order, which I never will disclose.

Mr. Stephens—You are sworn to tell the whole truth. Proceed as the court have directed you.

Witness—I will not disclose it. I claim it as a privilege from the Court not to disclose the secrets of the Order.

The Court—There are no privileges here.

The counsel then conversed together, and said they would not pursue it any farther, as Mr. Ford did not press his question. Verdict for defendant.

Now what confidence can we place in the declaration of Odd-Fellows, that there are no secrets in the Order but the signs, grip, &c., and that the interests of community are not jeopardized by the existence of Odd-Fellowship, or that there is nothing in the Order that renders an Odd-Fellow unfit for church membership, when such facts as these are disclosed, and when an Odd-Fellow uses Odd-Fellowship as a means of influencing a witness and a jury to obtain a verdict, and when a witness, bound by a solemn oath to tell the whole truth, refuses to testify, preferring the guilt of perjury to disclosing important truth.

We might show that secret societies, Odd-Fellowship as well as others, do exert a controlling influence on elections as well as on witnesses and jurors, but we reserve these proofs to a future number, and shall close the present number by showing that a Seventh-day Baptist has no occasion to join a secret society—that the Gospel makes abundant provision for all his wants, and furnishes him every thing necessary to every good work. The Christian has a divine promise of support, so that he has no occasion to say, What shall I eat, or what shall I drink, or wherewithal shall I be clothed? for our heavenly Father knoweth that we have need of these things. Christ directed his hearers to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." The Gospel not only makes the promise of providing for the necessities of the poor saints, but it furnishes examples of its fulfillment, where it inspired the hearts of the brethren with the most exalted benevolence—a benevolence which puts the boasted benevolence of Odd-Fellowship completely in the shade. See Acts, chap. 15: 32—35. Here the brethren sold their houses and lands, (when there was occasion for it,) and cast the avails into one common fund from which distribution was made to every one who stood in need. It will be objected, that this benevolence was confined to the early period of Christianity, and that Christians do not now recognize the principle of supporting their poor brethren. To which I answer, that whatever other Christian denominations may do, the Seventh-day Baptist churches in the vicinity of the writer—and I believe this may be said of the churches in general—do actually provide for their indigent brethren when in sickness or want; and some of the churches, (though neither wealthy nor large,) have been heavily taxed for years, and yet have no notion of abandoning the practice.

Before closing this number I will meet an objection in the mouths of most Christian Odd-Fellows with whom I have conversed, viz. That if the churches were what they should be, there would be no occasion for Odd-Fellowship. This is indirectly saying, and not very indirectly either, that Odd-Fellowship is better than the churches as they now exist. If they believe this, they will feel little or no regret at being excluded from the church when they have found a better institution. But if they do not believe this, why not labor to reclaim the church, and bring her back to primitive purity, instead of going over to a society in which deists and profane swearers find a ready admittance. E.

REVIVAL AT MARLBORO, N. J.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Believing as I do that the readers of the Recorder would be highly gratified to learn that the good work of the Lord is prospering in any part of the world, and especially among our own brethren, I hasten to send you the following.

Some two weeks ago, we commenced a series of meetings at Marlboro, Salem Co., N. J., assisted by Bro. Summerbell from Plainfield, N. J. We had not proceeded far, before it was discovered that God was about to pour out his spirit, and revive his work among us. The brethren and sisters began to work, and confess their sins, and weep around the altar of God; backsliders began to return, (some of whom had been suspended for more than 20 years;) and the impenitant began to cry for mercy, many of whom found peace in believing. Sabbath morning, a week ago, Elder Clawson had the privilege of leading twelve willing converts down into the water, who, we hope and trust, have risen to newness of life; also, last Sabbath morning, four more followed their Lord and Master in his ordinances. The work is still going on, and we should rejoice to witness the same things every Sabbath day. May the Lord revive his own cause in the hearts of all his dear children. A number of the above have lately embraced the Sabbath of the Bible.

Yours, &c., I. D. TITSWORTH.

SHILOH, N. J., March 6, 1848.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.—At the recent monthly meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, it was stated that the receipts for the month of February were $24,000, an increase of $4,000 as compared with February, 1847. During the last seven months $139,000 had been received by the Society, an increase of $29,000 over the receipts of the corresponding months of 1846–7. In the course of the meeting, Rev. Mr. Calhoun stated that as Lord Cowley was about to leave Constantinople for England, the Turkish Sultan asked him what favor or kindness he would desire at his hands; the reply was, toleration to the Protestants, and so it was decreed. Mr. Calhoun had just received a letter from Mr. Benjamin, intimating that at the American Church, Constantinople, four new members had been recently admitted, the present number of communicants being 98. He also read a letter from Mr. Whiting relative to an Arab, a man of ability and property, a Protestant, who had been imprisoned for the sake of his faith, and chained. The letter is dated from the missionary station at Beyroot in Syria, and tells of 7 males and 3 females being admitted into the church, their native tongue being Arabic, and the probability great that the most of them would become preachers of Christianity. The Arab, Harree, has a young wife. Mr. Calhoun remembers to have seen her sitting on the clay floor of her dwelling, trying to learn to read. In this she succeeded. All the Arabian women who had come within the influence of the Gospel lived in such a way as to be a credit to their country, affording an excellent example to society. Their households are well ordered, and their families happy. Their female relatives who have not embraced Christianity generally lead improper lives. Mr. Calhoun, when a missionary, had resided on Mount Lebanon, well known in scriptural story. He believed that civil liberty would follow the attainment of their religious emancipation, by the churches thus founded by our missionaries in the heart of the Mahommedan empire. The churches are LITTLE REPUBLICS, and, enlightened by religious and moral instruction, will soon demand and assuredly obtain from the Turkish Government free institutions.

REAL PHILANTHROPY.—It is said that a plain and unpretending man named Davis, who resides upon his farm in New Jersey, about ninety miles from New York city, and who has long been in the habit of bringing his produce here to market, commenced the novel experiment some time since, of gathering together, wherever he could find them, the destitute and unemployed in our midst; and on his return, conveying a company to his own neighborhood, for the purpose of locating them in families where they could earn a livelihood. His efforts in this line succeeded so well, that he was encouraged to continue them, and since February, 1847, he has actually conveyed from this city seven hundred and eighty of this class of persons, and introduced them to employment in various sections, where they are earning an honorable subsistence, improved in health, redeemed and saved from pauperism and its demoralizing tendencies.

BIRTH-DAY VISIT.—On first-day, January 23d, Rev. Dr. Nott, pastor of a church at Franklin, Ct., reached the advanced age of 94 years. It has been the custom of his people, for a long time, to make him a visit on each returning birth-day. This year they came together on the day following the 23d, which, being propitious, at an early hour the old time-honored mansion was filled with happy, warm-hearted friends of every age, from the octogenarian to the child of a year, embracing whole families as well as solitary individuals, and including not only those who were upon the stage sixty-six years ago, but the contemporaries also to the sixth generation, all commingling in happy groups, each anxious to salute and honor their devoted pastor, whose birth-day had brought them together.

MONTHLY MISSIONARY MEETINGS IN THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.—A letter from Bro. James H. Cochran, informs us that an adjourned meeting of the Western Seventh-day Baptist Association was to be held with the church in Hartsville, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the evening of the 15th of March. The object of this meeting is to present the claims of the missionary and other benevolent operations of the day, and if possible to excite the churches to take more efficient measures for sustaining them. The meeting recently held at Genesee, was a good one; considerable interest was manifested, and liberal collections were taken up.

RELIGION IN GIRARD COLLEGE.—One of our exchanges says that Girard College, from which all religion was to be excluded, is after all not abandoned to utter atheism. One who has visited the College writes that morning prayers are read by the Matron, and that the children are all instructed to say their prayers at night. The prayer-book of the Episcopal church is used, and much sound religious truth will be inculcated, contrary to the design of the founders.

LIBERAL CONTRIBUTION.—On first-day, Feb. 21st, Rev. Mr. Kirk presented the claims of the Evangelical Society of Geneva, at the Presbyterian Church in Mercer-St., New York, when one thousand dollars was contributed to carry forward its plans.

REVIVAL.—The pastor of the church at Attleboro, Mass., writes to the editor of the Boston Recorder, that for the last six months, a work of grace has been in progress among his people, during which there have been fifty cases of hopeful conversion.

A CAUTION WHICH OUGHT TO BE HEEDED.—A correspondent of the Home Missionary, speaking of the difficulties with which churches at the West have to contend, gives the following caution to the eastern churches:—

"Could I address the churches at the East, I would say—Be very cautious in the reception of members. When you admit a person, you say, emphatically, 'We believe you are a Christian, prepared for the church triumphant.' If you encourage him to trust in a false and delusive hope, he will in all probability be lost forever. Those who here apostatize, exert the strongest influence against religion, and their case is more hopeless than any others. Beware of that liberal human policy which tolerates gross inconsistencies among professors, and which practically lowers the standard of God's law."

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The Second Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona, N. Y., this day, at a regular church-meeting, passed the following resolution, and instructed me to forward it to you for publication, for the benefit of all whom it may concern:

Resolved, That all persons belonging to this Church, and living out of the town of Verona, are requested to correspond with this Church within six months from this date, and after that at least once a year. All who do not comply with this request will be considered as having gone out from the Church, and will be dismissed from our records.

ABEL G. BURDICK, Church Clerk.

VERONA, March 3d, 1848.

The remains of John Quincy Adams passed through New York last week, in charge of the Committee of the House of Representatives. The Funeral Procession on the occasion, was very large and imposing.

Henry Clay visited New York last week. There was a procession on the day of his arrival, and he occupied most of the week in receiving the calls of his friends, and visiting the various public works and institutions of the city.

PROTESTANTISM IN TURKEY.

The Sublime Porte has at length placed Protestant Christianity on an equality with other forms of Christianity in the Turkish Empire. The document by which this is done, has been sent not only to the minister of revenue and police of the capital, but also to the Pashas of Trebizond, Erzeroom, Damascus, Aleppo, and to the Governor of Nicomedia. The following translation of the document is made by a correspondent of the New York Observer, who regards the event as marking the commencement of a new era in the history of Christianity in the East:—

"Whereas the Christian subjects of the Ottoman government, professing Protestantism, have experienced difficulty and embarrassment from not being hitherto under a separate and special jurisdiction, and owing to the natural inability of the Patriarch and the heads of the sects which they have seceded from to superintend their affairs; and

"Whereas it is in contravention to the supreme will of his Imperial Majesty, our gracious Lord and Benefactor, (may God increase him in years and power,) animated as he is with feelings of deep interest and clemency towards all classes of his subjects, that any of them should be subjected to grievance; and

"Whereas the aforesaid, (Protestants,) in accordance with the creed professed by them, do form a separate community,

"Therefore it is his Imperial Majesty's supreme will and command, that for the sole purpose of facilitating their affairs and of securing the welfare of the said Protestants, the administration thereof should henceforward be confided to your Excellency, together with the allotment of the taxes to which they are subjected by law; that you do keep a separate register of their births and deaths in the department of the Ihtissab according to the system observed with regard to the Latin rayahs; that you do issue the passports and permits of marriage; and that any person of established character and good conduct chosen by them to appear as their agent at the Porte for the transaction and settlement of their current affairs, be duly appointed for that purpose.

"Such are the Imperial commands which you are to obey to the letter. But although the issue of passports and the allotment of the taxes are placed under special regulations which cannot be infringed, you will be careful that in pursuance of his Majesty's desire no tax or khorateh be exacted from the Protestants for permits of marriage and registration; that any necessary assistance and facility be afforded them in their current affairs; that no interference whatever be permitted in their temporal or spiritual concerns on the part of the Patriarch or priests of other sects; but that they be enabled to exercise the profession of their creed in security; and that they be not molested one iota in that respect, or in any other way whatever."

FROM THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The ship Brutus arrived at New York a few days since, bringing files of papers from the Sandwich Islands to Nov. 6, 1847. Rev. Wm. Richards, formerly of the American missionaries, but lately His Majesty's Commissioner to the United States, France, and England, died at Honolulu, Nov. 7, 1847, of an affection of the brain. His death is a great loss to the nation to whose interest he has been zealously and unceasingly devoted for the last twenty-four years, and in whose service he spent his best energies. Rev. C. Forbes, lady, and four children, Mrs. Dibble, Miss M. Dibble, and three children, and Master Emerson, all of the American Board of Missions, sailed for New Bedford in the A. H. Howland about the 1st of November.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.—We have examined this work somewhat carefully, and find that it is, as it professes to be, an English library fused down into one book. It contains not only a fund of reading derived from the works of the most distinguished writers in the English language, but a biographical and critical history of each of the writers and of literature itself. The character of the embellishments, and the general style in which the work is got up, are highly creditable to the American publishers. We do not know of any form in which so much reading matter, and that so valuable, can be obtained for the same price.

CONVERSIONS FROM ROMANISM.—There are frequent conversions in Western Pennsylvania among the German Catholics to the Protestant faith. "One poor woman," writes a colporteur, "brought me $1, as a thank-offering to the Tract Society, for the truth she had learned from its publications. Another brought me her 'Rosary,' saying, 'I find more religion in the Bible you gave me, than in this; I give it up to you.' Two other Germans brought money, one $2 and the other $5. Not less than six Germans within the last few days have expressed a hope that God has forgiven their sins. They are a grateful, kind-hearted people, and read with close attention the books and tracts I have given them."

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The American Messenger says that the sums contributed in four cities in Connecticut to the Tract Society, are,

Hartford,	$2,350
New Haven,	1,200
New London,	736
Norwich,	523
Total,	$4,809

"Why is it," says the Messenger, "that these four cities give more to this and other causes, than some entire States? Not because of their wealth or business; but chiefly because the claims of benevolence are understood, and Christian principle is deep-rooted and operative. A habit of intelligent giving is formed and fostered, and the results are blessings to the world."

DR. DEVAN, the Baptist missionary who recently returned from China to this country, has accepted an appointment, and gone to join the mission of the Baptist Union in France.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, a great part of last week was spent in Executive Session, considering the Treaty of Peace with Mexico. At nine o'clock on Friday evening, the Senate adjourned over to Tuesday, having ratified the Treaty by a vote of 38 to 15. The injunction of secresy having been removed, the exact terms of the treaty will of course soon be known. It has been approved by the President, and dispatched to Mexico. Besides this, there was not much business done.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the principal subject under consideration was the bill, which was finally passed, for supplying the deficiencies in the appropriations of the current year. A bill was also discussed providing for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government.

On Friday, a disgraceful quarrel occurred in the House, between Mr. Haralson of Georgia, and Mr. Jones of Tennesee, who came to blows. When their heat was somewhat cooled off, they recovered their senses, and both made apologies which were entered on the Journal of the House.

LATER FROM CHINA.

The ship Panama, which left Canton on the 14th of December last, arrived at New York on the 11th inst., after the very short passage of eighty-six days. She brings intelligence of a serious outbreak, and prospects of hosttlity between England and China, in consequence of the murder of six Englishmen, near Canton. It appears that on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 5th, a party of five persons left the factories in a Hong boat, intending to proceed a short way up the river, and then land for a walk, returning in time for dinner. They did not come back, and on Monday there was much excitement and great alarm for their safety. A party was immediately formed to go in search of them; they returned in the evening, having ascertained that their missing friends landed near some villages on the Fa-tee Creek, and that there had been a disturbance. It was afterwards ascertained that on landing, the villagers surrounded their victims, a strong party intercepting their retreat to the boat. An attack was made with stones, and a gentleman being struck in the mouth and severely injured, drew a pistol and shot one of the assailants. More shots were fired, and it is said that from three to five Chinese were killed. Two of the foreigners were murdered at this place. The others fled inland, and were hunted from village to village until they were all destroyed. Another report says they took refuge in a Joss house, and were taken out and deliberately decapitated. In consequence of this movement the English were in a state of high excitement, and it is feared that very serious difficulties may follow, unless the Chinese authorities take active measures to detect and punish the aggressors.

FROM YUCATAN.—The Tribune says that news of the most important character has been received at Washington, by the Commissioner from Yucatan, Señor Sierra. The Indians have arisen in a body, and have taken the field, to the number of forty thousand, as it is stated. They have begun their warfare by committing the most horrible massacres on the whites, laying waste the whole country, devastating towns and villages, and slaughtering the inhabitants without regard to age or sex. They have procured arms and ammunition from the Balize. Señor Sierra has applied to our Government for assistance, in arms, &c., and has asked that a portion of the Home Squadron be dispatched to put a stop to the exterminating career of the savages.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.—An Act of Congress, approved 2d February, 1848, makes farther provision for surviving widows of soldiers of the Revolution, entitling the widows of all such soldiers, whose marriage took place before the 1st of January, 1794, to receive for and during their natural lives, from and after the 4th of March, 1848, the annuity which would have been allowed to their husbands by the Act of June 7, 1832, if living at the time it was passed, subject to the same restrictions as are prescribed in the Act of 1838, granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows. And farther, all widows entitled to the benefits of this latter Act are admitted to the benefits of the Act just passed.

Everybody has heard of the celebrated fat man, Daniel Lambert. He was once keeper of the House of Correction at Leicester, where some of his relatives now reside. Mr. Lambert Brown of that place recently presented a memorial to the Town Council, stating that the Corporation was in possession of an "old arm-chair," which was once occupied by his uncle, Daniel Lambert, and he wished to procure it as a memento of his "great ancestor." This remark provoked a laugh, but the request was granted, and Mr. Lambert Brown took the "old arm-chair" home and said he should hand it down as an heir-loom.

Gov. Briggs, at the Temperance meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, stated that the report of the Committee appointed to inquire in regard to the idiots in the Commonwealth, showed that there were from 1,200 to 1,300 of that unfortunate class, and also the astounding fact that 1,100 to 1,200 of them were born of drunken parents!

A drop or two of honey well rubbed on the hands while wet, after washing with soap, prevents chapping, and removes the roughness of the skin; it is particularly pleasant for children's hands and faces in cold weather.

SUMMARY.

Who can give any information about a certain Thompson Mack, or Mark, a native of the East Indies, whose wife was a colored woman by the name of Diana? They lived about eight years ago, somewhere in William-st., in this City. There is a young man who claims to be their child, and who says he was kidnapped eight years since, carried to Richmond, Va., in company with some other boys, and there sold into slavery. Having escaped from the prison-house, he wishes to hear about his parents. Information can be left at No. 22 Spruce-st.

By the bark Wave, Captain Fensley, news has been received that the Province of Yutagan is at present in a most deplorable condition. The Indians continue their work of slaughter, burning and destroying everything, even the cattle, horses and dogs, and sparing none but the unmarried females. About one-third of the fertile part of the Peninsula is entirely desolate, on account of these devastations.

At Oberlin, Ohio, on the night of the 2d inst., a fire broke out in the bookstore of J. M. Fitch, proprietor of the Oberlin Evangelist. This store was consumed, as also four other buildings—one occupied by W. H. Plumb as a store, another by Mr. Rider as a store, others by the Post-office, a shoe-shop, and goldsmith's shop. The dwelling-house of Mr. Fitch was destroyed, and the establishment of the Oberlin Evangelist, together with the books, list of subscribers, &c.

The Legislature of Kentucky closed its session on the 11th inst. Thirty persons were divorced by them on the last day of the session, by one bill. An act to suppress gambling, and also another law taxing specifically bowie-knives, pistols, dirks, and other weapons, usually worn concealed about the person, were passed this session.

The Annual Report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the Legislature of Maryland shows that the Finances of the State are in a highly favorable condition. The expenses of the past year have been reduced $50,000, in comparison with the year preceding, while the revenues have been increased $100,000 in the same time. The debt of the State is now $10,000,000.

A man named Aaron M'Millan, living in Saline county, Illinois, and his three sons, went to the house of a neighbor, named Logston, against whom they had become incensed, because his dog had attacked and mutilated M'Millan's cow, and deliberately shot him, after which they beat in his skull with the barrel of the gun. The son of the deceased attempted to interfere, when he was beaten severely with clubs. The guilty parties were arrested.

A correspondent of one of the Cincinnati papers states that the Buena Vista battle-field is still covered with bones, coats, pants, shoes, knapsacks, &c. And what is most singular of all, is, that a few Mexicans who were left unburied were still on the battle-field entire. Neither putrefaction nor the wolves prey upon them, but they are dried up like mummies.

The United States Navy had in commission last November, 63 vessels, viz: 5 ships of the line, 1 razee, 4 frigates, 13 sloops, 6 brigs, 11 schooners, 4 bomb gun vessels, 2 ordnance transports, 12 steamers, 6 store ships. Not in commission, 1 ship of the line, 8 frigates, 10 sloops, 2 steamers.

The white population of Virginia in 1840 was 740,968, according to the tithable in 1846, 820,985—an increase of 80,017.

Mr. Russell, whose accident by the drifting of a stage in Upper Canada was noticed two weeks ago, has been compelled to submit to the amputation of both his hands. The two operations were performed simultaneously a little above each wrist, Dr. Nelson operating on one limb, and Dr. Campbell on the other. The case afforded an instance of the efficacy of chloroform. The operations occupied about seven minutes, and at the close of the seventh, some slight pain was felt. We are glad to learn that Mr. Russell is likely to recover, and that his legs and feet will be, in all probability, saved.

Edward Wiley, Esq., a merchant of Savannah, who failed in business some years ago, and compounded with his creditors by an equal distribution of his means among them, has since discharged the moral obligation resting upon him by paying up all the arrearages from which he had been legally discharged. His creditors, to mark their high sense of Mr. Wiley's mercantile honor and moral integrity, have presented to him two elegant silver pitchers, with appropriate inscriptions.

A dreadful accident occurred at Baltimore, March 8. A brick wall on South Charles-st. fell with a loud crash, burying four unfortunate laborers and a horse in the ruins. All were dreadfully mangled, their limbs broken, and their flesh bruised. Two of them can scarcely survive; the others will perhaps recover, but must always bear the tokens of serious injuries.

There is no reason to doubt (says the New Orleans Delta) the truth of the report that Santa Anna, the great Mexican, whose energy has sustained this war, and communicated whatever of vigor has characterized the defense of Mexico, had received his passports from our Commander-in-chief, and ere this has arrived in Vera Cruz on his way to foreign parts.

A new three story wooden building is going up in South Water Street, Chicago, where washing is to be done by steam on a large scale. The more special design is to do the washing for the steamboats and other crafts coming into that port, though it will be sufficiently large to do considerably more.

MARRIED,

At Mystic Bridge, Ct., on Tuesday, March 7th, by Eld. Geo. B. Utter, Mr. EDWIN G. CHAMPLIN, of New York, to Miss MARY A. GREENMAN, of Mystic Bridge.

DIED,

In Jackson, Shelby Co., Ohio, on the evening of the 20th ult., SARAH FORSYTHE, wife of Dea. John Forsythe, in the sixtieth year of her age. She was educated to keep the first day of the week for the Sabbath; but about the twentieth year of her age, her parents embraced the Sabbath of the Lord, and gave their children the privilege of doing as they thought right on the subject; and she, with them, embraced the Sabbath. She became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Lost Creek, Harrison Co., Va., of which she continued a member until she removed to Clark Co., O., where she united with the church, and continued a member until she removed to Jackson, whence she has gone to join the church triumphant in heaven. Her life has been an example of piety. She has used her influence for the cause of temperance, and has remembered the oppressed as bound with them. Her days have been numbered in promoting the glory of God and the happiness of man, and though she is dead she yet speaketh. May her devoted life and happy death long live in the memory of all surviving relatives and friends. She has left brother Forsythe to mourn the loss of a kind and tender companion; a number of children, the loss of an affectionate mother; and brethren and sisters the loss of a devoted sister. On the 22d her remains were taken to the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Jackson, and after a funeral sermon by the writer—text, Rev. 14: 13—were interred in the church-yard of that place, there to sleep till God shall bid her rise. J. H.

On third-day, the 7th inst., JANE YOUNGS, in the 73d year of her age, relict of the late Frederick Youngs, many years a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh, N. J. For several years past she has suffered much from disease, and the infirmities incident to old age, which she bore with cheerfulness and resignation. Her hopes of eternal life were evangelical and constant, and she came to her end in peace and serenity of mind.

On the 10th inst., in the 74th year of his age, Elder WILLIAM PARKINSON, for 35 years Pastor of the First Baptist Church in the city of New York.

In Sangerfield, N. Y., February 21st, Mrs. MARY SPENCER, consort of Job Spencer, aged 62 years. Mrs. Spencer was an acceptable member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield.

RECEIPTS FOR MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Treasurer of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association acknowledges the receipt of the following sums since his last report in the Recorder:—

From church in New York, coll. at concerts,	$30 22
" C. M. Lewis, Newport, R. I.	1 25
" A friend of the Missionaries, Alfred, N. Y.	5 00

☞ It may be well in this connection to state, that at the last meeting of the Board, the Treasurer and Recording Secretary were directed to make a remittance to the missionaries at an early day. There is not money enough now in the Treasury; but it is presumed that there are sums in the hands of individuals, contributed for the mission, sufficient to meet the present want. This should be forwarded at once to the Treasurer, A. D. Titsworth, Metouchin, N. J.

CHRISTIAN PSALMODY.

THE New Collection of Hymns with this title, prepared by a Committee of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, was published on the 10th day of Sept. last, and is for sale at this office. It contains over one thousand hymns, together with the usual table of first lines, and a complete index of particular subjects, the whole covering 576 pages. The work is neatly printed, on fine paper, and bound in a variety of styles to suit the tastes and means of purchasers. The price in strong leather binding is 75 cents per copy; in imitation morocco, plain, 87½ cents; ditto, gilt edges, $1 00; ditto, full gilt, $1 12½; in morocco, full gilt, $1 37½. Those wishing books will please forward their orders, with particular directions how to send, to GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

SONG OF THE SNOW-BIRD.

BY MISS GOULD.

The ground was all covered with snow one day,
And two little sisters were busy at play,
When a snow-bird was sitting close by on a tree,
And merrily singing his chick-a-de-de.

He had not been singing that tune very long,
Ere Emily heard him, so loud with that song,
"O sister, look out of the window," said she;
"Here's a dear little bird, singing chick-a-de-de.

"Poor fellow! he walks in the snow and the sleet,
And has neither stockings nor shoes on his feet;
I pity him so! how cold he must be!
And yet he keeps singing his chick-a-de-de.

"If I were a bare-footed snow-bird, I know,
I would not stay out in the cold and the snow;
I wonder what makes him so full of his glee,
He's all the time singing that chick-a-de-de.

"O mother! do get him some stockings and shoes,
And a nice little frock, and a hat, if he choose;
I wish he'd come into the parlor and see
How warm we would make him, poor chick-a-de-de."

The bird had flown down for some pieces of bread,
And heard every word little Emily said;
"What a figure I'd make in that dress!" thought he,
And he laughed as he warbled his chick-a-de-de.

"I'm grateful," he said, "for the wish you express,
But I have no occasion for such a fine dress;
I had rather remain with my limbs all free;
Than to hobble about singing chick-a-de-de.

"There is ONE, my dear child, though I can't tell who,
Has clothed me already, and warm enough too,
Good morning! O, who are so happy as we?"
And away he went, singing his chick-a-de-de.

EXAMPLES FOR BOYS.

Governor Ritner, who was for some time a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and afterwards Governor of that State, was once a bound boy to Jacob Myers, an independent farmer, who brought him up. While he was Governor, there was a celebration of the 4th of July at which Mr. Myers gave the following toast: "Joseph Ritner—he was always a good boy, and has still grown better; every thing he did, he always did well; he made a good farmer, and a good legislator; and he makes a very good Governor." All this man's greatness was the result of being a good boy.

Roger Sherman, in his public life, always acted so strictly from his own conviction of what was right, that Fisher Ames used to say, if he happened to be out of his seat in Congress when a subject was discussed, and came in when the question was about to be taken, he always felt safe in voting as Mr. Sherman did, "for he always voted right." This was Mr. Sherman's character every where. But if we inquire how it came to be such, we must go back to his early life.

Mr. Sherman's character was formed upon the principles of the Bible. And when he was an apprentice, instead of joining in rude and vulgar conversation so common among the class to which he then belonged, he would sit at his work with a book before him, devoting every moment to study that his eyes could be spared from the occupation in which he was engaged. When he was twenty-one years of age, he made a profession of religion. He was as familiar with theology as he was with politics and law. He read the Bible more than any other book. Always, when he went to Congress, he would purchase a copy of the Bible at the commencement of the session, to read every day, and when he went home he would present it to one of his children. Mr. Lacon, of Georgia, said of him, that he had more common sense than any man he ever knew.

Mr. Jefferson, one day, as he was pointing out to a friend the distinguished men in Congress, said to him, "This is Mr. Sherman, a man who never said a foolish thing in all his life." Mr. Sherman was a self-educated man, a shoemaker by trade in his early years, but in after years he became a Lawyer, a Statesman, and most of all a Christian. He was brought up after the old New England fashion, in a pious Connecticut family. As was the boy, so was the man. If you would have an excellent character it must be formed after the model delineated in the Holy Bible. The basis must be a change of heart. The superstructure must be laid upon the principles of God's word.

BONAPARTE'S HABITS.

His partiality for the bath he mistook for a necessity. He would usually remain in the bath two hours, during which time I used to read to him extracts from the journals and pamphlets of the day, for he was anxious to hear and know all what was going on. While in the bath, he was continually turning on the warm water, to raise the temperature; so that I was some times enveloped in such a dense vapor that I could not see to read, and was obliged to open the door. Bonaparte was exceedingly temperate, and averse to all excess. His flatterers, probably under the idea that sleep is incompatible with greatness, have evinced an equal disregard of truth in speaking of his night-watching. Bonaparte made others watch, but he himself slept, and slept well. His orders were, that I should call him every morning at seven. I was, therefore, the first to enter his chamber; but, very frequently when I awoke him, he would turn himself, and say, 'Ah! Bourrienne, let me sleep a little longer.' When there was no very pressing business, I did not disturb him again till eight o'clock. He in general slept seven hours out of the twenty-four, besides taking a short nap in the afternoon.

Among the private instructions which Bonaparte gave me, one was very curious: 'During the night,' said he, 'enter my chamber as seldom as possible. Do not awake me when you have any good news to communicate; with that there is no hurry; but when you bring me bad news, rouse me instantly, for then there is not a moment to be lost.' This was a wise regulation, and Bonaparte found his advantage in it.

[Bourrienne's Memoirs of Napoleon.

HOW TO MAKE A CHURCH MISERLY.—Keep out all agents—set your face against all contributions—complain of the extravagance of missionaries—keep away from the monthly concert, lest you should be called upon to give something for the support of missions—and the heart of such a church will soon become as unfeeling as a rock. It is a fact worthy of being remembered—that those churches who give the most frequently—not only give the most in amount—but are the most benevolent—they love to give.

CATCHING COLDS AND CURING THEM.

Colds are sometimes produced in the following manner:—When a person in cold weather goes into the open air, every time he draws in his breath, the cold air passes through his nostrils and windpipe into his lungs, and consequently, diminishes the heat of these parts. As long as the person continues in the cold air he feels no bad effect from it; but as soon as he returns home, he approaches the fire to warm himself, and very often takes some warm and comfortable drink to keep out the cold, as it is said. The inevitable consequence is, that he will perceive a glow within his nostrils and breast, as well as over the whole surface of the body. Soon afterwards, a disagreeable dryness and huskiness will be felt in the nostrils and breast. By-and-bye, a short, dry and tickling cough comes on. He feels a shivering, which makes him draw nearer to the fire, but all to no purpose; the more he tries to heat himself, the more he becomes chilled. All the mischief is here caused by the violent action of the heart. Such being a frequent cause of cold, the following rules for avoiding the complaint may be adopted with great advantage:

When you come out of a very cold atmosphere, you should not at first go into a room that has a fire in it, or, if you cannot avoid it, you should keep for a considerable time at as great a distance as possible, and above all refrain from taking warm or strong liquors when you are cold. This rule is founded upon the same principle as the treatment of any part of the body when frost-bitten. If it were brought to the fire, it would soon mortify; whereas, if rubbed with snow, no consequences would follow from it. Hence if the following rule were strictly observed when the whole body, or any part of it is chilled, bring it to its natural feeling and warmth by degrees, the frequent colds we experience in winter, would, in a great measure, be prevented. [Dr. Graham.

GOLDSMITH.

There are few names which convey to the mind more pleasant emotions than that of Oliver Goldsmith. He was born at Pallas, in Ireland, November 10, 1728. His father was a poor clergyman with seven children, of whom Oliver was the fifth. The latter was deemed a dull boy, and he was thought unfit for any learned profession. It was supposed that he might make a tolerable merchant, and with this view he was turned over to the care of the village shoolmaster.

Young Oliver had plenty of good stuff in him, and it soon began to show itself in flashes of wit, and a curious turn for making rhymes. His uncle and other relatives now thought him good for something, and accordingly he was sent to college in 1744. Here he had a bad tutor, and the boy became idle and unruly. In the mean time, his father died, and, after a time, his uncle induced him to attempt to enter the church as a minister; but, on application for a license, he was rejected. He now determined to study law, and, being furnished by his uncle with a sum of money for the purpose, he set off for London to take rooms in what is called the Temple. Stopping at Dublin, he engaged in gambling, and lost every penny in his purse He was obliged to return home; but the kindness of his uncle was not yet exhausted. He forgave his offences, and sent him to Edinburgh to study medicine. In two years, he went to Leyden, in Holland, where he continued his studies, though leading a dissipated and irregular life.

Though he was entirely without money, and had only one clean shirt, young Goldsmith now resolved to make the tour of Europe. Accordingly he set out on foot, and, strange to say, traveled through France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, during which time he appears to have fared very well. He had some knowledge of music, and carried with him a small musical instrument. At night, when he wanted lodging, or at other times, when he needed a meal, he would approach the house of a farmer, or a mechanic, and begin to play one of his merry Irish tunes. The people were always pleased with the music, and the poor traveler received the lodging or food which he needed.

After traveling in this way for a year, Goldsmith returned to London. He was entirely destitute of money, and was glad of any employment which gave him subsistence. At first, he became assistant in a school, then he served in an apothecary's shop, and after a time set up as a physician. By the practice of medicine, and writing for magazines, he managed to get a living. At last, he was arrested for a small sum of money, and, while under arrest, sold his beautiful story of the "Vicar of Wakefield." For this his friend, the celebrated Dr. Johnson, got him sixty pounds, or about 300 dollars.

His reputation as a writer soon rose very high, and at intervals he published the "Traveler," the "Deserted Village," the "Hermit," and other charming works, which have rendered his name so dear to all readers of English. He wrote several comedies, one of which, "She Stoops to Conquer," was very successful, and brought him considerable money. He also wrote the pleasing histories of Rome, Greece, and England, and a large work entitled "A History of the Earth and animated Nature." For the latter he received more than $4,000.

Goldsmith had now many friends, great fame, and the means of living in affluence. But, unhappily, he was entirely destitute of self-government. Great as was his genius, wonderful as was his power of delighting mankind, he indulged his passions, often drank to excess, and frequently lost large sums in gambling. He was thus in constant trouble, and a source of vexation and anxiety to his friends. In 1774, he was taken ill of a fever, and, his mind being disturbed by the poverty which haunted him, the disease made rapid strides, and on the 4th of April, he died, at the age of forty-five.

The life of Goldsmith is full of instruction He was endowed by nature with great genius, but, owing to weakness of character, this did not insure happiness. He had not strength of purpose sufficient to induce him to pursue any object steadily. He was too idle and capricious to qualify himself for a profession, or to succeed in the practice of it. He became an author merely for subsistence, and wrote only as much and as often as his necessities required. He was ever ready to yield to the impulse of the moment, and was thus frequently drawn into difficulty. While he has contributed largely to the pleasure and profit of mankind, his own life was but a series of disappointments and sufferings. [Merry's Museum.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN GIRLS.—The English girl spends more than one half of her waking hours in physical amusements which tend to invigorate and ripen the bodily powers. She rides, walks, drives, rows upon the water, runs, dances, plays, sings, jumps the rope, throws the ball, hurls the quoit, draws the bow, keeps up the shuttlecock, and all this without having it forever pressed on her mind that she is thereby wasting her time. She does this every day, until it becomes a habit which she will follow up through life. Her frame, as a necessary consequence, is larger, her muscular system better developed, her nervous system in better subordination, her strength more enduring, and the whole tone of her mind healthier. She may not know as much at the age of seventeen as does the American girl; as a general thing, she does not; but the growth of her intellect has been stimulated by no hot-house culture, and though maturity comes later, it will last proportionably longer. Eight hours each day of mental application, for girls between ten and nineteen years, or ten hours each day, as is some times required at school, with two hours for meals, one for religious duties, the remainder for physical exercises, are enough to break down the strongest constitution.

TO CUT GLASS WITH A PIECE OF IRON.—Draw with a pencil on paper, any pattern to which you would have the glass conform, place the pattern under the glass, holding both together in the left hand, (for the glass must not rest on any plane surface;) then take a common spike or some similar piece of iron, heat the point of it to redness, and apply it to the edge of the glass; draw the iron slowly forward, and the edge of the glass will immediately crack; continue moving the iron slowly over the glass, tracing the pattern, and the chink of the glass will follow at the distance of about half an inch in every direction according to the motion of the iron. It may sometimes be found requisite, however, especially in forming corners, to apply a wet finger to the opposite side of the glass. Tumblers and other glasses may be cut or divided by similar means, into very fanciful shapes. The iron must be re-heated as often as the crevice in the glass ceases to follow.

A PREDICTION OF DANTON.—An anecdote is told of the Duc de Chartres, now the King of the French, which is published with the warranty of that personage. Some business having brought him from Dumourier's army to Paris, soon after the massacres of September, Danton sent for him, and informed him that he had heard that he ventured, in conversation, to speak too freely on that subject. He told him he was too young to judge of such matters, and added, "For the future be silent. Return to the army; do your duty; but don't unnecessarily expose your life. You have many years before you. France is not suited for a republic; it has the habits, the wants, and the weakness of a monarchy. After our storms, it will be brought back to that by its vices or its necessities. You will be King! Adieu, young man, Remember the prediction of Danton."

PUGNACITY IN EMBRYO.—"That's right—slap your mother's face—naughty ma!" "Pull John's hair—so you may. See there, he has a handful!" "Pull pussy's tail, how she mews! Pshaw! it does not hurt her!" "He's sharp to look out for himself—how cunning he is in getting the best one—trust him to take care of number one." "He's a sly little rogue—was not that a real trick? Willy will know how to get out of a scrape." "What a story that child has made up—she 'll make a first rate romance writer."

Look at children reared under such tuition as this, after they have ceased to be "funny because they are so little."

Lay it down as a rule, never to smile, nor in any way show approval nor merit, at any trait in a child which you would not wish should "grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength." [Mrs. E. C. Allen.

NEWSPAPER READERS.—The tastes of the readers of a newspaper are sufficiently various and singular. One reads nothing but the poet's corner; another considers poetry and all that sort of stuff horrid trash. One deems politics the only business of life; another votes that department a bore. This one, reads only the deaths and marriages, and that one only looks at the advertisements. There are various other idiosyncrasies too numerous to mention; but certainly the most singular one we ever heard of, was the case of the lady who was obliged to consult the celebrated Abernethy, because "for several mornings past she had not been able to relish her murders."

PUNISHMENT FOR BLASPHEMY.—In 1642, the following law against profanity was passed by the Parliament of England:—"Let no man presume to blaspheme the holy and blessed Trinity, God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, nor the known articles of our Christian faith, upon pain to have his tongue bored with a red hot iron." It appears that under this law "a soldier of Okey's regiment was, on the 26th of July, 1650, sentenced to be bored through the tongue with a red hot iron, and to run the gantelope through four companies, for uttering blasphemous words, he being at the time in a ranting humor with drinking too much."

READING.—Three very excellent things, and of great utility, are reading, conversation, and reflection. By reading, we treat with the dead; by conversation, with the living, and by reflection, with ourselves. Reading enriches the memory, conversation polishes the mind, and reflection forms the judgment. But of these noble employments of the soul, were we to say which we think the most important, we must confess that reading seems to be the groundwork of the other two; since without reading, contemplation is fruitless, and conversation dull and insipid.

A new pavement is being laid down in Exchange street, Liverpool, in place of the old wood pavement. The usual stone sets are used, but they are so wrought as to be broad at the base and gradually taper at the top. The interstices are filled with small stones; and the road, when finished, will, perhaps, be the best in that city, giving a firm footing to horses even in frosty weather.

VARIETY.

Liebeg says, when one pound of lean beef, free of fat, and separated from the bones, in the finely chopped state in which it is used for beef sausages, or mince meat, is uniformly mixed with its own weight of cold water, slowly heated to boiling, and the liquid, after boiling briskly for a minute or two, is strained through a towel from the coagulated albumen, and the fibrine now becoming hard and horny, we obtain an equal weight of the most aromatic soup of such strength as cannot be obtained even by boiling, for hours, from a piece of flesh. When mixed with salt, and the often usual additions by means of roasted onions or burnt sugar, it forms the very best soup which can in any way be prepared from one pound of flesh.

An accomplished and somewhat romantic French lady, on visiting the chateau of a distinguished nobleman, says, "I have heard for the first time, an admirable and enchanting sound, which, if generally established, would add an inexpressible charm to the other beauties of a rural life. This was no less than an inconsiderable herd of shining cows, each with a musical bell attached to her neck, attuned with the greatest nicety of several octaves high and low—forming a delicious, yea, a kind of celestial music, the sweetness of which has a powerful effect on the imagination, and cannot be listened to without experiencing a sensible emotion."

While some persons in the employ of Major Bates, of Guernsey, in Ohio, were engaged in quarrying stone for the repair of the National Road, on the hill west of Cambridge, they found, in a petrified state, what was supposed to have been the body of an Indian child, which perhaps centuries ago was deposited in that spot. This extraordinary specimen of ancient remains was found imbedded in a mass of solid rock, and has the appearance of a stone image, somewhat imperfect in its outer form, yet having the general outlines of the human shape. The material of which it is composed appears to be a species of limestone. In the same cavity was also found a small row of what appears to be Indian beads, matted together.

The want of a comma in a sentence often so confuses the reading, that it is impossible to make out what is meant by the author. We give the following as an example:

Every lady in the land
Has twenty nails on each hand,
Five and twenty on hands and feet;
This is true without deceit.

The above appears rather puzzling, but by placing a comma after the words nails, five, and feet, and omitting it after hand, the author's rhyme will at once be intelligible.

The Journal of St. Petersburg announces that there was again found to be a large sum in ingots and specie, to the credit of the Empire. There was taken from it on the 19th of October the sum of 8,678,609 rubles 28 kopees, which was placed with all the formalities requisite, in the presence of Prince Peter of Oldenburg, and several other high functionaries, in the vaults of the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul. The treasure which is now laid in that fortress amounts to 114,674,959 roubles—(a rouble equaling 75 cents.)

An English paper states that Mr. Yates, an excessive corn-factor, has presented W. F. Wratislaw, of Rugby, with a can of milk capable of being kept in a good and fresh state for an indefinite length of time by means of a chemical process which it undergoes on being taken from the cow. It was manufactured at Toxall, near Stafford, on the estate of Earl Talbot. The process has been patented, and not only may a rich sweet milk be constantly had, but also a rich cream, convertible into butter in a very short time.

The people of Bearn, an ancient province of the Pyrenees, in the year 1183, desirous of having a sovereign of the blood of their last monarch, sent a deputation to his sister, to ask for one of her twin children. The request being granted, the deputies had their choice. The infants, at the moment, both slept. One had his hands closed, the other his open. The deputies imagined they saw, in the latter attitude, an indication of a noble and generous character. They immediately chose him; and this monarch in his after age acquired the title of Gaston the Good.

"Resolution," says a writer, "is omnipotent." And, if we will but solemnly determine to make the best and the most of all our powers and capacities; and if to this end, with Wilberforce, we will but "seize and improve even the shortest intervals of possible action and effort," we shall find that there is no limit to our advancement.

A Sunday school teacher in Louisville, Ky., was exhorting a poor, pious, old female slave to be very humble—reminding her that she should be like the Lord Jesus—who had neither house nor home—"Yes," she added, with emphasis—"blessed be God—he had no house—no home—and no niggers!"

Children give unexpectedly shrewd answers when puzzled with questions. "What is the gender of hat?" asked a dame the other day. "Masculine," replied the scholar. "Indeed! Then what's the feminine?" "Why, bonnet, to be sure."

According to the Montreal Herald, out of eighteen Grand Jurors for the District of Montreal—the District which surrounds the capital of Canada—ten men, one of whom seems to be Irish, and the others French Canadian, can only make their mark.

There are thirty-two cotton factories in operation or in progress of construction, in Georgia, in which $2,000,000 are invested. From 18 to 20,000 bales of cotton were consumed last year, and the amount of manufactured goods produced was equal in value to $1,500,000.

AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	"	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third	"	April 5,	"	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves; and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Board of Instruction.

IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

SUNDAY LAWS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

From the Occident for March.

Judge O'Neal's Opinion in the case of the City Council of Charleston vs. A. Benjamin.

In this case, a deep respect for the ancient people of whom the defendant is one, and a full concurrence in the merited eulogium bestowed on them, in the course of the argument, for their consistency, honesty, industry, and thrift, induced a fuller consideration than the intrinsic difficulties of the case demanded.

I admire the devotion with which the remnant of Israel, scattered among us, and all the other civilized nations of the earth, have cherished and kept their Sabbath, the seventh day of the week! Well has one of their own gifted and liberal writers said of it, using the words of inspiration, "it was given" "for all generations," "for a perpetual covenant—as a sign between the Lord and the children of Israel for ever." Exod. xxxi; 16—"and to be wholly independent of times and places."—Mendelssohn's Jerusalem, 203. No doubt it is, as he affirms, binding upon those who believe in the law alone: while Christians are not called upon, as he freely admits, to its observance. (Mendelssohn's Jerusalem, 209.) The Lord's day, the day of the resurrection, is to us, who are called Christians, the day of rest after the finishing a new creation. It is the day of the first visible triumph over death, hell, and the grave! It was the birthday of the believer in Christ, to whom and through whom, it opened up the way, which by repentance and faith leads unto everlasting life and eternal happiness! On that day we rest, and to us, it is the Sabbath of the Lord. Its decent observance in a Christian community, is that which ought to be expected.

It is not perhaps necessary to the purpose of this case, to rule and hold that the Christian religion is part of the Common Law of South Carolina. Still it may be useful to show that it lies at the foundation of even the article of the constitution under consideration, and that upon it rest many of the principles and usages constantly acknowledged and enforced in the courts of justice!

The 1st section of the 8th article of the constitution of this state declares, that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State, to all mankind, provided that the liberty of conscience thereby declared shall not be so construed, as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State."

What gave to us this noble safeguard of religious toleration, which made the worship of our common Father as free and easy as the air we breathe, and His temple as wide, capacious and lofty, as the sky He has spread above our heads? It was not that spirit of infidelity which defied reason, denied God, and was stained with more blood than ever flowed upon the altars of Aztec idols! It was Christianity, robed in light, and descending as the dove upon our ancestors, which gave us this provision! It was that same spirit which, when the war of the Revolution was about to commence, sanctified a fast and prostrated a nation before the Lord of Hosts to ask His blessing and assistance! It was that same glorious spirit of mercy and love which proclaimed the birth of the Saviour, and as its consequence "peace, good will towards men!" It was that same Christianity which sought its promulgators among the humblest of the Jews, and taught them, "love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you!" But this toleration thus granted is a religious toleration, it is the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, with two provisions, one of which, that which guards against acts of licentiousness, testifies to the Christian construction which this section should receive! What are "acts of licentiousness," within the meaning of this section? Must they not be such public acts as are calculated to shock the moral sense of the community where they take place? The orgies of Bacchus, among the ancients, were not offensive? At a later day, the Carnivals of Venice went off without note or observation. Such could not be allowed now! Why? Public opinion based on Christian morality would not suffer it! Here, in this city, an open playhouse or circus, on Sunday, could not exist for a day! Why? Your streets, on Sunday, answer the question! Your people love "the house of God" more than the "tents of wickedness!"

These hints are enough to show the spirit which breathes in the constitution! But the law which we are called upon to administer, will be found to come to us imbued and blessed with the same holy influences. Crimes are classed into Mala in se and Mala prohibita! What gives them that character? We cannot answer, as the Israelite would do, by pointing to Mount Sinai, and saying the Lord God commanded us, saying, "thou shalt not kill," "thou shalt not steal." The authority of these divine precepts comes to us through Christianity! We are "the wild olive tree graffed" in place of the broken branches of the original tree, Israel! And hence the law delivered at Mount Sinai, may be by us appealed to, as pointing out that which is "evil in itself."

Again, our law declares all contracts contra bonos mores as illegal and void. What constitutes the standard of good morals? Is it not Christianity? There certainly is none other! Say that cannot be appealed to, and I don't know what would be good morals! The day of moral virtue in which we live, would in an instant, if that standard were abolished, lapse into the dark and murky night of Pagan immorality! In this State, the marriage tie is indissoluble! Whence do we take that maxim? It is from the teaching of the New Testament alone!

In the courts over which we preside, we daily acknowledge Christianity as the most solemn part of our administration. A Christian witness, having no religious scruples against placing his honor upon the books, is sworn upon the holy Evangelists, the books of the New Testament, which testify of our Saviour's birth, life, death, and resurrection. This is so common a matter, that it is little thought of as an evidence of the part which Christianity has in the common law.

All blasphemous publications carrying upon their face that irreverent rejection of God and His holy religion, which makes them dangerous to the community, have always been held to be libels, and punishable at common law. Here they would also be plain acts of licentiousness, having no warrant of protection whatever in our constitution. This, however, never could extend to free and manly discussion on these holy subjects. For I agree with Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, 235, "Our rulers can have authority over such natural rights, only, as we have submitted to them. The rights of conscience we never submitted, we never could submit. We are answerable for them to our God!" But I should hesitate long in pushing the argument as far as he does, by saying, as he does, that in its exercise "it does me no injury for my neighbor to say there are twenty Gods, or no God." While the argument rests only in words, it would be so evanescent that it might be no injury! But when it comes to be put in print, to be read, like Paine's Age of Reason, by the young and the unwary, where is the parent who would say "it does me no injury!" I agree fully to what is beautifully and appropriately said in Updegraph vs. The Commonwealth, 11 Sergt. and Maule, 394, "Christianity, general Christianity, is and always has been a part of the common law;" "not Christianity founded on any particular religious tenets; not Christianity with an established church, and tithes and spiritual courts; but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men!"

But I have said all which need be said on this interesting subject! It was not necessary for the decision of this case; it has only been said to prevent silence from being interpreted into a want of confidence in the proposition, that Christianity may be justly appealed to as part of our common law!

The case before us presents the very simple question, Is a law punishing the sale of goods on the Lord's day, Sunday, a violation of the 1st section of the 8th article of our Constitution, hereinbefore cited and set out? To satisfactorily answer this question, it will be perhaps well to ascertain what was the sense in which the framers of the Constitution used the words, "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference." Reading over the words, one would say, the venerable men who framed that article meant to say, that a man might be of any order of religious worshipers, or of none at all; that he might worship God or not, as he pleased; that his worship might be in any form, at any time or place, or none at all; and that for these differences in faith or practice, no difference in civil condition should ever be made by law! It was an abolition of all disabilities—the Christian, Israelite, Mahomedan, Pagan, and Infidel, all stand alike in the Government and people of South Carolina. To ascertain, however, more precisely the sense, we may appeal to various other sources. To the 1st article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States we may very well refer to ascertain the then acknowledged sense: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This was the general law for all the Union, as standing under the legislation of Congress! There could be no union of Church and State, no religion established by law! Nor could there be any law prohibiting any man from worshiping God as he pleased! These plainly pointed to the evils from which we had escaped in our separation from England! The Church of England, as an established State religion, had been felt as a great grievance, in at least one of the States of the Union. Against it had been poured the mighty torrent of Henry's resistless eloquence, when "he pleaded against the Parsons' cause." All had felt the pains and penalties imposed by English enactments, on all who sought to worship as conscience, not law, dictated. These evils were for ever removed by the amendments above referred to. In the same sense our Constitution was adopted. This may be further illustrated by reading the draught of the Virginia Bill of Rights in 1776. The 16th article of the first draught, by Gov. Mason, will be found in Niles' collection, called the Principles and Acts of the Revolution, 124. It declares that "religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and that, therefore, all men should enjoy the fullest toleration in the exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, unpunished and unrestrained by the magistrate: unless under color of religion, any man disturbed the peace, the happiness, or the safety of society. And that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love and charity towards each other." The provision is very much like that in our own Constitution; and its closing declaration of duty shows how much these constitutional principles of toleration rested on Christianity. The general definition of toleration embraced in it, is but an amplification of the words of our Constitution, which were very probably condensed from it! Again, William Livingston, Governor of New Jersey, in 1778, (see Niles' Acts and Principles of the Revolution, 306,) gives a definition of religion: "By religion, I mean," he says, "an habitual reverence for, and devotedness to the Deity, with such external homage, public or private, as the worshiper believes most acceptable to Him." "According to this," he says, "it is impossible for human laws to regulate religion without destroying it." It was to secure this privilege of worship, as he has beautifully described it, and this alone, that our constitutional provision was adopted. The sense in which the fathers of liberty used the words, "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference," has, I think, been sufficiently shown. What abridgment of religious profession and worship is to be found in a law forbidding a shop to be kept open, or goods to be sold on Sunday? I confess, I can see none. If there were any, I presume it will be readily admitted it hardly would have escaped the experienced eye of Dr. Cooper. Yet in his notes to 2d Stat. 707, speaking of this very article of the Constitution, he says; "This does not interfere with the right of the Legislature to incorporate religious societies for civil purposes. Nor with the right of appointing a Sabbath, or day of rest from labor, as a municipal institution conducive to civil expedience!" The legislation, objected to on this occasion, is no more than what he allows to be proper and legitimate. It is simply an ordinance for the better observance of the Lord's Day as a day of rest; it simply requires a cessation of public employment in the way of trade or business.

But it is said this violated the free exercise and enjoyment of the religious profession and worship of the Israelite. Why? It does not require him to desecrate his own Sabbath! It does not say, you must worship God on the Christian Sabbath! On the contrary, it leaves him free on all these matters! His evening sacrifice and morning worship, constituting the seventh day, he publicly and freely offers up, and there is none to make him afraid. His Sundays are spent as he pleases, so far as religion is concerned. No one dare say to him, in the circle of his own fireside, what doest thou? No one, as he walks the street, would dare say to him, turn in hither and worship as we do!

It is, however, fancied, that in some way this law is in derogation of the Hebrew's religion; inasmuch as by his faith and this statute he is compelled to keep two Sabbaths. There is the mistake! He has his own free and undiminished! Sunday is, to us, our day of rest! We say to him, simply, respect us by ceasing on this day from the pursuit of that trade and business in which you, by the security and protection given to you by our laws, make great gain! This is a mere police, or municipal regulation! If the Israelite were allowed to make the objection, that he could not be constitutionally restrained from pursuing a public business on Sunday, the Infidels would say, as Duke said, all days are alike to me, and therefore I will at all times pursue my business. Such an assumption is so preposterous, that no one would tolerate it! Yet, in the case of the Town Council vs. C. O. Duke and Alexander Marks, the Infidel and the Israelite placed themselves on the same platform, the 1 § of 8 article of the Constitution. It is true, the alliance was altogether unnatural. Still, both together invoked the decision of that good man and good judge, the late J. Martin, on the very question now before us, and he, with his accustomed clearness and power, decided that the Constitution did not prevent the passage of an ordinance to prevent shop-keepers from keeping their shops open on the Sabbath day; and from that decision the parties dared not further pursue their complaint by appeal. It was feared that, like its noble gifted author, it was no more; but I rejoice to find it has been preserved; and I hope, with this opinion, and as one of its main pillars of support, it will be given to the world!

If it were true that the commandment to keep the Sabbath day holy, also required the Israelite to work six days, as closely and faithfully as he is to observe the seventh day, as a day of rest, then indeed there might be a ground to say, that the ordinance which requires him to desist, during Sunday, from a public business, the sale of goods, was unconstitutional. Let us read the commandment beginning Exodus xx. 8:—"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; whereupon the Lord blessed the seventh day and hallowed it." In Deuteronomy, chapter v., beginning at the 12th verse, we have the same commandment again set before Israel. "Keep the Sabbath day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. Six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates, that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day." Leviticus xxiii. and 3, contains, as I consider, the commentary of the inspired Lawgiver on, and the explanation of this command. "Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, and holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein; it is the Sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings." The meaning of the commandment is so plain, that I almost fear to add any explanation of my own. In six days the Israelite is to do the work he may have to do; on the seventh he must not work; it is his day of rest! No one ever supposed it could go further. I fancy few among Israel worked every day in the six. If such had been the commandment, it would have been hard again. But it was intended to set apart a day of rest, and not to give a command to labor. The Saviour said, "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

So it remains, and so it is intended ever to remain, one day out of seven, as a day of rest; and as such it is essential to every one who labors, be it man or beast, and hence its institution and observance. There is therefore no violation of the Hebrew's religion, in requiring him to cease from labor on another day than his Sabbath, if he be left free to observe the latter according to his religion. It is the seventh day, which is to him a holy day, made so by his religion, and to be observed at his peril. All the other days are to him indifferent. Hence he can find no abridgement of his religion in being compelled to abstain from public trade, employment, or business, on one of them. If the Legislature, or the City of Charleston, were to declare that all shops within the State or City should be closed, and that no one should sell or offer to sell any goods, wares, or merchandize, on the 4th of July or 8th of January in each year, would any one believe such a law was unconstitutional. It could not be pretended religion had any thing to do with that! What has religion to do with a similar regulation for Sunday? It is in a political and social point of view a mere day of rest. Its observance, as such, is a mere question of expediency. But, says the argument, on the other side, we would not object to it, if it did not give a Christian a preference over an Israelite. Where is such a provision? There is none such in the law. It is general, operating upon all. The Constitution, in the respect under consideration, considers all the people of South Carolina on whom the Government is to operate as citizens merely. It does not divide them into Christians and Hebrews, or any other classification. If the law be according to that, there is no objection. It is true, the Israelite must cease from business on Sunday; so do all others. His religion makes him also observe Saturday! That is not the effect of our law. It is the result of his religion; and to enjoy its cherished benefits, living in a community who have appointed a different day of rest, he must give to its law obedience, so far as it demands cessation from public employment.

ALL'S FOR THE BEST.

ALL's for the best; be sanguine and cheerful;
  Trouble and sorrow are friends in disguise;
Nothing but Folly goes faithless and fearful;
  Courage forever is happy and wise:
All for the best,—if a man would but know it;
  Providence wishes us all to be blest;
This is no dream of the pundit or poet;
  Heaven is gracious, and—All's for the best!

All for the best! set this on your standard,
  Soldier of sadness, or pilgrim of love,
Who to the shores of Despair may have wandered,
  A waywearied swallow, or heartstricken dove:
All for the best!—be a man but confiding,
  Providence tenderly governs the rest,
And the frail bark of His creature is guiding,
  Wisely and warily, all for the best.

All for the best! then fling away terrors,
  Meet all your fears and your foes in the van,
And in the midst of your dangers or errors
  Trust like a child, while you strive like a man:
All's for the best!—unbiased, unbounded,
  Providence reigns from the East to the West;
And by both wisdom and mercy surrounded,
  Hope and be happy that All's for the best

I HAVE NO FATHER.

I was once in an awful storm at sea; we were for many hours tossed about in sight of dangerous rocks; the steam engines would work no longer; the wind raged violently, and around were heard the terrific roar of the breakers, and the dash of the waves, as they broke over the deck.

At this dreary and trying time, while we lay, as might be said, at the mercy of the waves, I found great comfort and support from an apparently trifling circumstance; it was that the captain's child, a little girl of about four years, was in the cabin with us. He had two or three times, in the midst of his care and toils, been to see how his child went on; it is well known how cheering is the sight of a captain in such a time of danger. As our situation grew worse, I saw the little girl rising on her elbows and bending her eyes anxiously to the door, as if longing for her father's reäppearance. He came at last. He was a large, bluff, sailor-like man; an immense coat, great sea boots; and an oil-skin cap, with flaps hanging down his neck, were streaming with water. He fell on his knees on the floor beside the low berth of his child, and stretched his arms over her, but did not speak.

After a while, he asked if she were alarmed. "Father," the child answered, "let me be with you, and I shall not be afraid."

"With me!" he cried; "you could not stand it for an instant."

"Father, let me be with you," she repeated.

"My child, you would be more frightened," he said, kissing her, while the tears were on his rough cheeks.

"No, father, I will not be afraid if you take me with you. O! father, let me be with you!" and she threw her arms around his neck, and clung fast to him. The strong man was overcome; he lifted her in his arms, and carried her away with him.

How much I felt her departure! As long as the captain's child was near, I felt her to be a sort of pledge for the return and care of the captain. I knew that in the moment of greatest danger the father would run to his child; I was certain that were the vessel about to be abandoned in the wild waves, I should know of every movement, for the captain would not desert his child. Thus in the presence of that child I had comforted myself, and when she went, I felt abandoned, and for the first time fearful, I rose, and managed to get on deck. It was a dreadful sight; I shrank back, and threw myself again on my couch. Then came the thought, The child is content, she is with her father; "and have I no father?" O God, I thank thee! in that moment I could answer, yes. An unseen father, it is true; and faith is not as sight, and nature is not as grace; but still I knew I had a Father; a Father whose love surpasseth knowledge. The thought calmed my mind. Reader, does it calm yours?

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

A mother's love how pure,
  How tender and how strong:
How long it will endure:
  How passive bear each wrong.
Soft as a zephyr's silv'ry breath:
  Strong as a whirlwind's sweep:
It watcheth by the bed of death,
  And giveth up sweet sleep.
It lives and acts and glows and swells,
  It points the child aright,
On mountains and in flowery dells,
  At morning, noon, and night.

"What a pity," remarked a spectator to a drunkard, "that you should thus debase your manhood, by such selfish indulgence in strong drink."

"You're a temperance lecturer, I suspect," sneered the inebriate.

"No, friend," replied the gentleman, "I am not a temperance lecturer—at least not one professedly. But I neglect no opportunity to speak a word in favor of that honest cause."

"You're a preacher then, may be?"

"No."

"Well, whatever you are, I want none of your advice."

"I merely meant it for your good," mildly answered the gentleman. "Are you married?"

"No."

"You have sisters and brothers?"

"Yes—but they don't know me now."

"Have you a father?"

"No—he died long since."

"A mother?"

There was a deep silence.

"You do not answer; have you a mother?"

The silence that ensued was broken by the sobs of the wretched man.

"Oh, God! Oh, God!" he exclaimed, "she, too, is dead! I broke her heart many years since, by my misconduct. My poor, poor mother! So good, so kind—so gentle and forgiving!" and he smote his breast in the bitterness of his anguish.

Unhappy man—oh, how unhappy at that moment! Through all the vicissitudes of life, a mother's love had followed him—entreating, urging, imploring him to forsake evil, and cling only to that which is right. In vain had she striven—he had gone on blindly, perversely, recklessly, till now he was broken down in health, fortune, and reputation, an outcast from society, disowned by his own flesh and blood! Yet in the midst of this accumulation of wretchedness, there came reproachfully, though full of love, across the weary waste of years, a mother's voice, sweet and sad, and the heart bowed in grief to its mute appeal.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.

A story is told of two travelers in Lapland, which throws more light upon the art of being happy than a whole volume of precepts and aphorisms. Upon a very cold day in winter, they were driving along in a sledge, wrapped up in furs from head to foot. Even their faces were mostly covered; and you could see hardly any thing but their eye-brows, and these were white and glistening with frost. At length they saw a poor man who had sunk down, benumbed and frozen, in the snow. "We must stop and help him," said one of the travelers. "Stop and help him!" replied the other; "you will never think of stopping on such a day as this! We are half frozen ourselves, and ought to be at our journey's end as soon as possible." "But I cannot leave this man to perish," rejoined the more humane traveler; "I must go to his relief;" and he stopped his sledge. "Come," said he, "come help me to rouse him." "Not I," replied the other, "I have too much regard for my own life to expose myself to this freezing atmosphere any more than is necessary. I will sit here and keep myself as warm as I can till you come back." So saying, he resolutely kept his seat, while his companion hastened to the relief of the perishing man, whom they had providentially discovered. The ordinary means for restoring consciousness and activity were tried with complete success. But the kind-hearted traveler was so intent upon saving the life of a fellow-creature, that he had forgotten his own exposure; and what was the consequence? Why, the very effort he had made to warm the stranger, warmed himself! And thus he had a two-fold reward. He had the sweet consciousness of doing a benevolent act, and he also found himself glowing from head to foot, by reason of the exertions which he had made. And how was it with his companion, who had been so much afraid of exposing himself? He was almost ready to freeze, notwithstanding the efforts he had been making to keep warm!

The lesson derived from this little incident is sufficiently obvious. We are all travelers to a distant country. At every step of our journey we find other travelers, who need our friendly aid. Nay, God has brought them around our path in great numbers;—and, as far as the eye can reach, we see their dense and gloomy ranks. Now there are two ways of meeting these objects of Christian sympathy and brotherly regard. We can go forward with the stern purpose of a selfish and unloving spirit, saying, in reply to every appeal which is addressed to our feelings, "Depart in peace; be ye warmed and filled;" or we can say, with the warm-hearted traveler, "I cannot see this man perish; I must hasten to his relief." And the rule which we adopt for our guidance in such cases, will determine the question, whether we are to be happy or unhappy. The man who lives only for himself, cannot be happy. God does not smile upon him; and his conscience will give him no peace. But he who forgets himself in his desires to do good, not only becomes a blessing to others, but opens a perpetual fountain of joy in his own bosom. [Dayspring.

SUNDAY LAWS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

We publish to-day Judge O'Neal's Opinion in the celebrated Jew Case which has been so long pending in South Carolina. It will be seen that he reverses the decision of the lower court, and takes entirely a different view of the whole subject from what was taken in a very similar case by the Supreme Court of Ohio. The manner in which he endeavors to justify his opinion in this case is somewhat remarkable, and deserves a passing notice.

One thing which attracts the attention of the general reader, is Judge O'Neal's labored effort to connect the Common Law of South Carolina with the Christian religion, and his subsequent admission that the law in question is a mere police or municipal regulation. It is common for the advocates of the Sunday laws to begin their advocacy of them by insisting that the observance of Sunday is a necessary part of Christianity, and that it ought therefore to be required by every Christian nation. But this position is easier asserted than proved; and when those who take it are pressed for their proof, they not unfrequently retreat from one position to another until they come to the conclusion here implied, that the keeping of Sunday is no part of Christianity whatever. If so, then why is such a hue-and-cry raised against those who oppose the Sunday laws, as if they were the enemies of Christianity itself? If these laws are, as is maintained, a mere police or municipal regulation, surely those who think they serve no good purpose, but operate rather to the disadvantage of conscientious men, ought to be borne with and listened to when they present their reasons for wishing such laws abolished.

Another thing in Judge O'Neal's Opinion which will be likely to attract attention, is his indirect acknowledgment that the framers of the Constitution meant all which the most strenuous opponents of Sunday laws maintain that they meant, when they used the words, "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference." He says: "Reading over the words, one would say, the venerable men who framed that article meant to say, that a man might be of any order of religious worshipers, or of none at all; that he might worship God or not, as he pleased; that his worship might be in any form, at any time or place, or at none at all; and that for these differences in faith or practice, no difference in civil condition should ever be made by law! It was an abolition of all disabilities—the Christian, Israelite, Mahometan, Pagan, and Infidel, all stand alike in view of the Government and people of South Carolina." Such, evidently, is the import of their language, and such the interpretation which unbiased readers would place upon it. What reason is there for placing upon it any other interpretation? None at all, except it be to justify some such evasion as the advocates of Sunday laws desire. Judge O'Neal attempts to explain the matter so as to make the language in question mean simply, that there could be no union of Church and State, no religion established by law! But this is making their platform rather to narrow to accommodate all the religious views then entertained. For our part, we cannot doubt that the framers of the Constitution of South Carolina meant all that their language naturally imports, when they spoke of the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship. If they did, then we see not how a law to prevent a Jew from working on Sunday after he has kept his Sabbath on the previous day, can be consistent with the Constitution.

The question still remains, whether a law to prevent the transaction of business on Sunday, abridges the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship on the part of those who observe the seventh day or Saturday as the Sabbath. Judge O'Neal thinks it does not, because it is simply a municipal regulation, and does not forbid them resting on their Sabbath, nor require them to worship on Sunday. This is a very specious representation of the matter, but we do not think it will bear a close investigation. It is well known that a majority of the people regard Sunday as a day which ought to be religiously observed, and that the Sunday laws are designed to favor them by preventing as far as possible the noise and confusion of business. It is equally well known that those who observe the seventh day, or Saturday, are alike conscientious in regarding that day as one which ought to be religiously observed. Now suppose the authorities should decree that Saturday should be observed as a Sabbath by rest from labor; who doubts that such a decree would be pronounced by the observers of the first day an abridgement of their free exercise of religious preferences, even though they might be left at liberty to rest on Sunday also? Or, suppose the authorities, considering that only a minority regard the Saturday as the Sabbath, should decree that on every third Saturday no work should be done, so as to leave those who do observe that day free from annoyance; the result would be a vastly greater outcry than is now made because the Sunday laws are not enforced. The authorities would be denounced as usurping prerogatives which do not belong to them, and would very soon find themselves without the support of their former constituents. Still, if the reasoning of Judge O'Neal in relation to the Jews be good; and if they cannot justly complain of an abridgement of their religious rights by the Sunday laws; then the observers of Sunday could not justly complain of such a decree as we have supposed. They would complain, however, and their complaint would be sustained by the influential and religious portion of community. It is easy to talk of the Sunday laws as simply a police or municipal regulation, but they are so interwoven with religious considerations and preferences that we do not believe they can ever be enforced without a violation of the principle of religious toleration.

AGENCIES FOR BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

The expense of agencies for missionary and other benevolent societies is a cause of frequent complaint in nearly every denomination. In some cases these complaints are no doubt well founded; in others, they are entirely unjustifiable, and probably result from a want of acquaintance with the facts in the case.

A correspondent of the Churchman complains of the cost of agencies for the Domestic and Foreign Missions of the Episcopal Church in this country. He says that in the department of Domestic Missions, in 4847, the Secretary and General Agent had a salary of $1554, besides his traveling expenses; and when to this is added the expense of rent, fuel, porter, and an assistant, the whole amounts to $3,126 43. The amount of receipts was $25,075, so that the cost of agencies was over twelve per cent. In the department of Foreign Missions, things were still worse; for there the salary of the agent, with his assistant, traveling expenses, rent, fuel, &c., was $7060 20, or about fifteen per cent on the whole amount of receipts. This is a large per centage to be absorbed at home, even allowing that it results in the diffusion of a great deal of light in relation to the work of missions.

Whatever occasion of complaint there may be in societies like those to which we have alluded, they do not exist in relation to our own missionary organization. With us the labors of the Secretaries, Treasurer, and other officers, are performed gratuitously. Their expenses, also, in attending upon the regular meetings of the Board and the Society, come out of their own pockets, and are cheerfully paid for the benefit of the cause. Occasionally, however, it has been found necessary to appoint a special agent to visit some particular districts, with a view of giving information as well as collecting funds. Even this is dispensed with at the present time, in hope that the work will be done by ministering and other leading brethren in the different churches. There is, therefore, no room for complaint on the score of agencies. But are the brethren upon whom the Board rely giving their attention to the matter of awakening interest in the missionary work and collecting funds for it? We hope they are, and that no month is allowed to pass without a concert of prayer, and a collection in some form or another, for the object.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I forward for publication in the Recorder extracts from the 1st Report of the Missionaries in the employ of the Eastern Association. Bro. Lewis, who is stationed at Newport, R.I., says:

"Though at times I have felt somewhat depressed in view of the low state of Zion, and especially the general disregard of the Sabbath, still I have found cause of encouragement when I have anticipated that better time, which I believe is drawing near, when the distinguishing truth held by our people in sacred trust shall ultimately triumph. Our congregation on the Sabbath has increased, and our prayer-meetings have become really interesting seasons. I find enough to do. Indeed there are more calls for my ministerial labor than I can attend. In Jamestown, an increasingly solemn attention is manifest in the congregation, so much that I have deemed it expedient to increase the frequency of my appointments. I have circulated Sabbath publications, and found no difficulty in obtaining pledges that they would be read."

Bro. Clarke, stationed at Green Hill, says:—

"On inquiring into the state of the church, I found it had a name to live, although dead. January 11th—I commenced a series of meetings that lasted daily until the 30th, and God was pleased to hear and answer prayer, and pour out his Spirit, to revive his people and convert sinners. Feb. 5th—Three were buried with Christ in baptism, who, together with three from the Baptist church, united with our church, all converts to the Sabbath, and all but one heads of families. One of the number was a deacon. Another has since joined, making in all seven who have united with the church. Others have signified their intention of following the same example as soon as circumstances permit. The cause of the Sabbath is gaining ground, and I verily believe that God, by his word and Spirit, is at work in the hearts of his people in South Kingston. Prejudice, that great opposer of truth, is giving way—so that people will hear and investigate. The field seems ripening for the harvest, when he whose right it is to reign, shall be obeyed in all his commandments. The Lord hasten it in his time."

By order of the Board,

SCANDAL.

"The little foxes spoil the vines," yet how very difficult it is to shut out these little foxes from the vineyard. Not so with the wholesale aggressors on human rights. The strong arm of the law reaches forth, and in its iron grasp bears them straight to the tribunal of justice. But against the insidious attacks of him who

> "Damns with faint applause, and hesitates dislike,"

there is no defense, legal or physical. Still it is feared that moral and religious restraints have less bearing on this vice than on almost any other. How common it is, to listen with a degree of pleasure to unkind reflections, either true or false, upon the conduct of an acquaintance, or even a friend, and sometimes we ourselves take part in propagating these same ungracious tales. This propensity seems to be infectious; for a common gossip in community will soon be surrounded with a score of proselytes, ready to seize upon the first deviation from rectitude in a brother or sister; just as the omenous screech of one raven gathers around the carcase a multitude of voracious becks with a garb as black as his own. Thus it is that many, in whom we least suspected such a propensity, are drawn away and soon abandon themselves to common tale-bearing.

Scandal sometimes enters into conversation, apparently from the impression that to be sociable one must talk, and for the want of some other interesting theme, our neighbors are made the subjects for dissection. Then, like the surgeon, people seem to dissect character for the purpose of searching out its diseases and defects. A beautiful business! And pity on the wretch who is doomed to cut and carve among the putrid gangrene of human imperfections. But what is the antidote? We would recommend that the mind be well cultivated, and stored with knowledge on various subjects, which may be made the theme of conversation when friends meet. Then they may part with a consciousness of having been benefited by the interview, and a brow of innocence that will not fall to meet any human being, or blush to ask God's blessing on the visit. For if our conscience is not sufficiently awake to upbraid us while in the act of petit slander, we cannot fail to feel and show our guilt when we meet the injured party. †

Ronge.—The Rev. R. H. Herschel, of London, lately delivered a lecture at the Bridge Street Chapel, Bristol, on the subject of the present reform movement in Germany. The lecturer described Ronge as a little dandified man, so different from what he (the lecturer) had pictured, that when he went to see him, and was introduced to him, he said, "But I want to see the real Ronge." Ronge was the signboard in front, who pushed the movement forward, but it was Dr. Bench who was believed to direct Ronge and to write his letters. Ronge told the lecturer that the German philosophy had gone beyond the Bible; that Moses and Isaiah were very good philosophers for their day, but not for this.

The Vaudois of Piedmont.—The Marquis d'Azeglio has recently presented a petition to Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, in favor of the emancipation of the Jews and Protestants of that kingdom. The petition was numerously signed, and among the subscribers were four Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church. Should this movement in favor of religious liberty prove successful, the Protestants of Piedmont, who have hitherto been denied the rights citizenship in the land of their birth, will enjoy the same freedom in the exercise of their religion as their Roman Catholic fellow countrymen.

Toleration.—"All religions are tolerated here," says an English Baptist Missionary, writing from Ningpo, China, "if you will behave yourselves well, and not interfere with government affairs. The imperial family has adopted the maxim to leave every man to believe what he pleases, and to practice what he likes, if he will be a good subject. This toleration consolidates the emperor's power over the different nations which live under his scepter."

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I send you the following titles of honor attached to the name of one Minister on the part of Russia in the treaty of 1824 with the United States. The document before me is in the French language, a translation of which I send. As it may be somewhat amusing to the readers of your paper, if it is your pleasure you are at liberty to give it a place:—

Charles Robert, Count of Nesselrade, Actual Private Councillor, Member of the Council of State, Secretary of State directing the administration of Foreign Affairs, Actual Chamberlain, Knight of the Order of St. Alexander Nabesky, Grand Cross of the Order of St. Wladimir of the first Class, Knight of that of the White Eagle of Poland, Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stephen of Hungary, Knight of the Order of the Holy Ghost and St. Michael, and Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor of France, Knight Grand Cross of the Black and Red Eagle of Prussia, of the Annunciation of Sardinia, of Charles first of Spain, of St. Ferdinand and Merit Naples, of the Elephant of Denmark, of the Polar Star of Sweden, of the Crown of Wirtemburg, of the Guelphs of Hanover, of the Belgic Lion, of the Fidelity of Baden, and of St. Constantine of Parma; and Pierre de Paletica, Actual Councillor of State, Knight of the Order of St. Anne of the first Class, and Grand Cross of the Order of St. Wladimir of the Second; who, having exchanged, etc.

Conversion of an Indian Chief.—Rev. J. Smedley, a missionary of the American Indian Mission Association, in a letter dated December 28, mentions the conversion of Peter Folsom, a Choctaw Chief, of Meshulatubbi District. This Chief is one of the four elective Chiefs of the Choctaw Nation. He is eloquent in Choctaw, and pretty fluent in English. He is a poor man. His own merits have made him Chief.

Later from China.—The ship Sea Witch, which sailed from Canton Dec. 29th, arrived at New York March 16, in seventy-eight days. Quiet was not fully restored when the Sea Witch sailed, but there was a strong probability that the quarrel would be settled without a recourse to serious measures. Four of the persons engaged in the murder of the Englishmen had been executed. Others were undergoing examination, and would suffer the severest punishment if found guilty.

Extent of Missionary Effort.—It has been said, that the sun never sets on the dominions of the Queen of Great Britain; that is, that before it sets in England, it has risen in the West Indies; before it is lost sight of there, the natives of New Zealand see it; then Australia, and India, and Africa, are all in turns lighted by its beams, till we see it in England again.

So it is, says the Juvenile Offering, with our missionary stations—the sun never sets on our missionaries' labors, but it is always shining on some spot where the gospel is preached; and wherever the name of Christ is proclaimed, there also the Sun of Righteousness arises with healing in his wings, enlightening many hearts that but for his presence would have remained in everlasting darkness. O may the time quickly come, when the whole world shall be filled with the glory of the Lord!

Aid to the Roman Catholic Church in America.—The Association (in Europe) for the Propagation of the Faith, have granted to the Missions in America, this year: $5,000 to the Bishop of Dubuque; $6,000 to the Bishop of Detroit; $4,000 to the Bishop of Cincinnati; $3,000 to Bishop of Philadelphia; $3,000 to the Bishop of Richmond; $4,000 to Bishop Hughes of New York; $1,000 to Priests of Mercy, N. Y.; $2,000 to Hartford; $3,000 to Nashville; $3,000 to Louisville; $8,000 to Bishop of Vincennes, and $3,000 to Congregation of Holy Cross, same diocese; $6,000 to St. Louis; $2,250 to Milwaukie; $3,500 to Bishop of Little Rock; $7,500 to Bishop Quarter at Chicago; $3,500 to Natchez; $4,750 to New Orleans; $7,500 to Mobile; $8,000 to Charleston; $6,000 to Lazarists in United States; $2,150 to Society of Jesus, Mo.; $9,000 to Society of Jesus in Rocky Mountains; $760 to Dominicans in do.; $10,000 to Dr. Odin, Vicar Apostolic, Texas; $3,000 to Jesuit Missions in America; $26,000 to West Indian and South American Missions; $11,000 to Archbishop of Oregon City; $4,000 to Vicar Apostolic Hudson's Bay; $26,000 to British American Missions; $11,500 to Oblats, Canada and Hudson's Bay; $6,000 to Jesuits in Canada. These grants, with the donations of the people, will uphold a very large number of missionaries of the Church of Rome on this Continent.

ANTI-SLAVERY PROTEST.

The "Morning Star" publishes a "Protest and Declaration of Sentiment of Free-Will Baptist Ministers upon the Subject of Slavery." It is signed by six hundred and sixteen ministers, and reads as follows:—

Whereas the system of American Slavery is not only a political curse to the States where it exists and the Nation—increasing our taxes, threatening our peace and prosperity, injuring our reputation, and darkening our prospects; but is also a direct violation of the Law of Benevolence, and the obligations enforced by our Religion; setting aside necessarily that great Fundamental Principle of Equality, which is necessary to the happiness of all human society; trampling under foot those relations on which every social privilege and enjoyment is based; sustaining and encouraging War, Licentiousness, Gambling, Sabbath-breaking, Profanity, and almost every sin with which our land is cursed; preventing not only the influence but the preaching of the Gospel, and the promulgation of the truths of the Bible; withholding from almost one-sixth of our entire population even the instruction necessary to a knowledge of the plan of salvation;—Therefore, we, the undersigned, ministers of the Free-Will Baptist Connection, consider it our duty to state definitely our views and position upon this subject, and to present before the world our solemn Protest against the continuance of this fearful outrage upon humanity.

Believing, as we do, that the sympathy of no holy being in the Universe can for a moment be given to this foul system, and that neither the principles of the Gospel nor indications of Providence constitute the least apology for its continuance, we wish publicly to withdraw all implied or supposed, voluntary, political or moral support of this enormous evil. Our necessary and involuntary connection with the civil and social organizations now existing, which seems to give to each of us the character and reputation of the body, unless by personal public dissent from their errors and crimes we throw the responsibility exclusively upon those who support the evils of which we complain, renders it more necessary for us to announce our unwillingness to sanction the system of Slavery in any manner whatever. The view thus taken of this subject will render it perfectly inconsistent for us to give our suffrages or religious influence for the support of Slavery.

We therefore, by refusing to support Slavery, its principles, or its advocates, and by withholding Christian and church fellowship from all guilty of the sin of Slavery, and by remembering those in bonds as bound with them, would wish to wash our hands from the guilt of this iniquity.

Believing our principles just, and the position we occupy such as God can approve, and defend, and trusting in Almighty Grace, we pledge for the support of these principles, and those in which they are embodied, our EARNEST PRAYERS, our COMBINED INFLUENCE, and our MOST VIGOROUS EFFORTS.

THE MENDI MISSION.

Letters have been received at the office of the American Missionary Association, giving the particulars of the death of Rev. Wm. Raymond, which occurred at Sierra Leone, on the 26th of November, 1847. Measures are in progress for the reinforcement of the Mission at Kaw Mendi, and one or two missionaries are expecting to sail for Africa in the first vessel going there. It is said that King Kissicummah, the reigning chief in that part of the country, regards the mission with the same favor as before Mr. Raymond's death. The Mission School embraced ninety-three children at the last accounts.

The history of this Mission affords a striking example of the entire safety of thorough peace principles. Mr. Raymond was known to be utterly opposed to War, to Slavery and the Slave Trade, and although he professed no power other than that inherent in the influence which his Christian philanthropy had obtained for him, his principles were respected and his person and property held sacred to him At the commencement of the war which has been for some years raging all around the Mission, Mr. Raymond, knowing that many would flee to the Mission for safety against being taken captive and sold as slaves, made a law that no man should be "tied" (as a slave) in the Mission town, and that no man should be carried through the place tied. Up to the time of his death, this law had been observed and enforced; war men, head men, and even the kings, respecting it. Soon after Mr. R.'s death, some of the head war-men made a descent on the Mission premises, and tied and carried away one person as a slave. After remonstrating with them in vain, Thomas Bunyan, a Mendi African, who was left in charge of the Mission, laid the matter before King Kissicummah, and he was so enraged that he would have slain the principal aggressor but for the intercession of others, among whom we believe was Bunyan himself.

REGULATIONS FOR LENT.

Some two or three years ago we published the regulations for the observance of Lent among the Roman Catholics of Philadelphia. The following, from the Catholic Telegraph of Feb. 24, shows how they do in the dioceses of Cleveland and Cincinnati, Ohio:—

1. All the faithful who have completed their 21st year are, unless legitimately dispensed, bound to observe the fast of Lent.
2. They are only to make one meal a day, excepting Sundays.
3. The meal allowed on fast-days is not to be taken till about noon.
4. At that meal, if on any day, permission should be granted for eating flesh, both flesh and fish are not to be used at the same time.
5. A small refreshment, commonly called collation, is allowed in the evening; no general rule as to the quantity of food permitted at this time is or can be made. But the practice of the most regular Christians is never to exceed the fourth part of an ordinary meal.
6. The quality of the food allowed at a collation is, in this diocese, bread, butter, cheese, all kinds of fruit, salads, vegetables and fish, though not warm, but fish previously prepared and grown cold. Eggs are prohibited at the collation.
7. General usage has made it lawful to drink in the morning some warm liquid; as tea, coffee, or thin chocolate, made with water, to which a few drops of milk may be added, serving rather to color the liquids, than make them substantial food.
8. Necessity and custom have authorized the use of hog's lard, instead of butter, in preparing fish, vegetables, &c.
9. The following persons are exempted from the obligation of fasting: young persons under twenty-one years of age, the sick, pregnant women, or giving suck to infants, those who are obliged to hard labor, all who through weakness cannot fast without great prejudice to their health.
10. By dispensation, the use of flesh-meat will be allowed at any time on Sundays, and once a day only on Monday, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, with the exception of the first four days, and all the Holy Week, including Palm Sunday.

English Mormon Emigrants.—Several thousand English families, members of the Mormon Church, will arrive at New Orleans during this Spring, on their way to join the settlement formed in the Great Salt Lake Valley. An agent of the Mormon Church has been sent to New Orleans to provide passages for the emigrants on boats to St. Louis, as fast as they arrive. Another agent is stationed at St. Louis to engage transportation for them up the Missouri to the present encampment of the Mormons on the Missouri River, called "Winter Quarters." This encampment is on lands owned by the Omaha Indians, and in the immediate vicinity of Council Bluffs. From that point, or the vicinity, they expect every Spring to send out all who are prepared to emigrate to the Valley of the Salt Lake.

It is calculated that from eight to ten thousand souls, from England alone, will join the emigrating party this season. In addition, several other large parties are expected from other quarters of Europe.

The New York Commercial Advertiser says that on Saturday, a child 6 1-2 years old, son of Rev. S. M. Isaacs, took part in the service of the day at the new Synagogue in Wooster-st., reciting before a crowded congregation a chapter of the 2d of Kings, with the Synagogue music appertaining thereto; also the blessings before and after the lesson. His Hebrew reading was critically correct, and he could be distinctly heard in any part of that spacious building. We learn that he is intended for the Jewish ministry.

Letters and papers for Eld. Thomas E. Babcock, should be directed to Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

We find but little to notice in the proceedings of Congress last week. The Senate had under consideration the Ten Regiments Bill, which was finally passed by a vote of 29 to 19. Several private bills were also passed.

In the House of Representatives, there was no one subject of absorbing interest under consideration. The bill providing for the organization of a Territorial Government in Oregon was made a special order of the day for the 28th of March.

FOREIGN NEWS—REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

The steamer Cambria arrived at New York on Sabbath last, bringing advices from Europe to the 27th ult., fifteen days later.

The news from France is most exciting and important. A revolution broke out in Paris on the 23d ult., which has resulted in the abdication of the throne by Louis Philippe, the proclamation of a Republic, and the establishment of a Provisional Government. The immediate occasion of the Revolution seems to have been a refusal, on the part of the authorities, to permit the Grand Reform Banquet, which was to have been held in Paris on Sunday, the 20th, but was put off till Tuesday. When this refusal was made known, the Opposition in the Chambers proposed to impeach the Minister, Guizot; the people collected in great numbers; the National Guards took sides with them; a collision took place between the people and some of the King's troops; much blood was spilt; and finally the King abdicated in favor of his grand-son, who was rejected, and a Republic proclaimed. At the last accounts, the royal family had left Paris for England; the people had taken possession of all the railways leading to Paris and taken up the rails so as to prevent the arrival of troops; the Palais Royal and the Palace of the Tuilleries had been captured and the furniture destroyed; and the revolt was extending to the provincial towns.

The news from England is not particularly important. Cotton had declined, breadstuffs were still down, and money was abundant.

The last accounts from Egypt announced that Mehemet Ali was seriously indisposed. A letter announces that the dissolution of his Highness was hourly expected.

The Allgemeine Zeitung brings most distressing accounts from Silesia. Famine and disease prevail to a fearful extent, and the accounts given by that journal surpass even the heart-rending statements during the late distress in Ireland.

It is stated, in a recent letter from Alexandria, that information had been received that seven missionaries, (among whom was Mgr. Cazolani, a bishop,) who passed that city three or four months ago, had been massacred on the frontiers of Abyssinia.

THE TREATY OF PEACE.

We announced last week that the Treaty of Peace with Mexico had been ratified by the Senate of the United States. Some amendments were made, which are to be referred to the Mexican Government for approval. There are those who think that trouble may even yet be expected from that quarter. Generally, however, we believe the war is regarded as at an end. The Treaty is long, and many of its details are uninteresting; we therefore copy only the following most important articles :—

Art. V.—The boundary line between the two Republics shall commence in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land, opposite the mouth of the Rio Grande, otherwise called Rio Bravo del Norte, or opposite the mouth of its deepest branch, if it should have more than one branch emptying directly into the sea; thence up the middle of that river, following the deepest channel, where it has more than one, to the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico; thence, westwardly, along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico (which runs north of the town called Paso,) to its western termination; thence northward along the western line of New Mexico, until it intersects the first branch of the River Gila; (or if it should not intersect any branch of that river, then to the point on the said line nearest to such branch, and thence in a direct line to the same;) thence down the middle of the said branch and of the said river, until it empties into the Rio Colorado; thence across the Rio Colorado, following the division line between Upper and Lower California, to the Pacific Ocean.

Art. XII.—In consideration of the extension acquired by the boundaries of the United States, as defined in the Fifth Article of the present Treaty, the Government of the United States engages to pay to that of the Mexican Republic the sum of fifteen millions of dollars.

Art. XIII.—The United States engage, moreover, to assume and pay to the claimants all the amounts now due them, and those hereafter to become due, by reason of the claims already liquidated and decided against the Mexican Repulic, under the Conventions between the two republics severally concluded on the eleventh day of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, and on the thirtieth day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-three; so that the Mexican Republic shall be absolutely exempt, for the Future, from all expense whatever on account of the said claims.

Art. XIV.—The United States do farthermore discharge the Mexican Republic from all claims of citizens of the United States, not heretofore decided against the Mexican Government, which may have arisen previously to the date of the signature of this Treaty; which discharge shall be final and perpetual, whether the said claims be rejected or be allowed by the Board of Commissioners provided for in a following article, and whatever shall be the total amount of those allowed.

Art. XV.—The United States exonerating Mexico from all demands on account of the claims of their citizens mentioned in the preceding article, and considering them entirely and forever canceled, whatever their amount may be, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding three and one-quarter millions of dollars.

Bentz's Unbranning Machine.—The Editor of the New York Tribune has had the pleasure of seeing a specimen of common Genesee wheat which had been passed through this machine. The effect of the process is almost miraculous. The berry comes out entire, but robbed of its brown outer covering, purely white, polished, and resembling wax. In this state it has lost all its offal, and every particle will make extra flour, the berry having wasted but about two pounds to the bushel in the operation. The residue left in the machine is mere refuse and without value. The comparison between the berry after it has passed through the machine and before is greater than between the reddest wheat of Chicago and the whitest of Genesee. The saving in weight, as well as the advantage of color, by the process, is so great that it promises to create a radical revolution in milling, and force all millers either to employ it or abandon the business. A machine to cost about $500 will prepare about 4,000 bushels per day.

SUMMARY.

The trial of Dr. V. P. Cooledge, (says the New York Tribune of Monday,) for the murder of a young associate named Mathews, at Hallowell, Maine, is now proceding at Augusta. The evidence is of course very strong against him, and his conviction is very probable, though Hon. Geo. Evans defends him. The trial excites the deepest interest, and the largest church in Augusta is crowded with listeners. Cooledge was a dashing, speculating young man, and appears to have borrowed money of Mathews, and then destroyed him to get rid of the debt. He gave him brandy drugged with Prussic Acid, which killed him with the speed of lightning. This was in his own office, and Cooledge procured the aid of a student (now a witness against him,) to remove the body. He probably had not calculated on so speedy a death, and expected that Mathews would get out of his room and fall dead in the street or die in some other house.

Mr. John Cook, Jr., of Winchendon, Mass., has been arrested on a charge of murdering his wife, in Fitchburg, Mass., by administering arsenic to her in 1834, fourteen years ago. Suspicions of foul play were excited at the time of her death, which have since ripened into assurance upon observing that her body (which was deposited in a tomb,) has remained in a remarkable state of preservation. A recent analysis of her stomach has detected the presence of arsenic therein, and the testimony of the nurse, the sexton and of several doctors tend to fix suspicion on the husband, who is now in custody.

A resolution, highly interesting to the whole traveling community, has been adopted by the New Jersey House of Representatives, instructing the State Directors of the Camden and Amboy Railroad to insist upon the establishment of a daily line between New York and Philadelphia, running at convenient hours, by way of Camden, New Brunswick, &c., at $3 fare. The law now prescribes that the company shall not charge over $3, but it is evaded by the road crossing the Delaware at Trenton, and continuing the remainder of the way on the Pennsylvania side, upon a road that is chartered by that State.

The London News says that the Neapolitan steamer Capri brought intelligence from Syracuse that the earthquake which was felt there on the 11th, had laid the city of Augusta in ruins. The first shock was felt at 1 P. M., and was so violent that all the people fled from their houses. A following one, a few minutes afterwards, destroyed the whole place except 27 houses; the whole place sunk, and where it formerly stood there was no bottom at 50 fathoms. The last accounts from Syracuse state that 35 dead bodies had been found, and 59 wounded recovered from the ruins.

There is an enterprising Yankee in London who manages the ice business with immense profit to himself and the company with which he is connected. He presents himself as the agent of the American Ice Company; he has a patented Ice Safe, which he leaves throughout the city at the houses of the gentry and others, from whom he receives for each safe one or two guineas a year, supplying them also with ice, which he receives from a company in the United States.

In New York, on Tuesday, March 14, a fire broke out in the stable of Mr. Beebe, N. W. corner Christie and Bayard sts. extending to the rear of the Westchester Hotel, and in a short time it was in a heap of ruins, in which no less than fourteen horses were literally roasted alive. Nine of them are said to have belonged to Messrs. Gardiner & Williams of the Bowery Circus Company, and were very valuable, $900 having been paid for one of the number a few weeks ago.

There are at this moment residing in one house in Charleston, S. C., three individuals, natives of Scotland, and born in the same village. They emigrated to this country at different periods, and settled in different parts of the United States, and are not blood relations. The united ages of the three reach 222 years, making an average of 74 years each, and are all sound in body and mind, and active participants in the great drama of life, in the several spheres in which they move.

A steamboat disaster occurred at Dog-tooth Bend, on the Ohio River, by a collision between the Yazoo and Swatara. The latter boat immediately sunk, and her cargo, a valuable one, will be nearly a total loss. There was an insurance on her to the amount of $70,000. Fortunately no lives were lost.

We learn from the Galveston News of the 3d inst., that Epps, the supposed murderer of Muir, was arrested near the Falls of Brazos, where he had been living under the name of Judge Shelby. He had been previously discovered, and the Governor of Virginia notified of the fact, which led to his capture.

Gold ore has frequently been found by the peasantry near the Chaudiere River, below Quebec. Mr. Cunningham, a scientific mineralogist from the Southern States, has spent years in explorations, in the Chaudiere Valley, and Mr. DeLevy reported most favorably. The ore is said to be rich and abundant, and a joint stock company has been formed to work the mines. Some of the gold, when sent to this city, has been pronounced of the richest and purest quality.

A man named Elisha Kirkman sold a negro boy of 14 or 15 years of age, recently, at Wilmington, N. C., for $325. The boy had been indentured to the man's brother, in Guilford, and Kirkman bought his time and sold him for a slave, threatening him with death if he denied the ownership. After the fraud was discovered, Kirkman was overhauled and compelled to give up the money, and was then arrested and committed to jail to stand trial hereafter.

South Carolina has less than 20 persons to the square mile, and her citizens are leaving her rich soil and genial climate by thousands! Massachusetts, with a sterile soil, and a hard climate, has over 100 to the square mile, and the value of her land is rising in all parts of it!

The Barre Patriot records the death of Edson Higley of Templeton, N. H., caused by the use of water through a lead pipe. The death of his wife, which occurred two or three years ago, was attributed by some at that time to the same cause.

Mrs. Bingham, long a missionary at the Sandwich Islands, died at Easthampton, Mass. She was the wife of Rev. Hiram Bingham, well known in the missionary work. She returned from the Sandwich Islands some years since, on account of impaired health, which has been declining for some time.

When a piece of anthracite coal was first brought to Prof. Mitchell for experiment and opinion, he tried to burn it in all his wood stoves, and failed to produce ignition, and from these experiments he gave his candid opinion that when the world was to be burned, the anthracite coal beds were to be the only noncombustible materials in old Pennsylvania.

Mr. Adams' funeral car, though simple, was very tasteful and elegent. The bier was decorated with urns, and the canopy over the coffin surmounted by an eagle, the whole covered with velvet and crape. The car was drawn by six white horses, caparisoned in black, and led by grooms in white scarfs.

In Oppenheim, Herkimer Co., the dwelling house of Samuel Allen was destroyed by fire on the 4th inst. and two of his children burned to death. He was absent on a drunken frolic, and his wife and one or two of the other children were badly injured in making their escape.

According to Dr. Lyon Playfair, at London prices, a man can lay a pound of flesh on his bones with milk, at 3s.; with turnips, at 2s. 9d.; with potatoes, carrots, and butcher's meat free from bones and fat, at 2s.; with oat-meal, at 1s. 10d.; with bread, flour and barley meal, at 1s. 2d.; and with beans at less than 6d.

A writer in the N. Y. Journal of Commerce says that Henry Adams, the great ancestor of John Quincy Adams, came from Devonshire, England. With him also came eight sons. Joseph, one of the sons, was the original proprietor of the town of Braintree, (in which Quincy is now included,) and father of Joseph, whose son John was the father of John Quincy Adams. Braintree was settled in 1623.

M. Bonnafont, of Paris, a military surgeon, gave an account at the January session of the Academy of Sciences, of a method employed by him in cases of deafness, to ascertain whether the nerve of sound has lost all its susceptibility. He has ascertained that the skull is a good conductor of vibration, and that, if it be struck by vibrating objects, the nerve of the ear is acted upon whenever its susceptibility has not been entirely destroyed.

Hon. John M. Holley, a Representative in Congress of the Wayne and Seneca District of this State, died at Jacksonville, Florida, on the evening of the 9th inst., of a sudden apoplectic attack, causing a congestion of the lungs. He had been as well as usual during the day, took his ride in the morning, and ate dinner with the rest of the boarders as usual; and the fatal attack was so sudden that before his coat could be taken off, he had ceased to breathe.

The Legislature of Mississippi have passed a law calling for the election of delegates to remodel the Constitution of that State. The law provides that the election shall be held on the first Monday in August, 1848, and that after the formation of a new Constitution, it shall be submitted to the voters of the State for adoption or rejection, a majority of whom can adopt.

The Rhenish Observer says, "The chief magistrate of the town of Blessen, in Silesia, has sent an afflicting report of the condition of the inhabitants. DIED,

In Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 10th of Feb., 1848, Calvin Messenger, in the 42d year of his age. He was one of the number of whom the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Wirt was composed at its organization, of which he was a member at his death. To the great satisfaction of his friends, he manifested during his sickness a perfect confidence in God. His soul seemed to be filled with the most rapturous views of Heaven. T. E. B.

In Adams, N. Y., Feb. 29, of consumption, Lydia M. Maxson, wife of Lorenzo Maxson, aged 27 years, 9 months, 11 days. Sister Maxson early embraced religion, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Adams, of which she remained a worthy and exemplary member until called to join the church triumphant. In her last illness, she manifested entire resignation to her Heavenly Father's will, waiting patiently for the Saviour till He gently released her happy spirit from earth and bore it to the skies.

"No more shall pain and anguish move
That peaceful, calm, and quiet breast;
But safe in Jesus' arms of love,
Her ransomed soul is ever blest." G. M. L.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"
For all four of the Reviews,	8 00	"
For Blackwood's Magazine,	3 00	"
For Blackwood and three Reviews,	9 00	"
For Blackwood and the four Reviews,	10 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

"NOW OR NEVER!"

Now or never! now or never!
Let the maxim ne'er depart,
'Tis the watchword that forever
Should inspire each manly heart;
For, if justice must be rendered,
On the wrong that's done to thee,
That no malice be engendered,
"Now or never!" let it be.

Now or never! why to-morrow,
If the deed be good to-day?
There may lurk an age of sorrow
In one hour that's thrown away;
It is better to be doing,
For the future who may see?
And delay may lead to ruin—
"Now or never!" let it be.

Now or never! now or never!
When grim poverty appears,
Do the best of your endeavor
To assuage the mourner's tears;
For a time may come, thy measures
May be meted out to thee,
Would ye give from out your treasures,
"Now or never!" let it be.

FRUITS OF EQUIVOCATION.

"Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
When we practice to deceive!"

I was married when young to the man of my choice; and how happy my married life was, I can hardly bear to think. Mr. Percy was ——, but no matter, I must not venture to give words to my full heart.

We lived in London. My husband's profession made a city residence almost necessary, and confined him very closely to his office. But what signifies this? There are happy hearts and unspeakable enjoyments in the closest and most crowded streets, and ours was a happy home.

For ten years after our marriage we had never left London, except for an occasional day's recreation. Would that we had never thought of leaving it. But at the time we had two children, boys; and I, fool that I was, thought that they were delicate, that they pined for fresh country air. I said so, and urged my husband, for he too, I thought, was wearing himself away by keeping so close to his office. I urged him to retreat from business and London for a few weeks, and take us all into the country for a change of air. I had never proposed any plan to which Mr. Percy was not willing to accede, and he now took pains to gratify me. He could not leave London entirely, he said, but he would look out a cottage, a few miles in the country, to which I might take the boys, and he would come and see us as often as possible.

Well, we went into the country, I and my children. It was a pleasant village, (at least I thought it was pleasant then,) about eight miles from our London home; and two or three times a week my husband left business early in the afternoon, to spend the evening with us, and return early the next morning.

One day—oh! I shall never forget that day—I received a note from a friend who lived three or four miles from our cottage, inviting me to spend the day with her; that friend was the mother of our dear Lucy ———. I determined to go; and after taking lunch with my poor boys, I preferred to walk there, and my friend had engaged to see me safe home at night in her carriage. I had no expectation that my husband would visit us on that day. Indeed, I believed it impossible that he could, as I knew he had an appointment to keep with some committee that evening.

I had given my servant directions, and told her that I should not return until late, but had not said whither I was going, and was leaving the door of our cottage, when our youngest boy, dear little fellow, then not quite five years old, ran out to me and asked,

"Mother, where are you going?"

I evaded the question; for I feared the boys would wish to go with me, if I should mention the name of Mrs. ———, and I had made up my mind to go alone.

But Willy clung to my hand, and in his winning way, said, "You must not go, mother, without telling me where you are going." And then his brother ran out, and put the question in another way.

"Are you going to London to see father?"

Unguardedly, thoughtlessly, and yet, oh how criminally! I answered, "Yes, yes, to be sure, I am going to London." Little did I anticipate the train of miseries which followed upon that answer. How could I?

More than once during my walk, the thought obtruded itself that I had deceived my children, and I felt ill at ease; and if I had even then listened to the reproofs of conscience, foregone my anticipated pleasure, and returned to undeceive them, all might have been well. But I quieted myself with some wicked sophistry; I have not told an untruth; I am going to London though not to-day, and I did not say I was going to-day.

I had my pleasure—the last day of pleasure in this world that I ever enjoyed, or shall enjoy, though I live to be an hundred years old—and then I returned. It was about nine o'clock. I found my boys out of their beds, and the first question put to me was,

"Did father find you?"

"Find me! Father find me! What do you mean, and why are you not in bed?" I replied.

Their story was soon told. My husband had arrived at the cottage about an hour after I had left it, and was told that I had gone to London; that I was walking thither even then; that I had a letter that morning which I had put into my pocket, and that I had seemed in a great hurry to go after the letter came.

On hearing this, my husband, according to our servant's account, seemed troubled, and without waiting for refreshment or rest, immediately returned, leaving word that our boys might sit up till we come, if it were not very late.

All this was mysterious to me, except that part of the account which related to my deception. I could understand that, alas! too well. But why Mr. Percy should have come so early in the day, or how he could have come at all on that day, I could not understand, nor why he should be so anxious to see me.

I did not wait long in suspense. The sound of wheels was soon heard, a hackney coach drew up at the door, and my husband sprang out. His first exclamation was one of thankfulness that he had found me. His first question was, "Dear wife, where have you been?"

My account was soon given. "But," said he, "the boys told me that you were gone to London."

"Oh," I said, "that was a mistake."

"But, mother," interrupted Henry, our oldest boy, "you did say you were going to London."

I did not reply, for I saw that my husband looked terribly fatigued, and very anxious; and I busied myself in doing something for his comfort, and then put the boys to bed.

And then came my husband's explanation. He, too, had received a letter that fatal morning, of far more importance than mine—a letter that he thought required my consideration as well as his own; and, setting aside all other business, he hastened to consult me. There was no available mode of conveyance to the village at that time, unless he had hired a coach; and, had there been, perhaps he would have preferred walking. At all events, he did walk, and that hastily. It was a summer's day, but this would not so much have mattered, had he known certainly where I was to be found. Even if I had left no message as to whither I was going, no harm might have arisen; for then he would have thought of our friend ———, and have sought me at her house. But my unhappy, my wicked deceit! Oh! it was that that did the mischief. The instant he was told that I had received a letter, and had almost immediately started for London, he became troubled and anxious, lest some bad news had arrived from a quarter unknown to him, and hurried back still more hastily than he had walked from London, hoping to reach the city as soon as myself. He wondered that we had not met, but it was possible we had taken different paths on some part of the journey.

When my husband reached London, he found himself exhausted and unwell with the very hot, long, and fatiguing walk; and he became nervously excited when he found that I had not reached home before him. He waited impatiently for some time, too much disturbed, both by the pressing business which had caused this unexpected visit, and by my unaccountable absence, to take the refreshment he so much needed. After waiting some time in great and increased suspense, he went from one to another of our London friends, imagining the possibility of my being thus found, nothing doubting the reality of my journey to London. How was he to doubt it? he asked. Had I not explicitly told our boys that I was going thither? and had I ever deceived them or him?

At length, distressed beyond measure, by the joint effects of disappointment, and bodily fatigue and sickness, my husband once more reached his office, and finding that I had not made my appearance, determined to take a coach, and return to the cottage, with the vague hope that he had misunderstood the poor boys, or that they or the servant had misunderstood him. Thus ended this terrible day—terrible, at least, in its consequences.

I must pass over, continued Mrs. Percy, the remainder of my history as briefly as I can. I dare not dwell upon it.

That night, instead of enjoying the rest he so much needed, my husband complained of pain and weariness. The following day his sufferings increased; we sent for a physician. It was putrid fever! The infection might have been taken from the coach in which Mr. Percy traveled. We never ascertained whether or no it was so; but were this the cause or not, mine was the guilt, and mine has been the punishment! My husband died! Poor little Willy was the next victim, and then his brother. In less than a month from the day of that vile falsehood, I had neither husband nor son!

LAST MOMENTS OF MR. ADAMS IN HIS SEAT.

A Washington correspondent of the Emancipator, supposed to be Henry B. Stanton, Esq., of Boston, gives the following interesting particulars of what took place a little while previous to Mr. Adams being struck down in the House of Representatives:—

I was probably the first person in the House who noticed that any thing was the matter with Mr. Adams. My seat at the reporters' desk is so situated that the eye naturally falls upon Mr. Adams, his chair being directly before me, and about 15 or 20 feet distant. For a few minutes before he fell, I had my eye fixed upon him, being deeply interested in speculating how he would vote on the question then about to be taken. Mr. Chase, of Tenn., had proposed some very extravagant and fulsome resolutions of thanks to Generals Twiggs, Worth, Pillow, and the other Generals under Scott and Taylor, for their services in Mexico, and moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer them to the House. A part of the Whigs were in trouble, and made a variety of motions to get around a direct vote, while the Democrats seemed determined with the aid of a portion of the Whigs to bring the question to an immediate issue. The House was in a perfect turmoil. The call for the previous question had been sustained, and the main question had been ordered by yeas and nays. Twice I had heard Mr. Adams give his "NO" with unusual energy. The result of the vote on ordering the main question was announced, when the yeas and nays on that question were demanded and ordered—the reading of the resolutions was requested—they were read—half a dozen members were on the floor making inquiries of the Speaker—and he was rapping and requesting gentlemen to be seated, &c., the House being in utter confusion. During the latter part of this time, extending through some five minutes, I kept looking at Mr. Adams, wondering if he would vote for such a string of rhodomontade. I thought he was excited. I saw the color deeply tinging his temples. I heard him, without rising from his seat, utter two or three short sentences—the words I could not distinguish—nor did they seem to be addressed to any one. No one in his vicinity was noticing him, and all around him were either standing up or looking intently upon the uproar. Mr. Adams grew paler. His right hand moved nervously upon the desk, as if he was trying to grasp something. His lips moved, and I thought they pronounced the words "Mr. Speaker," though I heard no sound, and indeed it occurred to me that he was not speaking above his breath. This happened three or four times in the course of two minutes—and part of the time his lips moved, as if he were speaking continuously. So convinced was I that he was trying to address the Chair, that I rose and looked around the pillar between me and the Speaker to see if Mr. Winthrop was noticing him. Then the action of his hand upon his desk became more convulsive, and he appeared to be stretching it out to reach the corner of the desk, either for support or to assist him in rising, as I supposed—his lips still moving. At that moment, I noticed he inclined over to the left as if slowly falling from his seat, when I saw there was something extraordinary occurring to him, and I immediately spoke to a member of the House calling attention to Mr. Adams. By that time he had sunk quite on the arm of his chair, and was discovered by several members, one of whom cried out. "Mr. Adams is dying!"

MANUFACTURE OF INDIA RUBBER GOODS.

At Harlem, near New York, there is an India Rubber manufactory, where about 150 women and 50 males are employed, and where military equipments are made in no small quantities. The raw rubber is first cleanly washed, and after being dried is ground between two large cylinders under an immense pressure, heated so hot that the rubber looks as though it were burning. While it is grinding a preparation of turpentine is mixed with it to dissolve the rubber. The rubber comes from the roller a black mass, which is transferred to rollers of still heavier pressure, where it is ground again under a strong heat; thence it goes to a third roller to be heated ready to be put upon the cloth; this is done by a powerful set of rollers. The rubber thus prepared, is put upon the rollers and distributes itself evenly, at any thickness desired; the cloth is then put upon another roller that passes under the rubber, which, under great pressure, is forced into and through the cloth; no matter whether silk or the stoutest sail duck, it goes through. A coat is put on the other side in the same way, and no power can separate the mass after that. The cloth is then taken to the room where it is made into an infinite variety of goods to which it is adapted. The goods are cut out by patterns, and after the edges are covered with rubber cement, they are folded together and rubbed down closely, and soon become so closely fixed that any part will separate before the seams; there are in fact no seams, all is rubber without a particle of other fastening. After they are all fastened, the whole article is covered with powdered sulphur, and taken to be cured: this is done by placing them upon an iron railroad that passes into a large cylinder, where they are subjected to the action of steam at a high temperature, which cures them and completes an article that is affected by no temperature, and which will outwear iron itself. The goods taken out of the heater are boiled in strong potash lye and then washed, which leaves them ready for sale. The sulphate of lead and sulphuric gasses are also used to cure or vulcanize the rubber. The goods made by this machinery are elegant, and the operation of making them is very simple and yet complete. The invention is Yankee, and no nation can approach us in this kind of work yet.

PROJECTED ESCAPE OF BONAPARTE.—It is not generally known that a vessel was undertaken to be built at Batersea, by the renowned Johnson, the smuggler, for the purpose of liberating Bonaparte from the Isle of St. Helena. The vessel was about ninety feet long, and of the burthen of one hundred tons. It was built of half inch plank; the grain of two such planks was placed in a horizontal position. These planks were so well caulked and cemented together, that the thickness of the sides of the vessel did not exceed that of an ordinary washing tub. The masts were so contrived that they could be lowered to a level with the deck, and the whole vessel might be sunk in shoal water with the crew on board, without danger. Ample means were provided for supplying the vessel with fresh air. The plan was to sail up at night, within a short distance of St. Helena, and sink the vessel until the next or some subsequent night, when Bonaparte would be enabled to make his escape to the beach, at which time the vessel was to be raised, Bonaparte to get on board, and sail away in the dark. It happened however that Bonaparte died before the vessel was finished, and it is a curious coincidence that she was to be coppered the very day the news of his death arrived. Johnson was to have received £40,000 as soon as the vessel got into blue water, exclusive of the reward to be given in case the enterprise succeeded.

AMERICANISMS IN LONDON.—A London correspondent of the New Haven Register, in describing the novelty of the place, states that it is no uncommon thing to see posted in the streets—"American cheese, lard," &c. "American empty flour barrels." Corn bread, with the corn stalks sticking out of the window, to show that it is real simon pure. Also, "American boots," or boots made on the American plan, and "American overshoes," and "American clocks," and last, though not least, "Baby-Jumpers." These have, as yet, created the greatest sensation of any thing from the land of steady habits. They have been approved by the physicians and the press. Even the Times newspaper—the thunderer, as it is called—thinks them a very useful article; and Tuttle, the inventor, is acknowledged by all to be the great lion of the city. His extensive store in the Strand is crowded by his numerous customers, and the street and side-walk in front are blocked up by the curious gazers of all nations. It is said that he is to be appointed "baby-jumper" manufacturer to her Majesty, the Queen—who has been graciously pleased to accept as a present the beautiful Jumper exhibited at the Fair of the American Institute, and is in raptures at the delightful recreation it affords the little members of her household.

AGRICULTURE.—Mr. Andrew Stevenson, once Speaker of the House of Representatives, and afterwards Minister to England, in an address on agriculture in Virginia, said:—

"What occupation more full of dignity, duties more full of joy, than those which distinguish the husbandman. When was it that man ever rose from a state of servitude and dependence to proprietorship of land and its cultivation, that he did not learn self-respect and become more elevated in his own esteem? Then it is that an entire change takes place. Then it is, that breathing no low or abject spirit, he reaps from the soil a harvest of virtue,—the sobriety of the father—the economy of the mother—the devoted labor of the son—the chastity of the daughter, these are the fruits of glorious agriculture. And this is my answer to all who decry it. I pity those who know nothing of, or are incapable of enjoying, that soothing, cheering, and unsurpassing influence which agriculture sheds over the mind and heart of man."

"Oh! friendly to the best pursuits of man;
Friendly to thought, to virtue, and to peace,
Domestic life in rural pleasure passed!"

THE FIRST QUAKER.—An old American savage at an inn in New York, met with a gentleman who gave him some liquor, and being rather lively, he began to boast that he could read and write English. The gentleman, being willing to indulge him in displaying his knowledge, begged leave to propose a question, to which the old man consented. He was then asked who was the first person circumcised. The Indian immediately replied, father Abraham; and directly asked the gentleman who was the first Quaker. He said it was very uncertain, as the people differed in their sentiments. The Indian perceiving the gentleman unable to resolve the question, put his fingers into his mouth; to express his surprise, and told him Mordecai was the first Quaker, for he would not pull off his hat to Haman.

CARO AND THE AXE.—Some years ago, a gentleman had a large dog that he had learned to send from the field to the house, for any thing he might want. It happened one day that he was at work about half a mile from home, and wanted an axe. He told Caro (the name of the dog) to go home and get it. The dog started off, and after being gone a considerable time, came sneaking back, but without the axe. My father bid him go back and get it. The dog went the second time, and after being gone as long as before, returned, bringing a heavy beetle. My father now became satisfied that the dog could not find the axe, and went himself, and found it sticking firmly in a large log; and the helve gnawed from one end to the other by the faithful animal, in trying to extricate it. And being unable, he had taken the beetle as a substitute!

VARIETY.

A correspondent of the Wheeling (Va.) Times, gives that paper a statement of a female in that vicinity who, at the age of eighteen, married a widower, the father of nineteen children; at his death he left her the mother of five more. She afterwards married another widower having eleven children; at his death he left her the mother of two more; and the day she became forty-nine years old she married another widower, having eight children; so that at forty-nine we find her mother and step-mother of forty-five children, some of whom are grandfathers and grandmothers.

In Britain, the deposition of dew from the atmosphere is generally less during the continuance of an easterly than of westerly winds, a phenomenon attributed to the different nature of the surfaces over which these winds travel—the former crossing the continent of Europe, and thus becoming comparatively dry and arid; the latter sweeping across the vast expanse of the Atlantic Ocean, and therefore becoming moist or hydrated, requiring but little reduction of their temperature for the copious deposition of dew to ensue upon terrestrial objects.

Howitt, in his late work on Germany, remarks that buckwheat affords a curious instance of how we sometimes translate the names of things. In Germany, he says, it is called buchweizen, which means beech-wheat, because the grains are three-cornered, or shaped exactly like the nuts of the beech. We have retained the name buck, which in English gives no meaning, or a wrong one, as though it were called after the buck or male fallow deer.

The Swedes never litter their horses. The buildings used as a shelter for these valuable animals consist invariably of plank, and are preserved perfectly dry and clean by means of numerous contrivances through which the liquid excrement is drawn off as soon as avoided. The soundness so universal in the hoofs of the Swedish horses, is attributed wholly to this practice of retaining them continually in a dry state, it being quite uncommon to see a lame or foundered horse that has been so stalled.

I once met on the sea-shore, said the eastern poet Sadi, a pious man who had been attacked by a tiger and horribly mutilated. He was dying and suffering dreadful agonies. Nevertheless his features were calm and serene, and his physical pains seemed to be vanquished by the purity of his soul. "Great God," said he, "I thank thee that I am only suffering from the fangs of the tiger, and not from remorse."

It is said that when Audubon, the distinguished naturalist, arrived in the city of Cincinnati, his poverty was so extreme that he humbly requested permission of a drayman to pull a few hairs from his horse's tail. The novel request was granted, and these hairs Audubon manufactured into rings, which he disposed of for a few cents, and thus laid the foundation of fortune and success in life.

The following anecdote is told of an individual who listened to the splendid argument of Sheridan against Warren Hastings. At the expiration of the first hour he said to a friend, "All this is mere declamation." When the second was finished, "This is a wonderful oration." At the close of the third, "Mr. Hastings has acted very unjustifiably." At the fourth, "Mr. Hastings is an atrocious criminal." And at the last, "Of all monsters of iniquity, the most enormous is Warren Hastings."

The following is a sure way to drive away black ants; when they trouble your sugar-box, &c., just roll up a small piece of camphor gum in a paper, and put it inside the box, and it will soon kill or disperse all these intruders; sage or tea leaves thrown in their way, are also very troublesome to them.

Lord Eglinton gave a famous tournament in Scotland some years since, which was chronicled all over the world at the time. It cost nearly $250,000! Lord Eglinton's name is now found among the published list of bankrupts in Scotland!

The art of engraving on glass, has of late years greatly advanced in Europe, and it is asserted, that the process has now become as easy and complete as engraving on steel and copper.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	" "	Dec. 15,	"	March 22.
Third	" "	April 5,	"	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00	to $5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

A FRIENDLY EPISTLE RELATIVE TO THE SABBATH.

The following letter, written by Bro. Nathan Wardner to a friend in this country, has been placed in our hands with permission to make such use of it as we may deem proper. It contains many good thoughts, and some new ones, on which account we think our readers will thank us for publishing it:—

Hongkong, (China,) July 15th, 1847.

Dear Brother,—All the duties of man to God and his fellows are involved in one word, "love." The injunction is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," (Deut. 6: 5,) "and thy neighbor as thyself," (Lev. 19: 18.) This is the only principle upon which man ever performed an acceptable act in any age of the world. Hence the quintessence of Old Testament religion is identical with that of the New; its forms and institutions differing only so far as the circumstances of that age differed from the present. God being unchangable in his nature, could not be pleased with a different state of the heart four thousand years ago from what pleases him at present; and, under the same circumstances, could not approve a different course of conduct. The same conditions and relations must always impose the same obligations. To love God with all the heart, and our neighbor as ourselves, implies a supreme desire for the promotion of God's glory and the best interest of mankind. The Christian is to possess a kindred spirit with Him, and be prompted by the same desire, (differing only in degree,) for the accomplishment of the same end. Hence he can but love to do his commandments. "Whosoever saith, I know him," says the inspired penman, "and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." His laws are simply a revelation of himself; and to disregard them is to insult him.

Since love, as theologians generally agree, does not mean a simple emotion, or feeling, but an established principle of good-will, which prompts the possessor to that course best adapted to the desired end, the same principle must with equal strength awaken a desire to know what that course is. Whence is this knowledge to be obtained? Every intelligent Christian will answer, "From the volume of inspiration." No man can love God in the sense of the command above quoted, without reposing sufficient confidence in God's varacity to trust his word, or, in the love he bears to his creatures, to believe he desires their highest good. And no intelligent person would suspect his competence to judge. He being the Creator, knowing our nature, ability, and relations, certainly must know best what laws are most suitable for them. To desire, therefore, to set aside, or in the least to deviate from the path he has marked out, must be either to question his varacity or wisdom, or else exposes a spirit of disregard for him, his government, and the best interests of man, the out-flowings of an unreconciled and rebellious spirit. No law is perfect unless each article is based on a good and substantial reason, perfectly adapted to the relations existing between the subjects, and between them and their Law-giver. For if a precept has no good reason to enforce it, there can be none for obeying it; hence it is defective and imperfect. But the Psalmist says, "The law of the Lord is perfect." Therefore it must be based on those reasons and conditions which made its existence necessary. These precepts may perhaps be considered under two heads. 1st. Such as are of general application. 2d. Those that are of special and limited application. The first includes all those based on the general relations existing between God and his creatures, and between man and man. Those relations are the reasons upon which these precepts are based. Or, rather, the cause of the effects. And as well might we expect the time to come when lead will lose its weight while the laws of gravitation continue to act as they now do, as for any precept of the divine law to cease while the reasons which made its existence necessary are in full force. It is written, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Why? Because there is no other god. Can this obligation cease while that reason exists? Again, "Thou shalt not make any graven image." That is, to worship as God. Why? Because it would be robbing Jehovah of his due. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." Man sustains such a relation to his Maker as lays him under obligation to reverence him supremely. Can any of these obligations cease while those relations exist? Once more, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Why? Because it is the popular practice, or the law of the land, or more convenient to observe that day than any other? Let the Law-giver assign his own reason—which is as follows, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." In this rests the proof that he is the Author of all things, and of what is assumed in the three preceding precepts, viz. that he is the only true God. Thus furnishing his creatures with an indisputable testimony against atheism and idolatry. Was such an institution necessary in the early ages of the world and for the reasons assigned? To say it was not, would be charging God with folly. If it was necessary, then it was adapted to the relations man sustained to God and his fellows. Hence the relations must be changed or destroyed before that precept can be altered or annulled. The principle is universally acceded to in all treatises on government, that a law cannot cease or be altered while the reasons upon which it is based remain the same. Are not the reasons of this precept as applicable now as they were then? Is not the fact that God created the earth in six days and rested the seventh as true now as it was then? Is not a witness that he is the Creator of all things, as essential now as it was then? Where is there a single item in the reason God has assigned for this institution that is not applicable to man at the present day? If it is still applicable, we can with the same propriety contend that the first command is nugatory, as that the fourth is. This reason is as general in its application as that of any other precept of the Decalogue. It cannot with propriety be restricted to any one nation or body of people without excluding all others from the race of mankind. That it was designed for the whole human race is confirmed beyond all reasonable cavil by the words of our Saviour—Mark 2: 27—when he declares, "The Sabbath was made for man." Neither the Bible nor history gives any account that the Sabbath was ever made but once. Hence if it was ever made for man (as Christ declares) it was made for him when it was made, that is, at the finishing of creation. All caviling, therefore, in regard to its being a type of the gospel rest, or peculiarly a Jewish institution, is fruitless and vain. Even had it never existed till the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, the reason assigned for its institution makes it as obligatory upon Gentiles as Jews. For a law must be as extensive in its application as the reason upon which it is based. There would be as much propriety in limiting every other precept of the Decalogue to the Jewish nation as the fourth; which would free the Gentiles from the possibility of sinning, from all need of a Saviour, and from all interest in the atonement.

There are laws, however, of a special and limited application, based on special relations, and limited only by the limits of those relations. Such was the law of types and shadows, and such are the institutions of the gospel church. Since the fall, no covenant of works has existed by which man could merit pardon for his sins. If there had been, no atonement would have been necessary. But the Scriptures hold up Christ as the only medium of salvation to the fallen sons and daughters of Adam. And this salvation is offered only upon condition of faith in him as the sacrifice. Since there can be no faith without knowledge, types and shadows were instituted to represent him, and the work he was to perform, to those living prior to his advent. Through these they could see him, believe on him, and be saved by his merits. This relation was limited to the death of Christ, and then the ceremonial law ended; and after that, it had no application, neither to Jews nor Gentiles. This law extended as far as the reasons upon which it was based, both in application and time, and no farther. But did the obligation of children to honor their parents cease then? And why not? You would doubtless answer, "Because the relation they bear to their parents was not affected by the death of Christ; hence the same reason imposes that obligation now as much as it did before." Is not that mode of reasoning as good for the fourth command as for the fifth? Does not man sustain the same relation to God, as creature to Creator, since Christ's death, as he did before? Do not his condition and relation render a day of rest and worship as necessary now as they did before? Is not the fact that God is the Creator of all things as necessary to be kept in mind now as it was then? Does not man need a witness against atheism and idolatry as much now as he did then? If so, then all the reasons and relations which made the existence of that institution necessary at the beginning, are in full force at the present day. Hence, as true as the same causes acting under the same circumstances always produce the same effects, so sure the same reasons, with the same applicability, will always impose the same obligations. Therefore if conditions and relations have anything to do in imposing duty, the fourth command is as binding now as it ever was; all the arguments that man can invent to the contrary notwithstanding.

But we are told, that the Jews were urged to observe the Sabbath for another reason besides that given in the fourth commandment. What then? Did not that additional reason grow out of a special relation in which the Jews were placed, in addition to the general one, by reason of their deliverance from bondage? If that reason nullifies the general one, then that special relation must nullify the general one.

Again, we are told that all the Old Testament laws were abolished at the death of Christ, and such as are necessary under the gospel dispensation were reënacted. This brings us back to our former position, that is, that an obligation cannot cease while the reasons which imposed it remain in force. Can it be shown, that a single reason imposing any one of the ten precepts upon mankind has varied from what it was originally? I think not. If those precepts were ever abolished, man's relations to his Maker and his fellows were first abolished. Can man be freed from obligation to have no other God but Jehovah while he sustains the relation he now does and always did? Could the child ever be freed from obligation to honor his parents while he sustains that relation? Or can man ever be freed from obligation to recognize God as the Creator of all things while that fact exists? To all these questions you will answer, No. Such a thing could never take place without the universe being blotted from existence. But provided such an occurrence could take place, all then existing, would at once be freed from sin, (for there is no sin without law,) from all condemnation, (for there is no condemnation without law,) and from all obligation, (for there is no obligation without law.) Even the Jews that nailed our Saviour to his cross, could stand before Jehovah's tribunal and plead their innocence and guiltlessness.

Again, it is said, 'all were abolished except such as were brought over into the new dispensation.' Let me ask once more, Are man's relations to his Maker and his fellows the same now that they ever were? Should any one answer in the negative, he is bound to show wherein they differ. But, if they were always the same, without alteration, what bringing over could there be? To say the precepts of the Decalogue were brought over into the new dispensation, would be equivalent to saying that man's relations to God and his fellows were brought over, as though they would have ceased, had not such a transfer been made; which, to me, looks like an absurdity.

Christ declares that he "came not to destroy the law." Such a work was not included in his commission. Did he do more than he expected to when he came? To say that he did, the position must either be assumed that he was then ignorant of what was necessary for him to do, and learned something new afterwards, or that he transcended his authority by overleaping the bounds of his commission. What Christian would not shudder to make such a charge? We are also informed, that "he magnified the law and made it honorable." Would he have conferred honor upon the law by blotting it from existence as a worthless thing? Honor consists in representing an object as valuable and worthy to be extolled. But you will say, 'there was a law abolished at the death of Christ, for Paul says so?' Granted. But to say that all law was abolished then, would be to contradict our Saviour's declaration, and Paul's too; for Paul says, faith does not make void the law, but establishes it; that is, makes it more firm and immovable. The estimate which God placed upon it, is indicated by the price that was paid to satisfy its claims. Would he have paid such a price for that which was worthless, and fit only to be struck from existence? Again, Paul says, "the law is holy, just and good." Were these principles struck from existence at the death of Christ? They must have been if that law was, for they formed the very essence of it. That which was annulled could not have been based on any relation that now exists; if it had been, it would still be in force. But ~~all must~~ have been included in the typical, ceremonial, and Jewish national laws, which were intended for one end. The object of all was accomplished at that time, and all the reasons that enforced them ceased at that time. Therefore, a single precept of the Decalogue could not possibly be included with them. You will doubtless refer me to the 3d of 2d Corinthians to prove the abolition of the Decalogue. I do not admit that it proves any such thing; for it says no such thing. It says, "the ministration of death, written and engraven on stones, was glorious," which, with its glory, was done away by reason of the superior glory of the Spirit's ministration. Mark, it was not the law that was thus affected, but the ministration of it. This ministration was glorious inasmuch as it enforced the law, which was holy, just, and good, bearing the image of its Author, whose claims could be satisfied only by the death of the offender. The Spirit's ministration excels in glory from the fact that it enforces the same law, (which would make its glory equal,) and in addition to that, has the power of giving life to the offender upon certain specified conditions, and at the same time justice has its full demands; as it is written, "Christ hath redeemed us from under the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Thus making it a ministration of righteousness and life. From the above considerations, I cannot see how any of those passages speaking of the abolition of ordinances, feasts, festivals, new moons, and Sabbaths, which are declared to be shadows of Christ, can be considered as having reference to a single precept of the Decalogue, without contradicting revelation and the plainest dictates of reason.

The same arguments which prove that a law cannot be abolished while the reasons exist that enforce it, prove also that it cannot be changed. If a precept be changed from what it was, it is not the same. It becomes a different law, enforced by different reasons, based on different relations, and hence entirely a different thing.

SHOCKING SUPERSTITION.

The Constitutionnel relates the following case of "discipline in the French convents:"—"The houses of religious communities are much more numerous at Paris than is believed, especially those of women. Of what occurs therein in macerations and mortifications of all kinds, the following fact, hardly credible in the century in which we now are, may give an idea. On Tuesday, Dr. B—— was invited to visit one of these convents of cloistered women, to prescribe for one of the nuns. On his arrival at the convent, he was introduced to the cell in which the sick person, on whose behalf he had been called in, was lying in bed. He questioned her about her sickness, and on the symptoms which she felt. The sick person answered, in a weak voice, that nothing was the matter with her; but her features showed pain, and soon after her strength gave way, and she fainted. The Doctor hastened to unfasten her dress, and partially opened it in the endeavor to restore her consciousness; but judge of the surprise he then felt on seeing a crucifix placed on the breast of the nun, with spikes which entered the flesh. He immediately removed this instrument of torture; but the nun, on recovering from her fainting fit, put her hand to her breast, and, perceiving that her crucifix had disappeared, demanded it with loud cries, and repeating that she could not allow it to be taken from her, for that she bore it in fulfillment of a vow, and as an act of penitence imposed on her by her confessor. But the Doctor, employing his authority, declared that he would oppose the continuation of such maceration by all the means in his power. The nun had not only the breast torn and full of holes from the points with which the crucifix was covered, but her back presented traces of similar injuries. Dr. B——, on leaving the convent, took the crucifix with him."

PROFANE SWEARING.

"To swear—is neither brave, polite nor wise;
You would not swear upon the bed of death—
Reflect—your Maker now could stop your breath!"

Brother S—— and myself were entertained, during the Convention week, at the house of a medical gentleman, eminent in his profession, but addicted, it was said, to profanity in ordinary conversation. Without a premonition, no suspicion of so blameworthy a practice could have arisen in our minds; for no real Christian ever showed guests greater courtesy, or seemed further from profaneness than our gentlemanly host. He did not even annoy us with lady-like mincings, putting forth the buddings of profanity in "la me!"—"good gracious!" and the like.

But on Sunday night, our conversation taking a religious turn, the subject of profane swearing was incidentally named, when I could not resist the temptation of drawing a bow at venture, and so I said:

"Doctor, we leave you to-morrow; and be assured we are very grateful to Mrs. D—— and yourself; but may I say, dear sir, we have been disappointed here?"

"Disappointed!"

"Yes sir, but most agreeably——"

"In what way, Mr. C——?"

"Will you pardon me, if I say we were misinformed, and may I name it?"

"Certainly, sir, say what you wish."

"Well, my dear sir, we were told that Dr. D—— was not guarded in his language—but surely you are misrepresented—"

"Sir," interrupted he, "I do honor you for your candor; yet sir, I regret to say, you have not been misinformed. I do, and perhaps habitually, use profane language; but, sir, can you think I would swear before religious people and one of them a clergyman?"

Tears stood in my eyes, (the frank-heartedness of a gentleman always starts them,) as I took his hand and replied:

"My dear sir, you amaze us. Can it be that Dr. D——, so courteous and so intelligent a man, has greater reverence for us than for the venerable God!"

"Gentlemen," replied the Doctor, and with a tremulous voice, "I never did before see the utter folly of profane swearing. I will abandon it forever."

REFLECTIONS ON PROVIDENCE.

August 27, 1663. Wearied and somewhat sad at heart, I lay'd down my penne yesterday, and shortly afterward was sent for to give some helpe to one of our poore neighbors. The lesson came not amisse, and the words of the disciple to the blind man came to my remembrance, "Be of goode comfort, arise, hee calleth thee." There was still worke for mee to doe.

August 29. Busied this forenoone in ordering some changes in the household: looked on the linnen, and made out a list of some that could be spared for my daughter Brereton; in the toppe of a linnen chest found one or two of my first babie cloathes strewed with lavender, carefully pinned up and put away by poore old nurse; took up the lace cap, the two who had worne it first, my little sonne, my precious William, and beloved daughter Diana, both taken. Can I now say it is well? All things visible will passe away, but the unseene will remaine, so if the heart loveth these, its treasures are safe in Heaven. When evening came I walked forth; the sunne had gone down behind Framlingham, leaving a bright golden edge upon the narrow ridge of darke cloud; the aire was soft, and the Gillo-flowers on the low wall gave out a pleasant perfume as I passed; stopped and pluct'd some of the pale yellow flowers, as I thought of the day whereon my three little maidens brought the young plants from the castle, and planted them here, the while I stood bye looking at their happie faces; now one is not, and the others are farre from mee. As I walked up and down the terrace, saw the rookes as they slowly winged their way over head to their nests and young broods; how small a thing maketh the full cup to overflow—the tears rose to my eyes, my home was deserted. As it became darker, the starres, which did at first show but dimly, were now bright and sparkling. There was scarce a sound, the birds were all silent, save the corn-crake, which uttered its harsh note afarre off; a bat flitted past, neare to my face, the shapes of things became indistinct, and no shadow marked the houre on the sunne-dial; a little gust of wind rose, and stirred the tops of the trees. The stillnesse of all around was very solemn; a sweete feeling, that could not be uttered, of lowly thanksgiving and love, spread over my heart. The Lord was very gracious unto mee; it was a season of inward peace, as of outward silence and beauty, and my heart was stirred as the trees of the wood are moved by the wind.

Came into the house, and seeing the sand-glasse that I had turned at sun-sett, that it was runne out, the prayer arose that so my life might runne its course, and gently cease.

DIVORCE OF LABOR FROM STUDY.

To a true and healthful devolopment of the man, I deem a constant participation in manuel labor indispensable. Labor! blessed boon of God, to alleviate the horrors and purify the tendency of our fallen state! when shall its benefits and its joys be brought home to each and to all? We may make it a curse and a burthen by so regarding it, as we may any other blessing from heaven, but the truth is irrepressible that only he who is familiar with labor and loves it can either improve or enjoy life. The man whose only stimulant to exertion in any field is the hope of individual gain, can hardly have risen above the condition of a slave. We must learn to be true workers—our frames need it—our unperverted impulses demand it—our very souls, if unstifled, cry out for it. Most earnestly, then, do I record my protest against the all but universal prescription which divorces entirely profound study from manual labor—which, in its attention to the intellectual and moral nature of the student, forgets that he has also a physical frame to be developed and invigorated. Do the mass of our young men finish their studies with stronger constitutions, sturdier frames, more athletic limbs, than they brought away from their parental firesides? Not within the sphere of my observation—far otherwise. I have known many dyspepsias, consumptions, debilities, which traced their origin to the seminaries: I do not remember any that were cured there; I have known the stout lad in the district school who graduated a feeble invalid from the university. My conviction is that the physical department of education has decidedly retrograded since the days of Greek freedom and glory. Our prevalent error is not one of method and detail—it is fundamental. We have lost the true basis ordained of God for the harmonious and healthful development of the whole human being, in separating the educatian of the head from the education of the hands.

THE ELEVENTH COMMANDMENT.

A certain bishop, who lived some hundred years ago, and who was very unlike the Christian bishops of old, before titles were invented for them; very unlike Fenelon too, who nevertheless had plenty of titles; very unlike St. Francis de Sales, who was for talking nothing but "roses;" very unlike St. Vincent de Paul, who founded the Sisterhood of Charity; very unlike Rundle, who "had a heart," and Berkley who "had every virtue under heaven,' and that other exquisite bishop, we blush to have forgotten his name, who was grieved to find that he had a hundred pounds at his banker's when the season had been so bad for the poor; this highly unresembling bishop, who nevertheless was like too many of his brethren,—that is to say in times past, for there is no bishop now, at least in any quarter of England, who is not remarkable for meekness, and who does not make a point of turning his right cheek to be smitten, the moment you have smitten his left—this unepiscopal and yet not impossible bishop, we say, was once accosted, during a severe Christmas, by a parson-Adams kind of inferior clergyman, and told a long story of the wants of certain poor people, of whose cases his lordship was unaware. What the dialogue was, which led to the remark we are about to mention, the reporters of the circumstance do not appear to have ascertained: but it seems that the representations growing stronger and stronger on one side, and the determination to pay no attention to them acquiring proportionate vigor on the other, the clergyman was moved to tell the bishop, that his lordship did not understand his eleven commandments.

"Eleven commandments!" cried the bishop; "why, fellow, you are drunk. Who ever heard of an eleventh commandment? Depart, or you shall be put in the stocks."

"Put thine own drunken pride and cruelty in the stocks," retorted the good old priest, angered beyond his Christian patience, and preparing to return to the sufferers for whom he had pleaded in vain. "I say there are eleven commandments, not ten, and that it were well for such flocks as you govern, if it were added as it ought to be, to the others over the tables in church. Does your lordship remember, do you in fact know anything at all of Him who came on earth to do good to the poor and woful, and who said, 'Behold I give unto you a new commandment, love one another." [Hunt.

"IN THE BEGINNING."

The beginning spoken of here has been variously estimated. My own opinion, as published in 1814, is, that it forms no part of the first day, but refers to a period of indefinite antiquity when God created the worlds out of nothing. The commencement of the first day's work I hold to be the moving of God's Spirit on the face of the waters. We can allow geology the amplest time for its various revolutions without infringing even on the literalities of the Mosaic record, while nature herself bears witness to the need of a creative interposition, more especially for the lattter part of the work of the third day, even though geologists should be able to assign a competent natural process for the former part of that day's work. If the one could be executed by the old laws of matter, the other requires new dispositions, these incontestible evidences of a directing wisdom in the formation of the actual economy of things. The sixteenth verse is perhaps retrospective, as the first, and part of the second are. At all events the language admits of being so rendered as to signify that on this fourth day the lights were not made first to exist, but made to be for signs and the division of time, which they could only be by the dispersion of those dark and heavy vapors which might have altogether obscured the firmament from the view of the earth. This solution is strengthened by the philological arguments of Rosenmuller; and even Granville Penn, the greatest of all our recent alarmists, has a theory by which to dispose of the imagination that the heavenly bodies were formed on the fourth day. If geology can make good periods of solar darkness, it were in further harmony with our views. [Dr. Chalmers.

On Listening to Evil Reports.—The longer I live, the more I feel the importance of adhering to the rule I have laid down for myself in relation to such matters:—1. To hear as little as possible whatever is to the prejudice of others. 2. To believe nothing of the kind till I am absolutely forced to it. 3. Never to drink into the spirit of one who circulates an evil report. 4. Always to moderate as far as I can the unkindness which is expressed towards others. 5. Always to believe that, if the other side were heard, a very different account would be given of the matter. [Life of Simeon.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 30, 1848.

NEWS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.

Within the past week, two vessels from Shanghai, China, have arrived at New York, bringing letters from our missionaries to Nov. 17, some three months later than those previously received. The letters to the Executive Board we do not of course feel at liberty to publish until they have been laid before that body. But here are on our table several letters to private individuals, which give a very good idea of the feelings and position of the missionaries, and from which we are sure we shall be pardoned for making some extracts. May these extracts serve to encourage the friends of the mission throughout the denomination, as the letters have encouraged those to whom they were written.

The first letter we take up is from Mrs. Carpenter to Mrs. A. M. Rogers. Under date of October 23, 1847, she says:—

"We have been talking of the day we last saw you all—a day ever memorable in our calendar, and a day which our friends will remember for our sakes. Nearly ten months have elapsed since then, yet how fresh are your parting words! How distinct is the tear which glistened in many an eye! How eloquent the 'farewell'—the 'God bless you,' which is still ringing in our ears! How warm the pressure of many a hand which we shall never clasp again this side the grave! They are past—those words, those looks, those shake-hands. Can we ever forget you? Shall we ever be forgotten? It is wrong to ask. How vivid is every family scene there—how familiar every social circle in which we have mingled! Now we are a little community by ourselves. We have formed many valuable acquaintances, gained many valuable friends; still our hearts cling to each other. We love our associates, and we know we are loved in return. Nor do we love our friends on the other continent less. Our hearts cling to them, and we feel that we are only separated for a season. The whole globe lies between us, yet many a waking, many a sleeping hour, do our spirits hold sweet fellowship with them, and derive strength from the silent communion. To-day has been the Sabbath. Shall I tell you how we spend it? We commence by a social season of prayer on sixth-day evening. Our cheerful breakfast is enlivened by some chat of a Sabbath-day character. Our daily morning devotions after breakfast are perhaps a little protracted. At ten o'clock we sing, read a sermon or religious lecture, then close by prayer, and try to make the remainder of the day profitable by conversation, meditation, &c. The monthly concerts we observe, and find them thus far very profitable. We sometimes attend the sanctuary assemblies of our first-day friends, but not weekly. Their Thursday evening prayer meetings we generally some of us attend. But how different from our accustomed social meetings at home in happy America." * * * * *

Nov. 17.—"You ask if I am happy? Yes, I am and have been most happy. I would not exchange my present prospects with the wealthiest, the most fashionable lady in New York. I too am an inhabitant of a mighty city—a walled city—a heathen city—a city of the dead, dead in trespasses and sins. When will they look to Him through whom alone they may have light and life? It seems so very, very long, before we shall be able to converse much with them. Yet we certainly have much to encourage us, when we find that we can make ourselves at all understood. We are constantly adding to our little stock of words and phrases, which is already quite available in our domestic affairs, and in conversing with our teacher, who takes great pains to correct and improve us. Our missionary friends are very kind to assist us; and although they have taken no pains to conceal the fact that they deprecate such a diversity of opinions here, still they treat us with as much cordiality as our most sanguine hopes could have promised us."

The next letter we take up is from Mr. Wardner, dated Nov. 8. Here is a paragraph from it:—

"The Chinese mode of burying is peculiar. Few bodies are interred, but they are generally placed in highly-ornamented coffins, which are so much prized that many purchase them before death to suit their own fancy. These are placed in some retired spot, and thatched with straw, or arched over with brick, leaving a small opening in one end. Sometimes large numbers of them are placed together, and covered with earth, forming high mounds; but very frequently they stand alone and uncovered. At the time of burial, brown paper, cut in the shape of money, or gilt paper, is burnt by the coffin to furnish the departed spirit with spending money. About three times a year, they go to cleanse and repair them, and burn incense money, &c. Bro. Carpenter and myself witnessed such a scene yesterday morning in our walk. The surface of the soil was removed by the side of the grave, which was filled with straw, and covered with a mat supported by two bamboo poles, and a suit of clothes placed on this, arranged in the order worn, so as much to resemble a person, covered with ghost money. When the torch was applied, a woman and two children presented themselves, with white sashes (mourning badges) tied around their heads, the ends of which reached nearly to the ground behind them. As the smoke began to rise, they bowed, waving their clenched hands four times; then, kneeling, they bowed their heads to the ground the same number of times; after which the woman burst forth into a loud and mournful lamentation." * * * * * "We begin to talk to the people a little about Ya-soo-koo tau-lee (Jesus doctrine,) and generally find them quite willing to hear. Our hired man appears quite thoughtful, reads his Testament attentively, verbally renounces idolatry, seems pleased to hear us talk on the subject of religion, and says he prays daily." * * * * * "On the evening of the first inst., a fire broke out in the eastern suburbs, which consumed upwards of a hundred houses. The loss is estimated at half a million. Several persons were consumed, and many families no doubt deprived of homes and the comforts of life. The boatmen, principally from Canton and the Fukien provinces, came forward and plundered by force of arms."

Part of the letter from which the above is copied, was written by Mrs. Wardner, who expresses much anxiety to become qualified to teach, and to have a school for Chinese youth.

We will close our extracts with the following paragraph from a letter of Mrs. Carpenter, in which are some important and timely suggestions in answer to inquiries upon the subject of which she speaks:—

"When another company is sent out, tell them to bring every thing they have in the world, from a cook-stove down to a rolling-pin. Nothing is in use in our own country which is not needed just as much here. We are just as liable to sickness, in which case the accommodations needed there would be indispensable here. We do not suffer for anything, but we hope others will profit by our experience and bring a regular outfit of everything, as most of the articles needed are difficult or impossible to obtain here, and are very expensive when found. Of course I do not allude to food; we can live as cheaply here as at home, and whatever is made here is cheap; but the natives have faint ideas of our necessities, and would have no object to minister to them if understood. Cotton-wool in all its forms is very cheap; silks also, and many kinds of cotton goods. But prints, and muslins, such as we use, are a different thing; a muslin dress which in New York could be bought for two dollars, cannot be bought for less than ten or twelve here. We happen fortunately not to need, and so shall not buy. Materials for caps and collars, and such like things, are entirely out of the question. Flannels and yarn stockings we must send home for. I mention these things that our friends may be guided by them in their future action on such matters. Some generous heart may wish to give, and would gladly do so were it known that such things were as acceptable as money. For their benefit, I would say, they are more so. And the trouble of sending them will be slight, compared with the expense of buying them here, or the discomfort of going without."

ODD-FELLOWSHIP—NO. 4.

Since my last, I have received an account of the expulsion of Francis X. Zeigler, (the witness who testified in the Lancaster case, narrated in No. 3.) The poor brother had told too much truth, reluctant as he was. Such conduct was unworthy of an Odd-Fellow. The following is a copy of his expulsion:—

"Susquehanna Lodge, No. 80, I. O. of O. F.,
Monday evening, Nov. 17, 1845.

Mr. F. X. Zeigler:

Dear Sir,—I hereby notify you, that for conduct unworthy an Odd-Fellow, (of which you are aware,) you was on Monday evening, Nov. 10th, by a unanimous vote, expelled from this Lodge.

Yours in haste,
H. H. Haustorn, Secretary."

This affords additional evidence of the corruption of the Order. Henceforth it cannot be claimed, that Odd-Fellowship does not require a brother to aid another contrary to justice; for in this instance the Lodge voted unanimously to expel him because he had the temerity to conform in any degree to the demands of the law and the claims of justice.

Odd-Fellowship has likewise been charged with controlling elections. The following is an extract from a pamphlet on "Secret Societies," by Rev. J. S. Backus, Pastor of the Baptist Church, Auburn, N. Y.:—

"When on my way to Philadelphia, last fall, I witnessed the efforts of an Odd-Fellow to obtain the name of a gentleman for membership in a lodge, in which he took occasion to speak of a candidate for an important office in Pennsylvania, who, he affirmed, would be elected. On being asked how he could think so, as his party were in the minority, he replied, 'He belongs to the I. O. of O. F.—to a lodge in the city, where they number over five hundred of the real old stand-bys.' 'But do you suppose,' said the man, 'that being a member of the Order will help one into office?' 'I know it,' said he, 'I belong to the Order myself, and understand its advantages.' This was sufficient—the man gave his name to be proposed, that he might unite before election."

This will furnish us with a key to the strange results of certain elections. I will introduce another extract from the same author to show that Odd-Fellowship interferes with the discipline of the churches:—

"It has dared to lay its meddlesome hand on the discipline of a church, staying the exclusion of one, and moving the exclusion of another who was less criminal than the former, save that he opposed the secret society to which the former and mover belonged."

I will likewise present some extracts from the "Renunciations and Expose of Odd-Fellowship," by Dr. E. Willis, of Harvard, whose respectability is endorsed by over fifty inhabitants of the town where he resides. In giving his reasons for renouncing the Order, he presents many which my limits will not allow me to introduce. I shall introduce a few, and refer the reader to the original work:—

"Settled thus as I am in my conviction of the corrupt and corrupting tendency of the obligations of the Order, I could no longer coalesce with it. I could not feel that I had done my duty as a citizen, until I had done what I could to put the public upon its guard and to prevent its mischief.—Page 8. It is objected that I am bound to secrecy by its obligations. To this I reply, I claim a release from all obligations peculiar to Odd-Fellowship which I have taken, on the ground of contract. I was desirous of knowing what were the obligations and secrets of the institution before joining, that I might maturely consider and judge of its merits for myself. But I was told by them that I must take it upon their recommendation, but that I might be assured it would not affect my religious or social obligations and duties. It was on that express condition that I took it, and on that condition I claim exemption, total exemption, from the bond. I esteem the whole thing a lying fraud. To adhere to it I must violate every relation to God or man. I feel bound in conscience, to enter my solemn protest against the whole thing—its obligations, its secrecy, its signs and tokens, its exclusiveness, its sacrilegious ceremonies, its lying pretences, both in its lectures and its claims to antiquity, its titles and its fooleries. My duty to expose and rebuke such iniquity, I could not covenant away, if I should try. But I did not try. I fling back the charge of breach of contract upon those who make it."—Page 9.

After showing that it interferes with the domestic, social, religious and civil relations, he declares that "the pledge of non-interference which they gave me was not true; the institution does interfere with every social relation." But he justifies his renunciation of Odd-Fellowship upon another ground, and one dishonorable to the fraternity:—

"It is on the ground of deliberate deception and fraud. Before uniting I had heard the secrets of the Order were exposed and published in a book. And I had heard something of the nature of the disclosures. I told them what I had heard, and that if it were true I did not wish to unite with them. They assured me again and again that it was false, that the pretended disclosures were not true; and it was on that assurance that I went forward. But to my no small amazement, when I had been initiated, and taken the degrees, and got a book of disclosures, and come to compare them, I found the book correct, so correct, that some of the lodges use it in the lodge work as their guide." Page 10.

But he claims justification "on the ground, that in its present position no man can adhere to its obligations of secrecy, without lying, deceiving, or conniving at deception. The thing is out, and was out when Odd-Fellows told me it was not." Page 11 and 12. I might continue these extracts to any length, but think the above is sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced mind on the subject. Should any one desire farther information on the subject, it can be obtained by addressing a letter, postpaid, enclosing money enough to cover the expense, to Rev. Nathaniel Colver, 2 Province House Court, Boston; or, W. S. Damrell, No. 11 Cornhill, Boston. Having established, (at least in my own mind,) that a church would be justified in excluding a member who is an adhering Odd-Fellow, after due labor, provided he cannot be reclaimed, I close my investigation, unless I should feel myself called out by a criticism upon what I have written.

Temperance in Maine.—A correspondent of the Christian Observer says that in respect to temperance, Maine is the Banner State. Some special exertions in this cause were made as early as 1828. Signal success also has attended these and those made more systematically and upon a more extended scale since. The inland and rural districts especially, have thus been almost thoroughly purged and purified from that blighting curse that was previously upon them. And while much yet remains to be done in our larger and more populous districts, and those adjoining the seaboard, there is reason for hope in the many clean hands and stout hearts, that are as valiantly as ever battling it against this giant foe of God and man, especially in connection with the promised aid and blessing of Almighty God on efforts herein made in His strength, and with a supreme reference to His glory and the religious as well as moral well-being of man."

The Pope not Omnipotent.—A correspondent of one of the English papers, writing from Rome, tells a singular story of the limits of the Papal power. There was an outburst at Milan some weeks since, and a number of persons were killed. Funeral services, in honor of the slain, were performed in the church of St. Carlo Borromeo. The usual prayers were offered. This very highly incensed the Austrian Ambassador, and he forthwith repaired to the Lateran to expostulate with His Holiness, Pius IX. The Pope told him that he could do nothing in the premises. The prayers had already gone up to heaven, and could not be recalled. Even the possessor of St. Peter's keys could not do anything to hinder their efficacy. The Ambassador had to leave disappointed.

Churches in New York.—By a paragraph in the Journal of Commerce, of Saturday last, it appears that there are two hundred and nineteen places for public worship in the city of N. York. Twenty years ago, when the population of the city was 200,000, there were one hundred and one churches; now the population is estimated at 400,000, from which it is inferred that the city is better supplied now than formerly with places of public worship, which is undoubtedly a fact, if the comparative size of the houses is taken into consideration, the recently built churches being much more capacious than those of twenty years' standing.

Protestant Teacher turned Catholic.—A good deal has been said in the papers respecting a female teacher who went West under the patronage of Gov. Slade's and Miss Beecher's Education Society, and then entered the Catholic church. From a letter of Prof. Stowe it appears that the individual is Miss Mary P. Thompson, a native of Durham, in New Hampshire, who was educated at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, and removed to Ohio in the spring of 1846, a year before this Society was organized. She applied to Miss Beecher and Gov. Slade for a situation as a teacher after she had gone to the West. She engaged to become a teacher, and then declined, concluding to take the veil and enter the nunnery at Cincinnati. The reason of her course, according to the Congregational Journal, is that she was not treated with all the deference she thought due to one of her importance by the Protestant minister and church in the place where she resided; and the Catholics discovering that her pride was wounded, by a little extra attention and flattery coaxed her into their church, making many promises of what they would do for her.

Roman Catholics in Arkansas.—The Catholic Almanac for 1848 says that three Roman Catholic families have not settled within the limits of Arkansas for the last three years and a half. The bishop has lately traveled, on horseback, over five hundred miles, and only met two families who professed the faith. He states with reluctance and pain, that he has received in his whole diocese, no more than thirty-one dollars, for three years and a half, toward his maintenance; hence must the bishop look to the charity and benevolence of the friends of religion abroad to enable him to provide, both for himself and his clergy, food and raiment for the missions of Arkansas; for were all his flock, scattered as they are over a diocese of fifty-five thousand square miles, assembled together, they would not form a large congregation.

Dr. Burns.—In our occasional allusions to the visit of Dr. Burns to the Free-Will Baptists of this country, we have spoken of him as a delegate from "the General Baptists of England." But a friend in London informs us that this is a mistake, as "he represents the 'New Connection of General Baptists,' who are chiefly sprung (like himself) from the Methodists, and does not belong to, nor is recognized by, the original and genuine denomination, constituting 'the Assembly,' which hath regularly met in London from 1639."

Religion among the Baptists in New York.—At the monthly meeting of the pastors of Baptist Churches in the City of New York, held on the 6th of March, about two hundred baptisms were reported as having taken place within the previous month. Serial meetings are now progressing in several of the churches.

An Appropriate Text.—In Boston, on the Sunday after the death of Mr. Adams, some three or four clergymen preached from the following singularly appropriate text: "For behold, the Lord of hosts doth take the mighty man, the prudent, and the ancient, and the honorable man, and the counsellor and eloquent orator."—Isaiah 3: 1—3.

Premium for a Tract in German.—Rev. Dr. Kurtz, editor of the Baltimore Lutheran Observer, has received a communication from Basle, Switzerland, offering 250 gold ducats, or $625, for the best tract in German on the Sanctification of the Lord's day. The design is to circulate the accepted Tract as extensively as possible throughout Europe.

The Jews.—It is said that within the last twenty years thirty thousand wealthy Jews have emigrated from Bavaria, on account of the restrictions to which they were subjected. On the other hand, it is stated that a Jewish gentleman, named Aratri, has been chosen a director of the Roman Club in Florence—an honor never before conferred on a Jew in Italy.

"Honor to whom Honor."—In our paper of week before last appeared the "Song of the Snow-Bird," credited to Miss Gould. We ought to have known—and should, if we had given the subject a moment's thought—that not to Miss Gould, but to our old friend, Rev. Francis C. Woodworth, Editor of the Youth's Cabinet, belongs the honor of immortalizing "poor chick-a-de-de."

Alfred Academy.—A Catalogue of the Officers and Students of Alfred Academy and Teachers' Seminary, for the year ending March 10, 1848, is before us. The number of gentlemen in attendance upon the school during the year was 246; number of ladies 209; making a total of 455. This indicates that the Institution has a strong hold upon the confidence of the community.

The Union Magazine for April is one of the richest numbers yet published. It has more than twenty original articles, generally of a high order; three fine engravings, and nine wood cuts. Mrs. Child and Mrs. Sigourney are among the contributors. Edited by Mrs. C. M. Kirkland. Published by Israel Post, 140 Nassau-st., at $3 per annum.

The Christian Reflector comes to us this week in a neat dress, and without the smell of fire upon it, although the office in which it was printed, together with many valuable papers, was consumed in the recent fire at Boston. Distant be the day of a similar calamity.

Origin of the Present Pope.—A converted Roman Catholic priest of New York, who has in years past been quite intimate with the present occupant of the Papal chair, and who is perfectly familiar with his personal history, states that his first position of any prominence, was that of a membership in the Garde Nobile. While thus engaged, he was induced to take a vow, threw up his office, and became priest. Not long after, he went as a missionary to Chili, and while on his way, visited the city of New York. His stay in Chili not being very protracted, he returned to Italy, where he was appointed Papal Nuncio to Naples, and by a train of peculiar circumstances was made cardinal, and finally was elevated to the pontificate. It is difficult to say how far the impressions he received in America may have influenced his subsequent actions.

Cheap and Uniform Postage.—The partial reduction of letter-postage in this country has operated very favorably, increasing the number of letters from 25 to 52 millions, and requiring less appropriations from the general treasury than was anticipated. In England, where the reduction has been complete, the number of letters has increased four-fold, and the post office revenue has exceeded the annual expenses by four millions of dollars. In view of these facts, some of the Bostonians are urging a greater reduction and more uniform rate of postage. They have prepared a petition to Congress, which is to be extensively circulated throughout Massachusetts. We copy it in hope that it will be approved and circulated in other States:—

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, Citizens of Massachusetts, respectfully petition Congress to pass a law to establish a uniform rate of Postage, not to exceed one cent on Newspapers, and two cents on each pre-paid Letter of half an ounce, for all distances; and as in duty bound will ever pray.

A Sensible Poet.—We have known persons who doubted the existence of sensible poets among those who write for the newspapers. But the following paragraph from the N. Y. Recorder is proof positive that there are such:

"We received, some days ago, a few verses, with the accompanying direction:—'If they are first-rate, you may publish them—if they are not, burn them, and accept the thanks of ——.' We have complied with these sensible directions explicitly. The verses were fair, but they were not "first-rate." We committed them to the flames with the feeling that it would be a relief to us, if many others who write verses were as considerate and as wise as the author of these."

The Contrast.—'The Blue Hen's Chickens,' a paper published at Wilmington, Delaware, contrasts the free labor of the North with the slave labor of the South, as follows:—

"In the Eastern States, no man is respectable who has not some business or employment, except he be superannuated; every man is a working bee; there are no drones; consequently, the country is prosperous. The poor and rich are happy, and live in the midst of plenty. Not so in the South, where slavery exists. There, labor is disreputable, and no one works who can by any means avoid it. Consequently, the labor of one-half the population is lost. The country looks desolate and decaying; morals are at a low ebb; there is no enterprise and no improvement; and a few white slaveholders enjoy all the honors and offices. The many whites are ignorant, and degraded almost to the level of slaves, except that they cannot be sold like cattle. Then, must these few slaveholders be permitted to plant their accursed institution in new and free territory, to the exclusion of white laboring and producing freemen, both from the free and slave States? Forbid it, Heaven!"

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

The following section from one of Andrew Fuller's Sermons, (vol. I., page 528,) appears to me of great weight. I send it to the Recorder, that our church-members may all read it, and consider whether it is not as appropriate to our times as it was when first preached, forty years ago.

L. N.

"Beware of sinking into a relaxed discipline.—As an army without good order and discipline cannot stand their ground, so neither can a Christian church. Great forbearance should doubtless be exercised in small matters. There would be endless divisions if an uniformity of opinion were required in minor things. In such things we must bear and forbear. But we must be firm and resolute in opposition to much of the liberality and candor of the present age. The church at Ephesus is commended because she 'could not bear them which were evil.' There are not only wicked characters, but evils even in good men, from which the church is to be purged. There is plenty of work to be done by those who are spiritual. Many churches have sunk into ruin by slothfulness, and by worldly policy—retaining opulent sinners from a dread of losing their patronage, or from perverted notions of our Saviour's meaning when he told the Jews that they who were without sin should cast the first stone, or from false tenderness, and sometimes from a wish to be excused in their own turn; thus agreeing together to tempt the Lord. My brethren, stand fast here. Whatever pleas may be urged, have no merely nominal members; but all effective men, whose hearts are with you. If any habitually absent themselves, try and restore them; but if they will not return, dissolve the union. If any man set himself against discipline, he had better be out of the church than in it. If any man forsake the gospel, restore him if you can; but if you cannot, where the bond of union is broken the form is not worth preserving, nor ought it to be preserved. The candor of modern times has in it a large portion of indifference to truth and uprightness, and is in direct contradiction to the counsel given to the seven Asiatic churches."

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, last week, one of the principal topics of discussion was the appointment of an Ambassador to the Court of Rome, which was strenuously opposed as a thing unnecessary and only designed to affect the Catholic vote at the coming election; but the proposition was finally agreed to. The Loan Bill furnish another topic, which was discussed at considerable length, but upon which no action was taken. A bill was passed for the establishment of a retired Navy List; also a bill in favor of purchasing American hemp for the use of the Navy. The amendments made by the House to the bill providing for the deficiency in the appropriations for the present fiscal year, were concurred in by the Senate; so that the bill only waits the signature of the President to become a law.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, there was considerable discussion relative to the proposed appropriations for schools among the Indians; but the general appropriation bill, which brought up this subject, was not finally acted upon. A proposition to bring home and bury with appropriate honors the remains of the officers who have died during the Mexican war, was discussed at considerable length. Several private bills were passed, petitions received, &c., &c.

INDIAN MASSACRES IN YUCATAN.

The following items relative to affairs in Yucatan, are copied from New Orleans papers:—

The Patria states that the Indians have been committing farther and fouler atrocities. The rancho of Sacauquil had been outraged by the robbery and murder of families—31 persons being killed; some were thrown into the flames of burning houses, and neither women nor children were spared. One of the victims was the young Don Mateo Rosada, son of Don Felipa, whose mother was also wounded.

News had been received at Becanchan, Feb. 12, that Indians had collected with the intention of attacking that town. Much alarm was experienced among the inhabitants, at the dreadful anticipation of similar barbarities to what had been inflicted elsewhere.

The Indians had convened in such force, and with such impudence, as to besiege even the City of Valladolid, (one of the largest cities of Yucatan;) but, after some time, asked a suspension of hostilities, with a view of entering into negotiations with the commandant of the place.

Chansenota, one of the towns of Yucatan, after having defended itself bravely, was taken by the Indians, and (14th ult.) was burned to ashes.

In Tecax, the commandant had decided to adopt the guerrilla system, as most likely to harass the enemy and save his people. His men had succeeded in dislodging a body of 500 Indians, who had been fortified at a place called Tixmenac. Two of the latter were killed. Their companions, however, returned to the fight, but were again worsted, with a loss of 12 killed.

Another party under the command of Don Laureano Parez, had a fight with the Indians at Chansaxsucil, killing three; than going on to another rancho, found the corpses of 29 Yucatanese, killed by the insurgents; these Parez buried. Twenty whites were also assassinated at a place called Kamecabchen.

STATE OF IRELAND.

The following items, cut from the "Nation" for February 26, 1847, will give our readers some idea of the present state of Ireland:—

In one week there have been twenty deaths from positive starvation in Mayo. Dozens of calls have been made on the Coroner to hold inquests. The dead are buried without shrouds or coffins.

The Galway Vindicator states that one hundred deaths have taken place in the local poorhouse jail and hospitals during the week. At Roundstone, in Connemara, four, five, and six bodies have lain over ground for days, none being found to give them burial. The body of one old man was devoured by dogs. Four persons have been committed to prison for stealing a filly, which they were found eating.

The Longford correspondent of the Freeman says: "Society is fast being resolved into its original elements in almost every part of the country. Owing to the progress of famine, many are reduced to the necessity of procuring food just as when governments had no existence, and when society had no organization. At Killucan (County Westmeath) petty sessions, on last Saturday, eight persons were brought up in custody of the police, charged with the crime of having stolen a few turnips!"

A few days ago a female child was arrested for having in her possession a small head of cabbage, which it was suspected she had stolen.

The jail of Longford is filled to excess with famine-victims, who have been committed to take their trial for the stealing of cabbages, turnips, &c. Fever and dysentery prevail in the jail to an alarming extent. It at present contains more than three times the number of persons it was originally intended to accommodate.

The Westmeath Independent states the death, from famine, of two brothers, John and James Kinahan, in the parish of Cam, County Roscommon. Their ages were, respectively, 11 and 14 years. They had been turned out of the Athlone work-house in cold weather, without notice being given to their parents or any other friend. The Athlone Sentinel says the cause of their expulsion was, their mother held 4 acres of land. They came home to her to die on the bare floor of her cabin.

An inquest was held, near Dungarvan, on Thomas Terry, of Castle Quarter, and a verdict, 'died of starvation,' returned. The unfortunate man took a turnip from a field, but got so weak that it fell from his hands, and rolled from his reach.

Three men were lately buried in Kilmurry, Ibricken, without coffins; and one man, through want of anything else, was actually buried in a basket.

PENALTIES FOR ABDUCTION AND SEDUCTION.

The following Acts, which have recently been passed by the Legislature of New York, give some indication of the state of public sentiment, and will greatly encourage the friends of moral purity:—

An Act to Punish Abduction as a Crime.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Any person who shall inveigle, entice or take away any unmarried female of previous chaste character, under 25 years of age, from her father's house, or wheresoever else she may be, for the purpose of prostitution at a house of ill-fame, assignation or elsewhere, and every person who shall aid or assist in such abduction for such purpose, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment in a State prison not exceeding two years, or by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding one year. Provided that no conviction shall be had under the provisions of this Act on the testimony of the female so inveigled or enticed away, unsupported by other evidence, nor unless an indictment shall be found within two years after the commission of the offence.

An Act to Punish Seduction as a Crime.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Any man who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in a State prison not exceeding five years, or by imprisonment in a common jail not exceeding one year; provided that no conviction shall be had under the provisions of this act, on the testimony of the female seduced, unsupported by other evidence, nor unless indictment shall be found within two years after the commission of the offence; and provided farther, that the subsequent marriage of the parties may be plead in bar of a conviction.

INSURRECTION AND ITS OVERTHROW.

A telegraphic dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune says that Gen. Lane and troops left the City of Mexico on the 17th ult., and on the fourth day arrived at Sequeltaplan. Before arriving there, however, information reached him that a body of 300 lancers was awaiting their arrival to attack them. They arrived at the edge of the town without opposition, but when passing the first house, were suddenly assailed with a terrible volley. The enemy from escopete batteries on the inside, supposed they could gain an easy victory. The doors of the first house were however burst in a twinkling, and all the assailants found within were killed. The same was the case with the next house. The Americans determined to drive the enemy from their defences. House after house was taken by a sanguinary struggle, until at last the town was cleared. Not satisfied with the result, the Lancers collected a large body outside the town where they were attacked by Gen. Lane and Col. Hays, who cut them up in a terrible manner. One hundred of the enemy were killed, and but one American killed and four wounded. Fifty prisoners were taken, among them Lieut. Col. Montanee and Capt. Montanee, his son, and Lieut. Martiney. Father Jarauta escaped.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.

The New Brunswicker publishes the particulars of the loss of the ship Omega, from Liverpool to New York. It seems that the Omega sailed for this City on the 16th of January, with 315 passengers—that she had been left at the mercy of the waves for a week, on the banks of Newfoundland, having lost her fore-yard, maintopmast, rudder, and all her sails in a storm, when the bark Aurora, bound for St. John, N. B., took on half her passengers. The Aurora arrived at Halifax on the 18th inst. with 73 of the unfortunate passengers, having landed 33 at Canso, while 60 had died on board of cold and hunger. During the last 17 days, the allowance of food was only 2 1-2 ounces of bread and a wine glass of water to each person. In returning from carrying her passengers to the Aurora, the Omega lost her pinnace, second mate and four hands in a gale.

On the 11th of February the Omega fell in with the brig Barbara bound for Cork, which had taken off all but 30 of her crew and passengers, when another gale parted the vessel, and the Omega, her captain, first mate and 29 others are supposed to have gone to the bottom that night. The Barbara pursued her voyage, and on the 2d inst., when near St. Johns, the snow fell so thick as to prevent the sight from penetrating more than a dozen yards. The vessel was encompassed by slob-ice, which, being pressed by the wind toward the land, carried the ship along with it, and when day broke she was close to the rocks. She struck and soon broke up. The masts having fallen against the cliffs, the more active of the passengers and crew jumped from off them and the bowsprit upon the rocks; and those who were fortunate enough to gain a footing, with great difficulty succeded in clambering up the precipitous ascent. The affectionate father or husband, in endeavoring to preserve a child or wife, might have been seen to miss his footing and fall, either mangled upon the rocks or drowned in the sea—together with the beloved object whom he sought to save. The great majority of those on board perished in their berths as the vessel filled and broke up. Capt. Skinner, his mate and steward, with a female passenger and her infant, took to the boat shortly after the vessel struck; and it is believed they were carried off with the ice, for they have not since been heard of. Only forty-three persons were saved.

The works of John Quincy Adams, which will make some fifteen or twenty large octavo volumes, will be soon given to the press by Mr. Chas. Francis Adams, the son and executor of the deceased Statesman, who had carefully revised them for publication, and has by his will appropriated a sum of money to defray the expense of printing, &c. Among the unpublished writings of Mr. Adams is a new version of The Psalms in Metre, a translation of Wieland's Oberon, and several minor poems; but the chief portion of his Mss. consists of historical, biographical and poetical works, relating to the last half century.

SUMMARY.

Dr. Zimmerman, the author and physician of celebrity, known by his works on Solitude and National pride, went from Hanover to attend Frederick the Great in his last illness. One day, the King said to him, "You have, I presume, helped many a man into the other world?" This was rather a bitter pill for the doctor; but the dose he gave the King in return was a judicious mixture of truth and flattery—"Not so many as your majesty, nor with so much honor to myself."

On Saturday, eight workmen on the State works at Black Rock—four Germans and four Irishmen—were blown up in one of the laborer's huts, ignited by a spark from a pipe. The Buffalo Republican says six of them were wounded. Some were terribly mangled, eyes out, nose and part of the face blown off. The shovels, pick-axes and drills and the men were blown up together.

A Cincinnati paper notices the arrival in that city, from Augusta, Ga., of a colored woman and her twelve children, recently set free by "the last will and testament" of a wealthy old man of that place. The woman was his favorite servant, and besides giving her and her children their freedom, has also bequeathed them between $40,000 and $50,000.

A magnificent Lake Steamer, to be called the "Empire State," is to be brought out next season, and to run between Buffalo and Chicago, and is to accomplish the trip in 60 hours. She is to be 310 feet long, with a breadth of beam of 37 feet, and 1650 tons burden.

The boiler of the Iron Foundry of Messrs. Curtis & Randall, of East Boston, exploded March 23d, instantly killing the Engineer and dangerously wounding five or six others, one of whom has since died. It took the roof off the building and blew down the side wall.

The steamboat Raritan, running between New Brunswick, N. J., and New York, took fire on the 20th inst., was run ashore on the flats, and completely destroyed. No lives were lost. The boat was valued at $70,000.

On the 21st inst., the rail-road train from N. York to Philadelphia, ran into the Passaic River near Newark, N. J., in consequence of the draw-bridge being up. One man was killed, and considerable damage done to property.

Fifteen years ago last June, the first authorized settlement of the whites was commenced in Iowa; and now it is a sovereign State, with upwards of 100,000 inhabitants, and two representatives in Congress, and ere long it will have an equal number of votes in our national legislature, with most of the New England States.

Dr. Stearns died on Saturday morning, March 16th. He continued in possession of his mental faculties till two days before. He was 78 years old—had been a Senator of this State, was one of the founders of the American Tract Society, and at the time of his death was the Chairman of the Finance Committee of that Institution.

If we can give credit to the opinion of cometographers, 1848 will have the advantage of witnessing the return of a large and beautiful comet, mentioned by historians and chroniclers of 1564, and which was observed in 1556 by Fabricias.

The steamer Paul Jones, bound to New Orleans, struck a snag on the Grand Chain in the Mississippi, and sunk in deep water. She broke to pieces. The boat and cargo are a total loss.

The child of Mr. McElroy of Napahock, Livingston Co., who was kidnapped last December, has been discovered in Canada, and the thief arrested by Mr. Samuel Andrews of Detroit, who has started with them, for the boy's home. Mr. McElroy returned but a few days ago from an unsuccessful search through the Far West.

The Africans are building a large church in Liberia; the first regular house of Christian worship on that side of the dark continent.

The Rowe street Congregational Society, Boston, having invited Rev. Mr. Love to become their pastor, he has accepted the call on condition that they first pay up what they owe their old shepherd, Mr. Baldwin!

A man was lately fined five dollars and costs, in Goshen, Ohio, for appearing in church with his hat on. He was prosecuted by the pastor of the church.

The "Day Book" says that Mrs. Gaines has already received an offer of $9,000,000 from an association of some of the wealthiest men in the Union, for her title to the estate, but has not accepted it.

According to the Episcopal Recorder, the present Governor of Pennsylvania is the first who has appointed a day of annual thanksgiving in that State, and the present House of Representatives the first that has ever adopted the regulation of having their daily sessions opened with prayer.

David and William Beaty and Patrick Foye have been held for trial in Newport, R. I., for throwing indecent writings into the house of Isaac R. Tanner, addressed to his daughter.

A colored man is exciting a sensation in St. Louis, by the astonishing rapidity with which he performs arithmetical calculations. He works out a sum almost instantly, and on all other topics is exceedingly dull and ignorant.

Lamb wisely and wittily observes, "that he who hath not a dram of folly in his mixture, hath pounds of much worse matter in his composition.

A thousand marines under Commodore Perry, are ordered to survey the Isthmus of Tehuatepec. We shall then ascertain the feasibility of the canal to unite the two oceans.

The Hudson River is fairly open again, and navigation is resumed. The steamboat Admiral was the first to reach Albany, which she did on the afternoon of March 22.

The British bark Highland Mary, Capt. Gellis, arrived at New York, March 21, with the captain, five of her crew, and fifty-six of her passengers, ill with the ship fever.

The village of Oswego, N. Y., has recently been transformed into a city. It is only a few weeks since Auburn experienced the same transformation.

We find, in a letter from an officer of the U. S. steamer Spitfire, a statement of a horrible affair which took place at Talascova, Mexico, a few days previous to the 20th of February. Five Americans captured near Vera Cruz, were taken to Talascoya, tied to stakes in full view of each other, and then the tongue, eyes, nose, ears, and hands of one were deliberately cut off! After the first one died, another was treated in the same way and so on.

Ben Johnson was a candidate for the office of Supreme Court Judge last Spring, but has been since called to plead before a higher tribunal. He died at his house in Ithaca on the 9th inst., at the age of 64, having been stricken with paralysis when in apparently good health. Mr. J. was distinguished for his legal acquirements, kindness of heart and active enterprise, and a sincere and devout believer in the great truths of Christianity.

Hon. T. W. Williams, of New London, Conn., lately made a donation to Beloit College, which has given it a new impulse in its career of usefulness. It is principally under the control of the Congregationalists of that region, and it is located in Beloit, Wisconsin, on Rock River, adjacent to one of the most glorious prairies in all the glorious West.

The Emperor of Russia has presented several enormous and magnificent blocks of black and veined marble, for the completion of Napoleon's cenotaph, which is advancing but slowly, though fourteen or fifteen artists are always at work in sculpturing the statutes, medallions, and basso-relievos which are to ornament it.

☞ LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.—At ten o'clock on Monday night the steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston, with two weeks later foreign news. The Republic has been confirmed in France, the House of Peers overthrown, titles of nobility abolished, and universal suffrage and vote by ballot proclaimed. The Republic has been recognized by Great Britain, Belgium, Switzerland, and the United States. The Royal Family and Ministers have all fled; the King and Queen, with most of the family, being in England. The Revolution in France is producing important effects in Prussia, Austria, Bavaria, Italy, &c. Indian Corn is in demand, and the tendency of Breadstuffs generally is upward.

NOTICE—BILLS.—Several weeks ago we gave notice of our desire to settle up all old accounts for the Recorder, so as to begin the fifth volume, in June next, with clean books. To encourage promptness, and to secure as complete a settlement as possible, we proposed to receive $2 per year on old accounts, if paid previous to the close of the present vol.; while all accounts remaining unsettled at the time, we gave notice, would be kept separate from future accounts, and charged at the rate of $2 50 per year, according to our published terms. Within a few weeks past we have sent bills to nearly all of our subscribers who owe us more than $1, reckoning to the close of the present volume. This will enable each one to understand exactly how his account stands, and to avail himself of our offer to receive the advance price, even on old accounts. If our bills are incorrect in any respect, we will cheerfully correct them on a representation of the case. If they are correct, we hope the money will be immediately forwarded, either through our agents or directly to us. You may send money by mail at our risk, provided you inform the postmaster what the letter contains, and retain a description of the bills.

CHRISTIAN PSALMODY.

The price in strong leather binding is 75 cents per copy; in imitation morocco, plain, 87½ cents; ditto, gilt edges, $1 00; ditto, full gilt, $1 12½; in morocco, full gilt, $1 37½. Those wishing books will please forward their orders, with particular directions how to send, to GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

GOD BLESS THE MARINER.

God's blessing on the mariner!
A venturous life leads he;
What reck the landsmen of their toil
Who dwell upon the sea?

The landsman sits within his home,
His fireside bright and warm,
Nor asks, "How fares the mariner,
All night amid the storm?"

God bless the hardy mariner!
A homely garb wears he;
And he goeth with a rolling gait,
Like a ship upon the sea.

He hath piped the loud "Ay, ay, sir!"
O'er the voices of the main,
Till his deep tones have the hoarseness
Of the rising hurricane.

His seamed and honest visage
The sun and wind have tanned,
And hard as iron gauntlet
Is his broad and sinewy hand.

But, O, a spirit looketh
From out his clear, blue eye,
With a truthful, childlike earnestness,
Like an angel from the sky.

A venturous life the sailor leads
Between the sky and sea;
And when the hour of dread is past,
A merrier who than he?

He knows that by the rudder-bands
Stands One well skilled to save;
For a strong hand is the Steersman's,
That directs him o'er the wave.

THE AUTHOR OF THE HISTORY OF PERU.

Mr. Prescott had lost one eye by accident in his early youth, and had, by study, so strained the nerve of the other, that he was all but completely blind. He at first despaired, but he determined to try whether he could make the ears do the work of the eyes. He taught his reader, unacquainted with any language but his own, to pronounce the Spanish, though not exactly in the accent of the court of Madrid. He read at a slow and stumbling pace, while the historian listened with painful attention. Practice at length made the work easier for both, though the reader never understood a word of his author. In this way they ploughed along patiently through seven Spanish quartos. He found at last that he could go over about two-thirds as much in an hour as he could when read to in English. The experiment was made, and he became convinced of the practicability of substituting the ear for the eye. He was overjoyed, for his library was no longer to consist of sealed volumes. He now obtained the services of a secretary acquainted with the different ancient and modern languages. Still there were many impediments to overcome. His eye, however, gradually improved, and he could use it by daylight (never again in the evening) a few hours; though it was not till after some years, and then with repeated intervals of weeks and sometimes months of debility. Many a chapter, and some of the severest in Ferdinand and Isabella, were written almost wholly with the aid of the eyes of his secretary. His modus operandi was necessarily peculiar. He selected first, all the authorities in the different languages that could bear on the topic to be discussed. He then listened to the reading of these, one after the other, dictating very copious notes on each. When the survey was completed, a large pile of notes was amassed, which was read to him over and over again, until the whole was embraced by his mind, when they were fused down into the consecutive contents of a chapter. When the subject was complex, and not pure narrative, requiring a great variety of reference, and sifting of contradictory authorities, the work must have been very difficult; but it strengthened memory, kept his faculties wide awake, and taught him to generalize; for the little details slipped through the holes in the memory. His labor did not end with this process; he found it was as difficult to write as to read, and procured in London a large writing case for the blind. This he could use in the dark as well as in the light. The characters, indeed, might pass for hieroglyphics; but they were deciphered by his secretary, and transferred by him to a legible form in a fair copy. Yet I have heard him say his hair sometimes stood on end at the woful blunders and misconceptions of the original, which, every now and then, escaping detection, found their way into the first proof of the printer. Amid such difficulties was the composition of the history of Ferdinand and Isabella heroically completed at the end of something less than ten years from its commencement. He remembered that Johnson says that Milton gave up his history of England, because it was scarcely possible to write history with the eyes of others; and was stimulated in the midst of his embarrassments to overcome them. Well might he feel a proud satisfaction in conquering the obstacles of nature. Mr. Prescott had four copies of the history first printed for himself, and had so little confidence in its immediate success, that he had thought of postponing the publication till after his death; but his father told him, "the man who writes a book he is afraid to publish, is a coward."

This decided him. The work was published in the beginning of 1838. Its reception in his own country, and in all parts of Europe, was such as to repay him, if anything could, for the long nights of toil by which it had been produced. [Bentley's Miscellany.

ADVENTURE OF WHALEMEN.

Advices from Singapore announce the total loss of the American whaler Lawrence, which left Poughkeepsie on the 10th of July, 1845, bound on a whaling voyage. From the statement published by How, the mate, we learn that on the night of the 27th of May, 1846, while in the vicinity of the Japan Islands, the vessel struck on a rock, and the entire crew put off in three boats, only one of which, however, reached the land in safety.

During the seven days they were on the ocean, they had hardly any covering to protect them from the snow, which was falling heavily, and but a little bread and water, which had been completely consumed previous to the 3d of June, the day on which they landed. On landing they discovered a bamboo cottage, but there being no persons within, one of the party was left while the others returned to the boat. During their absence, two men had entered the cottage, but refused to sit down. They inquired, by signs, how many there were in the party, and on being told appeared frightened and ran away.

The next morning those in the boat landed at a spot on the mouth of the river, where a representation of a fort had been placed. Here about sixty men, armed with spears, motioned them away. This had not the desired effect, as How and his companions advanced, threw themselves on their knees, and supplicated food, which was brought to them immediately. They were again motioned off, but on pointing out the frail nature of their boat for a long voyage, were ordered to get into it again, after being searched and deprived of everything they had about them.

The natives then got also into a boat and towed the other up the river to a lake, on one side of which stood a house, covered all round with mats, which they entered. At night they were removed on foot to a brick building at some distance, which appeared to be the prison of the town. They were there locked up in a cell all night, with a watch over them, and in the morning were led blindfolded to the Governor's house, where they were interrogated as to their religion and country, and subsequently removed back to prison. Daily similar interrogatories were put to them. In this prison they continued for 11 months, having a daily allowance of rice, fish and water.

At last, all the company having fallen sick, the guards removed them to Jeddo, where the Emperor lived, and at which place they were put on board a junk, and stowed in the hold. One day they were made to wash themselves, clean clothes were given them, and they were conducted into the cabin, which was beautifully fitted up with silk and gold ornaments. They were then given to understand that they had arrived at Matsamai, where the Emperor's son lived, and that he was coming on board to see them. Soon after the Prince appeared, and they were again examined before him in the Dutch language. This lasted for an hour. The Prince left them, and shortly after sent a box of sweetmeats.

The next day they continued their voyage, and arrived at another city, where they were put into a box, the lid fastened down, and carried to the Town Hall, where they underwent another questioning. The chief object throughout of the Japanese was evidently to find out whether they were Englishmen; and the mate is of opinion that, had they confessed themselves Englishmen, they would have been killed. One day they were summoned to the Town Hall, where a man in European dress sat among the Judges. He spoke first to the prisoners in Dutch, and then in French.

At last he said in English: "If there are any John Bulls amongst you, you had better not say anything about it." He asked their religion, and the circumstances which brought them there, interpreting as he went along into Japanese, and also informed them that they would soon recover their liberty. Notwithstanding this, one of the seven endeavored to make his escape, but was caught and inhumanly murdered. At last, after seventeen months' confinement, they were liberated, and sent to the Dutch factory, in the director of which they recognized the European who had spoken to them so kindly at the town-hall. Ten days after they were put on board the Dutch ship Hertogeubosch, in which vessel they arrived at Singapore soon after.

HOW TO GET A LIVING.

Be Industrious.—Every body knows that industry is a fundamental virtue in the man of business. But it is not every sort of industry which tends to wealth. Many men work hard to do a great deal of business, and, after all, make less money than they would if they did less. Industry should be expended in seeing to all the details of business; in carefully finishing up each separate undertaking, and in the maintenance of such a system as will keep everything under control.

Be Economical.—This rule is also familiar to every body. Economy is a virtue to be practiced every hour in a great city. It is to be practiced in pence as well as in pounds. A shilling a day saved, amounts to an estate in the course of a life. Economy is especially important in the outset of life, until the foundation of an estate is laid. Many men are poor all their days, because when their necessary expenses are light, they did not seize the opportunity to save a small capital, which would have changed their fortunes for the whole of their lives.

Stick to your own Business.—Let speculators make their thousands in a year or a day; mind your own regular trade, never turning from it to the right hand or to the left. If you are a merchant, a professional man, or a mechanic, never buy lots or stocks, unless you have surplus money which you wish to invest. Your own business you understand as well as other men; but other people's business you do not understand. Let your own business be one which is useful to the community. All occupations possess the elements of profit in themselves, while mere speculation has no such elements.

Never trade at great hazard.—Such hazards are seldom well-balanced by the prospects of profit; and if they were, the habits of mind which are introduced, are unfavorable, and generally the result is bad. To keep what you have, should be the first rule; to get what you can fairly, the second.

Don't be in a hurry to get rich.—Gradual gains are the only natural gains, and they who are in haste to get rich, break through sound rules, fall into temptations, and distress of various sorts, and generally fail of their object. There is no use in getting rich suddenly. The man who keeps his business under his control, and saves something from year to year, is always rich. At any rate, he possesses the highest enjoyment which riches are able to afford.

Never do business for the sake of doing it, and being counted a great merchant.—There is often more money to be made by a small business than a large one; and that business will be in the end most respectable, which is most successful. Do not get deeply in debt; but so manage, as always, if possible, to have your financial position easy, so that you can turn any way you please.

Do not love money extravagantly.—We speak here, merely with reference to being rich. In morals, the inordinate love of money is one of the most degrading vices. But the extravagant desire of accumulation, induces an eagerness, many times, which is imprudent, and so misses its object from too much haste to grasp it.

EXTRAORDINARY TENACITY OF LIFE.

An adventurer on the northwest coast of North America, relates one of his perils as follows:—

"I was hunting one day, at the foot of Mount St. Bernardine, situated in the parallel of thirty-four degress north latitude, in company with the hunter I have already spoken of. We were quietly seated, discussing a piece of roasted venison, when the ugly visage of a grisly bear peeped out from some rocks about twenty yards on one side of us. We instantly jumped up and moved some distance off. The huge beast gradually drew himself out of his concealment, and trotted briskly down to our fire, where a few minutes before we were roasting venison. Not finding much there for him, he commenced galloping after us. The hunter said, 'I reckon this is an ugly customer; I'll take the first fire.' The shot was a true one: the ball hit the brute somewhere about the head, for the blood was dripping down his face, and he gave a roar that echoed through the woods. 'What are you gaping at?' said the hunter to me, as I was watching the bear, expecting to see him roll over every second. 'A steady hand now!' I dropped on one knee to make sure my aim. 'That's into his carcass; give him the other barrel,' said the hunter. I did so, and with effect, yet he pursued us. 'This is a devil in earnest,' said my companion. 'Three balls in him now, and on he comes as fresh as ever. Run on, you, and load. I'm ready for him now.' I did so, and was quickly ready. As soon as my friend discharged his rifle into our pursuing antagonist, he ran past me further on to load again, whilst I stood and fired both barrels at the bear. We continued on in this manner at a short distance from our dangerous enemy, like riflemen retreating. One stopped to fire while the other retreated to re-load, until nearly a mile of ground was passed over, when this huge grisly bear dropped on his haunches, and gave a thrilling roar, after receiving fifteen balls from our two guns.

Miraculous Escape.—An event which may almost be considered miraculous, took place recently at the Cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris. A workman, named Faure, employed in the repairs, which are now being carried on, was raising a piece of wood on the scaffold at the top of the north tower, 180 feet, when he lost his footing, and being at the edge of the scaffold, fell. His companions shrieked with dismay, doubting not that in falling from such a great height he would be smashed to pieces. But in his downward course, Faure, who did not lose his presence of mind, contrived to grasp hold of a rope. He clung to it with all the tenacity of despair; but, presently, one end of the rope gave way, and the workman slipped along with it to near the end. Perceiving that he was then at a distance of twenty feet from the ground, he grasped the cord with all his might, and actually hung suspended for several minutes. At length, feeling his strength giving way, he plucked up all his resolution, and giving a spring, abandoned the cord. To the intense astonishment of the terrified beholders, he fell on his feet, and did not receive the slighest contusion; nor was he otherwise affected than by a momentary weakness caused by the emotion he had undergone.

Independent Crows and Voracious Ants.—In Hoffmeister's Letters from the East, we read that Hoffmeister was very successful in collecting butterflies, and a great number of birds were shot by himself and his companions: "I carefully unpacked them, and had hardly laid them for a moment in the sun to dry, when a servant came in with the news, "Master! crows come, take yellow birds!" I looked round, and sure enough, hrlf the birds were gone. I hastily caught up the remainder, and brought them indoors; but in half an hour I perceived that millions of microscopic ants had picked the skin clean from the feathers, notwithstanding the arsenic I had applied to it. A peep into my insect box completely floored me: the whole collection was turned into dust and dirt. The crows sat very quietly on the open door, as if in mockery of my vexation; and the ants marched in a long black file to my glass of sugar and water, which they filled with their carcasses."

Plain Diet.—This is what children ought, on every account, to be accustomed to from the first. It is vastly more for their present health and comfort than little nice things with which fond parents are so apt to vitiate their appetites, and it will save them a great deal of mortification in after life. If you make it a point to give them the best of everything; to pamper with rich cakes, sweetmeats, and sugar plums; if you allow them to say with a scold, "I don't like this," or "can't eat that," and then go away and make them a little toast, or kill a chicken for their dainty palates, depend upon it, you are doing them a great injury, not only on the score of denying them a full muscle and rosy cheek, but of forming one of the most inconvenient habits that they can carry along with them in after life. When they come to leave you, they will not, half the time, find anything they can eat; and thus you will prepare them to go chafing and grumbling through life, the veriest slaves almost in the world. [Dr. Humphries.

Value of Old Rope.—Among the numerous worn-out, and often considered worthless materials, which the ingenuity of man has discovered the means of re-manufacturing, and rendering of equal value of its original substances, are old tarred ropes which have long been in use in coalpits. Our readers will be surprised when we inform them, that out of this dirty and apparently unbleachable substance, is produced a tissue paper of the most beautiful fabric, evenness of surface, and delicacy of color, a ream of which, with wrapper and string, weighs 2 1-2 lbs. It is principally used in the potteries for transferring the various patterns to the earthenware, and is found superior to any other substance yet known for that purpose; it is so tenacious that a sheet of it, if twisted by hand in the form of a rope, will support upwards of one cwt. Truly we live in an age of invention.

Christian Teaching.—The teacher of the young should strive to be at home with Jesus, to know him familiarly, to form a clear, vivid, bright idea of him, to see him just as he appeared on earth, to see him in the very dress in which he manifested himself to the men of his age. He should follow him to the temple, to the mountain top, to the shores of the sea of Galilee, and should understand the mixed feelings of the crowd around him, should see the scowl of the Pharisee who listened to catch his words for some matter of accusation, the imploring look of the diseased seeking healing from his words, the gaze of wonder among the ignorant, and the delighted, affectionate, reverential eagerness with which the single-hearted and humble hung on his lips. Just in proportion as we can place ourselves near to Christ, his wisdom, love, greatness, will break forth, and we shall be able to bring him near to the mind of the child. [Dr. Channing.

How to Hear the Gospel.—The celebrated Rowland Hill was once reminded by an old man, that he heard him preach sixty-five years before, and well remembered the sermon. "You told us," said the old man, "that some people were very squeamish about the delivery of different ministers who preached the same gospel." You said, "Suppose you were attending to hear a will read, where you expected a legacy to be left you, would you employ the time when it is reading, in criticising the manner in which the lawyer read it? No, you would not; you would be giving all ear to hear if anything was left to you, and how much it was. That is the way I would advise you to hear the gospel."

The Little Seraph.—When Bishop Berkeley lived at Newport, R. I., he lost a son in early life. The child was characterized by deep seriousness of mind. He once asked his father this question—"What is the meaning of the word cherubim and seraphim, which occur in the Holy Scriptures?" His father replied—"Churubim is a Hebrew word, signifying knowledge; seraphim is also Hebrew and signifies flame,—from whence it is inferred that the cherubim are an order of celestial beings excelling in knowledge, the seraphim excelling in affection." The boy replied, "I hope that when I die, I shall be a Seraph, for I had rather love God, than know all things!"

VARIETY.

A PUZZLE.

From flesh and blood I first was formed, as other creatures be;
But neither flesh nor blood nor any such things are in me.
I was taken from my native side, where I was born and bred,
Not for one cause, but many more, that men cut off my head.
This being done, I drank, whereby such force I had,
I put strife betwixt both kings and queens, and made true lovers glad.
All this I've done, and ten times more, and more I will do still;
Yet nothing of myself, but all against my will.

In 1815 Captain Smith ascertained that the height of Mount Ætna is 10,874 feet. The Cutains, disappointed that their mountain had lost nearly 200 feet, would not believe it. In 1824 Sir Jno. Herschell, who was not aware of what Capt. Smith had done, determined the height by a careful barometrical measurement, and found it 10,872 1-2, a difference of 1 1-2 feet. Herschell called this a happy accident, but Dr. Wollaston justly remarked, "that it was an accident which would not have happened to two fools."

Dr. T. Arnold says: "We have got Coleridge's Literary Remains, in which I do rejoice greatly. It is refreshing to see such a union of the highest philosophy and poetry with so full a knowledge on so many points at least of particular facts. But there are marks enough that his mind was a little diseased by the want of a profession, and the consequent unsteadiness of his mind and purposes; it always seemed to me that the very power of contemplation becomes perverted, when it is made the main employment of life.

Two persons traveling on the road to Caudebec in a carriole, were smoking cigars, from the fire of which some straw at the bottom of the wagon became ignited. The flames soon drove them from their seats, and while they were busy in extinguishing the fire, a countryman, who had been for some time following them on horseback, alighted to assist them. "I have been watching the smoke for some time," said he. "Why then did you not give us notice?" asked the travelers. "Well," responded the peasant, "there are so many new-fangled inventions now-a-days, I thought you were going by steam!"

A minister, praying over a child apparently dying, said: "If it be Thy will, spare." The poor mother's soul yearning for her beloved, exclaimed: "It must be His will—I cannot bear ifs." The minister stopped. The child recovered; and the mother, after almost suffering martyrdom from him while a stripling, lived to see him hanged before he was two and twenty. Oh! it is good to say, "Not my will but thine!"

When that most splendid of earthly monarchs, Louis XIV., lay in death, and all the might and glory of his kingdom were gathered in the great church of Notre Dame to pay him the last honors of earth, the preacher rose, and after a solemn pause, as if unable to utter anything befitting so august an occasion, he simply said,—"There's nothing great but God.'"

"I have known," says Cicero, "many sin by speaking, few by keeping silence; it is therefore more difficult to know how to be silent than to speak." And there is a Spanish proverb to the same effect: "Any fool may babble, but it takes a wise man to hold his tongue."

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

A FRIENDLY EPISTLE RELATIVE TO THE SABBATH.

[Concluded.]

Again, we are told that the New Testament is our only guide in duty under the gospel dispensation; that the Old Testament is a dead letter except as a history of the past; that the New is distinct and independent of the Old. Wherein does this difference consist? What moral principle does the New enforce, that was not enforced by the Old? I can find none. It enforces the same moral obligations, based on the same reasons, applicable under the same circumstances; hence must be essentially the same. The ordinances of the church of course are different, because the circumstances are different, changed by the flight of time and the fulfillment of prophecy. The ordinances under the old dispensation must necessarily be prospective, pointing forward to the great Deliverer who was yet to come. But that could not be applicable after the Antitype had appeared, and the things which they foretold were accomplished. Since that, circumstances requires retrospective ordinances, to commemorate the redemption and its Author. All things wherein the New Testament differs from the Old can be only in consequence of a change in man's special relations peculiar to the age and circumstances. The general principles enforced in both are identical. Both, united, make one perfect whole. Either, taken separately, is wanting and incomplete. Both recognize the decalogue as a code of morals; both contain prophecies, some of which have been fulfilled, some are now being fulfilled, and others remain yet to be fulfilled.

The metaphysical distinction which many are disposed to make between moral and positive laws, I regard as a scholastic speculation, wholly destitute of scriptural authority, and very injurious in its tendency. Many seem to have the idea that if they can class a precept with the positive code, it is a matter of but little importance whether it is heeded or not. The Holy Ghost has nowhere made such a distinction, to my knowledge, and for me to do so is becoming wise above what is written. A violation of any command of God, however small, or of whatever nature it is, is a breace of moral obligation, and a violation of the principle of love to God and man, as much as the first, third, or any other precept of the decalogue. If it be a violation of moral principle, it must be enforced by a moral precept, and possess a moral quality in itself; and what more can be said of any precept? The command given to Adam, not to partake of the forbidden fruit, was positive, if there ever was such an one; yet its violation was a sufficient breach of moral principle to ruin the human race. If such a distinction were necessary to give us a correct understanding of duty, I have full confidence in the wisdom and goodness of God, to believe he would not have neglected to point it out.

Here, allow me to state the following premise: That the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, form a perfect rule of faith and practice, furnishing all needed instruction in regard to every duty, and marking out "the way of holiness so plain that a wayfaring man though a fool need not err therein." Supposing such a position to be readily acceeded to by every Christian, I will proceed without proving it. Where is there any authority between the lids of the Bible for observing the first day of the week as the Sabbath or as a Sabbath? If there is none, then that day is either employed contrary to the will of the Law-Giver, or the Holy Ghost has neglected to give us the necessary information concerning it. In the institution of the Sabbath it is commanded, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh thou shalt rest." Since the week contains but seven days, and the seventh is the Sabbath, the first must be included in the six on which God has commanded us to labor. Is it not a violation of his word, then, to set it apart as a day of rest, a Sabbath, since he has commanded us to devote it to labor? Therefore, each week when the first day is set apart for rest, and the seventh devoted to labor, both parts of the fourth command are violated. If it were the will of God that this should be so, we are forced to the conclusion, either that the Holy Ghost would have pointed it out, so that there could be no liability of mistaking it, or else that the Scriptures are defective and imperfect—that they do not teach what is necessary for us to know and practice. For one, I prefer to take God's word as he has left it, rather than assume so bold a charge.

But, it is contended, that the example of Christ and his apostles is sufficient revelation to authorize Sunday-keeping. When has God ever required us to take example as a guide in duty, whether it be inspired or not, unless it is associated with, or enforced by corresponding precept? Dr. Wayland, in his Moral Science, takes the position that no example, even though it be inspired, is binding as a rule in duty, unless it corresponds with some divine precept. All parents are not under obligation to slay their sons in consequence of Abraham's inspired example. But is it at all evident that Christ or his apostles practiced the weekly observance of the first day as a day of rest? When and where did Christ ever do it? When and where did his apostles ever do it? I search my Bible in vain to find it. Now if we are under obligation to do so, either because it was commanded by Christ or his apostles, then we are forced to the conclusion again, that the Bible is wofully defective as a rule of duty, for it neither enforces such a command, nor gives any account of their observing it. You may excuse the matter by saying, you do not keep it as a Sabbath, but as a day of worship. Still you are in the habit of ceasing from labor on that day, are you not? Then you do to all intents and purposes observe it as a Sabbath, or a day of rest, which is only another word to express the same thing. We have one account of the apostles' assembling on the first of the week for religious worship, Acts 20th, and the only one that can be proved in the New Testament. But there is no command for any body to follow that example. Again, if their example is of any binding force at all, then it is binding just so far as it goes, and no farther. We are bound to commence where their example commences, go as far as that goes, and stop where that stops. In the first place, because, if any part of their example is binding, every part and the whole is, since there is no authority for limiting it. And in the second place, obligation must cease where their example does, since there is no command to enforce any more. Now let us notice their example. Whether they held any meeting in the day time or not is uncertain. But it is certain, that they had the house lighted and held their meeting all night. Now if this example is binding, the obligation, and all the obligation it imposes, is, to come together on the first day of the week, and hold our meetings till break of day the next morning. Hence, first-day people are as guilty of violating that obligation as seventh-day people are. But apostolic example does not stop here. In the Evangelists and Acts of the Apostles, we have more than a hundred examples of their observing the Sabbath. How much soever people may be disposed to depreciate the importance of the examples last referred to, and magnify the importance of the former, it cannot be denied that the latter is corroborated by the uniform example of our Saviour, all the ancient prophets and holy men, and above all by the Law-Giver himself, and enforced by a plain positive command of Jehovah, all in opposition to that one example of a night meeting, without any other precept or example to strengthen it. That the apostles did uniformly observe the Sabbath after Christ's death, to my mind is too evident to admit of a doubt. In the first place, we have not the slightest intimation, either in Scripture or history, of their secularizing that day. And in the second place, in all their meetings, whenever they make mention of that day, they give it the title of Sabbath without any explanatory remarks. And if they spoke by inspiration, we have here the words of the Holy Ghost declaring it to be the Sabbath still. If the apostles called the seventh day the Sabbath, what alternative have we then, but that they either believed it still to be binding as the Sabbath, or that they intended to deceive? For, if it were changed or abolished it was no longer the Sabbath, and they must have known it. Hence they could not have used such expressions inadvertently. Thirdly, if the apostles were guilty at any time of secularizing the seventh day, the Jews certainly could have found some charge to present against them while arraigned before their councils and sanhedrims. They would not have been driven to the necessity of bribing men to prove false charges against them. But we have no account of their ever receiving such a censure after the death of their Lord. Can it be supposed that the Christian Jews (of which the church was principally composed for many years) would all, to a man, yield up the Sabbath without one word of objection, when they were disposed to make such an ado about circumscision and other trivial points in the ceremonial law? Had the apostles even proposed such a thing, it would without doubt have produced a general uproar among the jealous and envious Jews. But it may be said, 'they kept silent and observed the Sabbath from policy, that they might win the Jews to Christianity.' Whatever may have been their motive, those who contend that apostolic example is equivalent to a divine precept, are bound in all conscience to follow their example, and live out their principles. The same reason is as good now as it ever was. First-day sabbatizing is, and doubtless always will be, a formidable barrier to the conversion of the Jews, so long as it is generally practiced. No prophecy, say they, ever gave the Messiah a grant to change or abolish the fourth command or any other precept of the Decalogue. His character was to be known only by the exactness with which he fulfilled the prophecies concerning him. And if Christ transcended those limits, he destroyed his claim to the Messiahship as much as though he had fallen short of fulfilling them. Are not these reasons of some weight? Our Saviour declared, in his last prayer, "I have finished the work thou gavest me to do." But if he changed or abolished the Sabbath he must have done it so privately that his disciples knew nothing of it, for we read that they kept it after his burial according to the commandment. Again, it seems like heaping scandal upon the apostles, to charge them with such a time-serving spirit as to conceal the truth and practice what they did not believe, from mere policy.

But will Christians leave the Scriptures and resort to history to maintain their views of theology? This would be heaping more reproach upon inspiration. It is either a perfect rule, or it is not. If it is, why resort to history to prove duties which the Scriptures do not reveal? What they do not teach should not be adhered to. If it is not a perfect rule, we have no sure guide upon which to rely. But even history bears so strong a resemblance to Scripture, that many who search with a determination of proving a first-day Sabbath, have been forced to acknowledge that the seventh day was universally observed by Christians for more than three hundred years after Christ. Melancthon, in his controversy with Catholicism, took the position that every Protestant must take, viz., that history must be interpreted according to Scripture, and not Scripture according to history. History is of no avail, in point of Christian duty, only as it corroborates revelation.

Again, the position is assumed, that it makes no difference which day is observed, provided one in seven is kept properly. In reply, I remark, 1st, That nothing is good, unless it agrees with Scripture. 2d, Nothing is good that has a bad effect when carried out, because evil is never the result of good. Now let this theory be carried out; each one resting the seventh day after six days' labor, commencing when he pleases; some on Monday, some Tuesday, and so on through the whole week. Would the effect be as good as though one specified day were observed by all, according to the command? If not, the theory must either be wrong, or not founded in wisdom, which would make its character essentially the same. I ask you, as you would a Pedo-Baptist, Is the Bible a system of non-essentialism? The Pedo-Baptists have as good reason for saying the mode of baptism is non-essential, as you have for saying the day of the Sabbath is. For both are as clearly pointed out as language can define them. We are informed that "the word and the spirit agree;" for God is the Author of both and cannot contradict himself. Therefore, if the word is non-essential, the spirit is, and the Bible a mere fable. In fact, there is no end to the absurdities when we step aside from this divine rule. Let us examine a few passages, and see if God considers his word non-essential. "He who turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer is an abomination." Prov. 28: 9. 'Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven." Matt. 5: 19. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" "If ye love me, keep my commandments." "Whosoever loveth me will keep my word." "Whosoever saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commands, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." "For if we sin willfully after having received a knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignations that shall devour the adversaries." Heb. 9: 26, 27. From the first-quoted passage, we learn that a prayer uttered when there is an unwillingness on the part of the petitioner to know or do his duty is an abomination to God. In the last-quoted passage, there is the most fearful denunciation against such as know the word of revelation, and from fear of persecution, love of popularity, worldly convenience, or from any other motive, disregard and violate its laws. No intelligent Christian of the nineteenth century can with propriety make the plea that he does not know his duty, when all is so plainly specified, without the least grant from the Law-Giver for neglecting, without either falling under the censure of the first-quoted passage or coming to the conclusion that the Bible is not to be relied upon as a rule of faith and practice. Again, Rev. 22: 18, 19, "For I testify to every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add to these things, God shall add to him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the prophecy of this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things written in this book." Now, whoever professes to hold to the truths of revelation, and in his example and teachings sets aside any institution and substitutes something else in its stead, or robs one of the title that God has given it, and applies it to one which he has not ordained, does he not in his example and influence both add to and take from the word of God? All human improvements upon the word of inspiration are darkening council by words without knowledge.

Yours affectionately, N. WARDNER.

PURITAN RELIC.

The Springfield Gazette publishes a literal copy of a letter written one hundred and thirty-four years ago, by Rev. Lawrence Conant, giving an account of the ordination of the first minister ever settled over the Old South Parish in Danvers. The letter is a curious relic of the olden time, as the reader will not doubt when he has perused the following extract:—

"Ye Governor was in ye house, and her Majesty's commissioners of ye customs, and they set together on a high seat by ye pulpit stairs. Ye Governor appears very devout and attentive, although he favors Episcopacy and tolerates ye Quakers and Baptists, but is a strong opposer of ye Papists. He was dressed in a black Velvet Coat, bordered with gold lace, and buff breeches with gold buckles at ye knees, and white silk stockings. There was a disturbance in ye galleries, where it was filled with divers negroes, mulattoes and Indians, and a negro call'd Pomp Shorter, belonging to Mr. Gardner, was called forth and put in ye broad aisle, where he was reproved with great carefulness and solemnity. He was then put in ye Deacon's seat, between two Deacons, in view of ye whole congregation; but ye Sexton was ordered by Mr. Prescott to take him out, because of his levity and strange contortion of countenance, (giving grave scandal to ye grave Deacons) and put him in ye lobby under ye stairs; some children and a mulatto Woman were reprimanded for laughing at Pomp Shorter. When ye services at ye house were ended, ye council and other dignitaries were entertained at ye house of Mr. Epes, on ye hill near by, and we had a bountiful table, with bear's meat and Venison, the last of which was a fine buck shot in ye woods near by. Ye Bear was kill'd in Lynn Woods, near Reading. After ye blessing was craved by Mr. Garrish of Wenthram, word came that ye buck was shot on ye Lord's day, by Pequot, an Indian, who came to Mr. Epes with a lye in his mouth, like Ananias of old; ye council thereupon refused to eat ye Vension, but it was afterwards agreed that Pequot should receive 40 stripes save one, for lying and profaning ye Lord's day, restore Mr. Epes the cost of ye deer; and, considering this a just and righteous sentence on ye sinful heathen, and that a blessing had been craved on ye meat, ye council all partook of it, but Mr. Shepard, whose conscience was tender on ye point of Venison."

DEATH OF AN INFANT.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

He is dead and gone—a flower
Born and withered in an hour.
Coldly lies the death-frost now
On his little rounded brow;
And the seal of darkness lies
Ever on his shrouded eyes.
He will never feel again
Touch of human joy or pain;
Never will his once bright eyes
Open with a glad surprise;
Nor the death-frost leave his brow—
All is over with him now.

Vacant now his cradle-bed,
As a nest from whence hath fled
Some dear little birds, whose wings
Rest from timid flutterings.
Thrown aside the childish rattle;
Hushed for aye the infant prattle—
Little broken words that could
By none else be understood,
Save the childless one who weeps
O'er the grave where now he sleeps.
Closed his eyes, and cold his brow—
All is over with him now. [Home Jour.

EARLY RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATIONS.

I wish particularly to record the effect of old associations with earlier Bible narratives. I feel quite sure that the use of the Sacred Dialogues as a school book, and the pictures of scripture scenes which interested my boyhood, still cleave to me and impart a peculiar tinge and charm to the same representations when brought within my notice. Perhaps when I am moldering in my coffin, the eye of my grandson may light upon this page; and it is possible that his recollection may accord with my present anticipations of the effect that his delight in the pictorial Bible may have in endearing still more to him the holy word of God. May it tell with saving effect on his conscience in whatever way it may effect his imagination; and let him so profit by its sacred lessons of faith and piety, that after a life of Christian usefulness on earth we may meet in heaven, and rejoice forever in the presence of our common Father.

It is related of Lord Loughborough, a Scotch nobleman in the time of George III, that to eradicate his accent he studied under a master. He conquered his defect; but in his old age, his Scotticisms, his vernacular tongue, and his accent, all returned.

Alexander the Great, in early life, was distinguished for the rudeness and coarseness of his manners. By the skill of his tutor, Aristotle, he was enabled to overcome these; but towards the close of his life they returned again with all the original force.

I have read of a devoted Christian, who was laid upon a bed of sickness. In moments of delirium he shocked and astounded his friends by the profaneness of his language. Upon his recovery he explained the mystery by assuring his friends that such was his practice in very early life. He long ago had abandoned the practice, yet so imperishable are the impressions made upon the fresh and unoccupied minds of youth, that the stains of his youthful crimes were still upon his spirit.

The name of Voltaire will live while genius is respected and vice abhorred. His hatred of the divine Redeemer was equalled only by his wickedness. He placed upon his seat the motto, "Crush the wretch." It was his boast, that it took twelve men to write up the Christian religion, and he would prove that one man could write it down. It is not as generally known at how early an age the seeds were sown that ripened into such a pernicious harvest. At the age of five years, he committed to memory an infidel poem; its influence on him was never lost. It led him to employ splendid talents in warring with the best good of his race, and to waste the energies of a brilliant mind in reviling the truth of God. It earned for him a life of infamy, a death without hope, an eternity of misery. [Dr. Chalmers' Scripture Readings.

HOW TO REPROVE TATTLING.

"During a certain period of Mr. Hall's residence at Leicester, there were in his congregation some members of a family formerly widely scattered over the world, but who, I hope, are now dying off—I refer to the TATTLERS—sometimes found related to the busy-bodies in other men's matters; and always to be discovered where mischief is to be done, especially among Christians. My friend, having been annoyed by some of these parties, resolved to give them a little advice from the pulpit.

"On one Sunday morning, the place being crowded, and the earlier portions of the service gone through, he rose, and in the hesitating, tremulous manner in which he always began his sermons, announced as his text, James i: 26,—'If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.' The congregation looked at the preacher, and then at each other, beginning to suppose, and expect something 'appropriate of their circumstances.' It is possible that Mr. Hall perceived this, for he proceeded in a somewhat higher note than usual to say, 'My dear brethren, you will probably feel that something like an apology is due, on account of my having selected this text, from which to address you this morning; I entirely sympathize with this feeling, and hereby I solemnly and publicly ask pardon of God and of you, that I have so long neglected an important branch of my duty, which is to reprove one evil that has awfully tended to devastate the world, to ruin the Church of God, and to destroy the personal religion of every one who indulges in it; I mean the practice of backbiting and slander.'

"I need not add that the sermon was one which could not be easily forgotten; and that happily it was useful in removing the evil which he thus exposed. May each of your readers resolve, 'I will take heed of my ways, that I sin not with my tongue.'" [Joseph Belcher.

THE QUAKER AND THE EMPEROR.

Under the title "Choice Biography," the Episcopal Recorder gives an account of interviews between William Allen, a Quaker who made a journey of philanthropy over the continent of Europe, and the late Emperor Alexander of Russia, an extract from which will be gratifying to our readers. The interview here mentioned occurred at Vienna. "Grellet," spoken of in the concluding remarks, was an American Quaker who had accompanied Allen in a previous mission.

He received me very kindly, and made me sit down with him at the table. I was sensible, during the whole of the interview, of a precious covering of the Lord's Spirit, and it seemed so to increase, that I gave up speaking of outward matters, and the conversation turned entirely upon what related to a better country. The emperor asked me if I would not take some tea with him, to which I readily assented; he rung his little hand bell, and the servant came in and received his orders; two cups were brought in, but mine had sugar in it. The emperor immediately ordered it to be changed, and this led me to speak further of the poor Africans; but we soon came again upon religious subjects, and these were the topics on which he delighted to dwell. He said he had suffered from being educated by those who had no sense of vital religion, but that since the year 1812, when his mind was first reached by the power of truth, he had endeavored to live conformably to what he believed to be the Divine will; he felt that he was a poor weak creature, but he constantly prayed for assistance. He said, finding so little company that suited him, he spent much of his time alone in his room, for he felt that he suffered loss when he was much with those who were in the spirit of the world; "but," said he, "when I am with you and such as you, who love the Saviour, I can breathe." He said he found it necessary to keep up the warfare continually; he then opened his whole heart to me, told me of his trials and his temptations, comparing them to the thorn in the flesh, which the apostle describes. "And if," said he, "the holy apostle was thus tried, need we wonder if it is the experience of such poor weak creatures as we are? but let us remember what the answer was to him when he prayed to be delivered, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' Here it does not appear that he was exempted from the trial, but was shown where he was to find his support under it." We now sat some time in silence, when I kneeled down and supplicated for the blessing of preservation. The emperor knelt on the floor by me. On rising we were again silent for a few minutes, and then, under a sense of a renewed visitation of our Heavenly Father's love, took leave of each other, not knowing but that we might possibly meet again at Vernoa. He grasped my hand, and it came into my mind to tell him that though I was conscious of being a very weak and feeble instrument, I belived that our Divine Master had sent me to comfort and encourage him. He replied, "I believe so." He then embraced and kissed me. One of the last things he said was, "When you write to Grellet tell him all about me."

WASHINGTON AND THE QUAKER.

I cannot forbear quoting from the life of Washington a characteristic incident. The battle of Germantown was fought on the day of the Yearly Meeting of the Quakers in Philadelphia; and during the battle, they were engaged in prayer for divine protection to the people, and in preparing to renew their testimony agaist war. While James Thornton was writing this testimony, the cannon shook the house where they were assembled, and the air was darkened by the smoke of guns. Warner Mifflin undertook the service of carrying their testimony to the opposing generals—Washington and Howe—and, in discharging this duty, he was obliged to walk in blood, and among the dead bodies of those who had fallen in the battle. He performed it, however, with great freedom, and in conversation with Washington said expressly, "I am opposed to the Revolution, and to all changes of government which occasion war and bloodshed."

After Washington was chosen President of the United States, Mifflin went to visit him at New York, and was received with marked respect and kindness. Recollecting what Mifflin had said to him at Germantown, the President asked, "Will you please, Mr. Mifflin, to inform me on what principles you were opposed to the Revolution?" "Yes, friend Washington, upon the same principles that I should now be opposed to a change in this government; all that ever was gained by revolutions, is not an adequate compensation to the poor, mangled soldier for the loss of life or limb." Washington, after a long pause, replied with much emphasis, "Mr. Mifflin, I honor your sentiments; there is more in them than mankind have generally considered."

How emphatically true! There is more, infinitely more, in the cause of peace, in its objects, its principles and measures, than one man in a hundred imagines. [Boston Rec.

The two most precious things on this side of the grave, are reputation and life; but it is to be lamented that the most contemptible whisper may deprive us of the one, and the weakest weapon may deprive us of the other.

A mind without principles is like a ship without rudder or ballast, having nothing to steer its course or keep it even. Hence arises that variable and uneasy disposition, that inconsistent and unsteady conduct so observable in many persons.

It is a singular fact, that the age of but one woman is mentioned in the Bible at the time of her death. Wherefore it is not best to be inquisitive about the age of women.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 6, 1848.

COMPULSORY SABBATIZING IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Several weeks ago we copied from one of the religious papers published at Boston, an article urging the passage of more stringent laws against traveling by railroads on Sunday. From "Senate Document No. 81," which we find in the Chronotype, and give below, it appears that this subject has been brought before the Legislature, and reported upon by a Standing Committee of that body:—

Petition.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

Whereas, the Sabbath is an institution of God, and its strict observance is the duty and the interest of a Christian people, as corporations as well as individuals,

Therefore, we the undersigned, citizens of this Commonwealth, would respectfully petition your honorable bodies, that, in all the charters which shall be granted by you for railroads, a clause may be inserted making all running of cars and locomotives on such railroads on the Lord's day to involve a forfeiture of charter.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Stetson Raymond, Enoch Sanford,
Constantine Blodgett, Chas. T. Grosvenor,
Erastus Maltby, Mortimer Blake,
W. Barrows, Jr., George Denham.

In Senate, March 16, 1848.

The Joint Standing Committee on Railways and Canals,

Report:

The Committee believe, that the manner in which the Lord's day is used, affects the character of a people. Where Sunday is made a day of rest from the accustomed physical and mental labor of other days, and is devoted to religious worship, and to spiritual, moral, and social improvement, outward prosperity will be seen to be greater, and the general condition and habits of individuals higher and purer, than elsewhere. Every man has a right to this day for his own rest and cultivation.

In the opinion of the Committee, it is wiser to leave this great principle to work its way through the public mind, and thus control customs and conduct, than to attempt to enforce the observance of Sunday, as a day of rest, by legal penalties.

If any man chooses to disregard his right to the day, let him be careful lest he infringe upon the rights of his wiser brother; but let him not be punished for that which he regards himself alone.

Within the last few years, it is believed that the consideration of this principle has made Sunday more extensively cherished, as a blessing, than it was formerly; and that no legislation can be devised, which will tend so safely, prudently, and surely, towards a universal observance of the day, as to leave the matter where it is.

If the prayer of these petitioners were granted, circumstances are very likely to occur, where such a "clause" as they ask for, would work a wrong which they would be the last men in the world to desire. It would be very difficult to devise any prohibitory law, which would not be liable to grave objections. The Committee are not without the hope, and somewhat confident expectation, that the time will come soon, when cars and engines will not be driven on Sunday over any railroad in Massachusetts, unless for works of necessity or mercy; but they are unanimously of the opinion, that legislation on the subject is inexpedient, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

For the Committee,
A. D. Foster.

Most heartily do we subscribe to the opinion of the Senate's Committee, that "every man has a right to a day for his own rest and cultivation," and that it is wiser to leave this principle to work its way through the public mind than to attempt to enforce the observance of Sunday by legal penalties. This is the doctrine for which Sabbath-keepers have always contended. They do not ask for laws to prevent the observance of Sunday; neither do they ask for laws to enforce the observance of the Sabbath. They simply ask, that the laws which operate against keeping the Sabbath by requiring the observance of Sunday, may be abolished, and every man left free to observe what day his conscience may dictate. Surely this is a very innocent and reasonable request, and one which ought not to be opposed by those who advocate religious freedom and a separation of the church from the state.

We are told, however, that the observance of a Sabbath is highly beneficial to society, and ought therefore to be required by the civil authorities. We do not question the beneficial influence of a day of rest; on the contrary, we fully believe in it. But we doubt the correctness of the inference that it ought therefore to be required by the civil authorities. This inference implies that a community which has reason enough to see the usefulness of a Sabbath, and to make laws compelling its observance, has not reason enough to keep a Sabbath without such compulsory laws—an implication which we can see nothing to justify. It may be said, however, that only a part of the community see how necessary a Sabbath is, while a great portion of the people do not appreciate it. Very well—can you not trust those who are enlightened in this matter to act according to their light? Or must you make laws professedly for them, which will so operate as indirectly to compel others to keep a day for which they can see no reason? You could not hit upon a better way to bring the whole subject into contempt. This idea that the civil authorities may properly pass laws enforcing whatever the majority pronouce beneficial to society, is at war with the principle of religous freedom which lies at the basis of our national constitution. If carried out, it would produce the most disastrous consequences. In some communities, for instance, a majority of the people believe that abstinence from alcohol and tobacco would exert a beneficial influence. If so, why not fine and imprison a man for chewing tobacco or drinking rum, as well as for working on Sunday?

Many persons talk about the abolition of the Sunday laws as though they really believed it would lead to an unheard-of apostacy from religion, which would introduce the reign of "chaos and old night." Can it be that they have so little faith in the religion of the land? Do they indeed think that the Sunday laws are the great means of keeping the fear of God before men's eyes, and preventing them from rushing headlong to destruction? We can hardly believe it, but prefer to conclude that they talk partly for effect. For our own part, we do not believe that the authority of God and his laws over the hearts of men is so completely dependent upon state statutes. We are inclined to the opinion that things would jog on about as well, perhaps better, if all such statutes were at once blotted out. In this opinion we are strengthened by knowing, that equally important changes have been made, in the face of predicted ruin, without doing half as much evil as was feared. The time has been, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, when every man was taxed according to law for the support of religion. The proposition to abolish that law, and leave the support of religion to the voluntary contributions of the people, was received with disapprobation, and produced a tremendous outcry. It prevailed, however, and we believe religion is supported quite as well now as formerly. So would it be with the Sunday laws. If the recommendation of the Senate's Committee to leave the matter of Sabbath-keeping entirely with the consciences of individuals, should prevail, we believe that religion would be advanced rather than retarded.

THE ANTI-SABBATH CONVENTION.

The Liberator of last week contains a report of the proceedings of tee Anti-Sabbath Convention held in Boston on the 23d and 24th of March. Though brief, it includes all the resolutions, and gives probably a pretty true picture of what was done. A full report, embracing the principal speeches, is to be published in a pamphlet form at as early a day as practicable. The editor of the Liberator says that 'the Convention was numerously attended, beyond his expectations—that the attention throughout was unbroken, earnest, and most gratifying—that the tone of the discussion was serious, elevated, impressive—that the sentiments of the members harmonized, to a remarkable degree, upon the resolutions adopted—and that much light was thrown upon a subject which had hitherto been kept in the dark by the religious teachers of the people.'

As was expected, the subject of enforcing the sabbatical observance of Sunday by penal laws, was the most prominent and interesting brought before the Convention. The series of resolutions, presented by the business Committee, designed to express the views of the Convention, treated first of this topic—then of the notion that God suspends the natural laws of the universe in order to punish Sunday recreation and labor by upsetting boats and smashing railroad cars—and afterwards of the estimation in which the Convention holds the Sabbath, the uses to which they think it should be applied, and their opinion of the motives of those who are laboring to enforce its observance. Only those who agreed in the sentiments expressed in the Call were considered members of the Convention, and on this account the speeches were of course mostly in favor of the resolutions. The officers of the Convention were appointed a Committee to prepare a memorial for the repeal of all laws relative to the observance of the Sabbath, to be circulated throughout the Commonwealth for signatures, and presented at the next session of the Legislature. Another Committee was appointed to superintend the publication of the doings of the Convention, and of such other documents relating to the subject as they shall have means to publish. Finally, the Convention adjourned to meet one year hence in the city of Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, at such time and place as the publishing Committee shall appoint.

We have only room to-day for a part of the resolutions, and will therefore copy those relating to the enforcement of the Sabbath by statutes and penalties:—

1. Resolved, That they who are for subjecting to fine or imprisonment, such as do not receive their interpretation of the Scriptures, in regard to the observance of the first day of the week as the Sabbath, are actuated by a mistaken or malevolent spirit, which is utterly at variance with the spirit of Christ—which, in various ages, has resorted to the dungeon, the rack, the gallows and the stake, for the accomplishment of its purpose,—and which ought to be boldly confronted and rebuked.

2. Resolved, That the penal enactments of the State Legislature, compelling the observance of the first day of the week as the Sabbath, are despotic, unconstitutional, and ought to be immediately abrogated; and that the interference of the State in matters of religious faith and ceremonies, is a usurpation which cannot be justified.

3. Resolved, That as conflicting views prevail in the community, which are cherished with equal sincerity, respecting the holiness of days, and as it is the right of every class of citizens to be protected in the enjoyment of their religious sentiments on this and every other subject pertaining to the worship of God, all classes should be united in demanding a repeal of the enactments alluded to, on the ground of impartial justice and Christian charity.

4. Resolved, That this Convention recommend to all the friends of religious liberty throughout the country, the presentation of petitions to the next Legislature, in every State in which such laws exist, praying for their immediate repeal, and protesting against their enactment, as an unhallowed union of Church and State.

5. Resolved, That if the Legislature may rightfully determine the day on which the people shall abstain from labor for religious purposes, it may also determine the place in which they shall assemble, the rites and ordinances which they shall observe, the doctrines which they shall hear, the teachers which they shall have over them, and the peculiar faith which they shall embrace; and thus entirely subvert civil and religious freedom, and enable Bigotry and Superstition, as of old, to > 'Go to their bloody rites again—bring back

> The hall of horrors, and the assessor's pen,
> Recording answers shriek'd upon the rack—
> Smile o'er the gaspings of spine-broken men,
> And perpetrate damnation in their den!'

6. Resolved, That as it has been found safe, politic, and beneficial, to allow the people to decide for themselves in all other religious observances, there is no reason to doubt that the same good results would attend their liberation from the bondage of a sabbatical law; for 'where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.'

OUR MISSIONARIES.

Recent news from our missionaries informs us that they are generally in good health. Sister Wardner enjoyed far better health than when she left America. Sister Carpenter had been ill with dysentery—a disease very apt to affect foreigners—but was decidedly better. A gratifying feature in all their letters, from first to last, is the satisfaction they express in the work committed to them. No doubts concerning the propriety of the step they have taken appear to trouble them. We hail this as a good omen. May their zeal increase, and their work of faith and labor of love redound to the glory of God. Extracts from their letters to the Board will be given in due time. In the mean time, if a farther examination of their private communications shall develop any thing of sufficient interest to be laid before the public, it will be forthcoming.

The friends of the cause will please to bear in mind, that it will be necessary to make another remittance very soon. It is hoped, therefore, that their contributions will be forwarded to the Treasurer as soon as possible. A box of clothing, and such articles as are useful in the way of house-keeping, will also be made up at an early day. If any of the friends, having such things to contribute, will forward the same to New York, to the care of Geo. B. Utter, 9 Spruce-st., they will be thankfully acknowledged, and forwarded to China by the first opportunity. The contribution of such things, however, must not be made an excuse for neglecting to contribute in money as heretofore. We are confident it will not be.

The hand of God is evidently in this mission, and our brethren have great encouragement to labor and pray for its success. May the Lord spare the lives of our missionaries, and stimulate the hearts of our brethren at home to sustain them to the utmost. *

Note.—Shanghai being a place where much cold prevails in winter, flannels, and the various articles of woolen clothing which are in use here, will be useful there.

"SINGULAR POSITION."

The Commercial Advertiser, of this city, says that the authorities of the city of Charleston, S. C., have prohibited the sale of the "Discipline of the Methodist Church, South," because it retains a section of the general discipline of the Church which testifies to the "great evil of slavery," and inquires how it may be "extirpated." And what is perhaps even more startling, the Annual Conference of that State has sanctioned the uncomplaining submission of the Charleston clergy and laity to the restriction. So that the Southern branch of the Methodist Episcopal Church is in the singular position of having an authorized code of discipline which cannot be circulated among its members.

These same authorities of the city of Charleston have undertaken to prevent Jews from attending to their business on Sunday, after they have kept their Sabbath on the previous day. In this case they occupy a position more singular, if possible, than that of the Methodist Church; for they encourage the circulation of a Bible which says "the seventh day is the Sabbath," and live under a Constitution which guarantees the free exercise of religious opinions, and yet they fine and imprison men for not sabbatizing on the first day who conscientiously believe they ought to be at work on that day.

A Crooked Affair.—The Boston papers have said a good deal about a recent public entertainment given in that city. It seems that the remains of the late John Quincy Adams were attended to his family residence by the Committee of the United States House of Representatives, consisting of one from each State and Territory in the Union; and the municipal authorities of Boston, in order to testify their grateful sense of the honor done to a distinguished son of Massachusetts, tendered to this Committee the hospitalities of the city. The City Council also ordered a public entertainment to be given at the Revere House, and it was voted, "that the sub-committee on the dinner be instructed to provide no wine at the expense of the city." The "dinner" took place in the evening, and, after it had proceeded some way, to the surprise of many who were present, wine in abundance was introduced, and the feast did not break up till near morning! Some declare that the dinner ended in a noisy carousal. Others declare that the greater part were quite sober when it broke up. It appears that the sub-committee, who had the dinner in charge, consented to have the wine introduced, at whose expense does not appear; some saying that a few wealthy, "patriotic" citizens paid for it; others, that it will be worked into the bill in some way, and the greater part or all the expense will come out of the city. It should be added, that the Mayor obtained intelligence of what was going on, and did not attend.

X Cheering Revival Intelligence.—From several churches in different parts of our denomination we have recently received verbal reports of interesting revivals. The church at Pawcatuck, R. I., dedicated an elegant new meeting-house on the 24th of February, and immediately commenced a series of meetings. We learn that between thirty and forty persons have since been baptized and joined that church, and that the work has extended to other socicties in the neighborhood. The church at New Salem, Va., has also been visited in mercy, and several perssons have been baptized and joined the church. At Shiloh, N. J., an interesting state of religious feeling has existed, and some hopeful conversions and baptisms have taken place. A similar report reaches us from the church at DeRuyter, N. Y. Such facts ought to encourage the people of God, and stimulate them to greater activity in the service of their Master.

The Way to do it.—The Roman Catholics have peculiar ways of doing some things, among which we note their way of compelling parents to send their children to Catholic schools. Only think of denying a man absolution and the other sacraments, or even excommunicating him, for neglect on this point! But here is an official account of how they do at Birmingham, near Pittsburg, Pa. It is taken from a "letter of missionary John Evang. Mosetizh, to his Princely Grace, the Most Reverend Archbishop of Vienna," published in the Twentieth Report of the Austrian Leopold Society:—

"Here are three (Roman Catholic) schools, located in different quarters of the city, and containing, one 150, another 60, and the third 40 children. Each child pays half a dollar monthly for his instruction. Here are no police laws requiring the attendance of children at school; it depends on the will of the parents to what school to send their children, or whether to any. To awaken and keep alive the zeal of parents, therefore, belongs to the church, which punishes delinquent and negligent members, by denying them absolution and the other sacraments. In aggravated cases of transgression, the penalty of excommunication is applied, as prescribed by the Council of Baltimore; a painful duty, but one which the missionaries have often to perform; for it is unavoidably necessary, when all previous admonitions have failed."

New York Legislature.—The session of this body is drawing to a close, and, as usual on such occasions, business is being dispatched quite rapidly. A bill has been passed creating a Reform Code of Legal Practice in Civil Cases for the several Courts of the State, as prepared by the Commissioners under the New Constitution. The Assembly has passed a resolution instructing the Attorney General to litigate the titles of the Manorial Estates within the limits of the State. The bill to revive the Safety Fund Banking System has been lost. A bill has been reported authorizing the consolidation of the several railroads forming the continuous line from Albany to Buffalo, and requiring them to complete a double track throughout.

Missionaries Returned.—We learn from the New York Recorder, that the Rev. Mr. Vinton and Mrs. Vinton, (Baptist missionaries to Burmah,) their two remaining children, and two Karen Christians, recently arrived at Boston in the fine bark W. H. Shailer, in fifty-three days from Cape Town. Mr. and Mrs. V. buried their youngest child at Cape Town. The health of Mrs. V. has been improved by the voyage.

SUNDAY LAWS.

The Seventh-Day Baptists of New Jersey, presented a memorial to the Legislature of that State, in regard to laws demanding the religious observance of Sunday. The memorialists say: "They believe there is no authority given by the Head of the Christian religion, to any body or association of men, to compel their fellow men to regard any religious observance by penalties at civil law. * * * * * * * * * * They would therefore be obliged in conscience to object against any civil statute compelling the observance of the seventh day of the week, as they do against the statute for compelling the observance of the first day, contrary to men's free will. They believe that God has wisely reserved this authority solely within his own power."

There is truth in their position. It is, we are aware, quite popular to demand laws enforcing the observance of the Lord's-day. We never yet saw the propriety or necessity for them. The encroachment of the civil power on the domain of religion, is always to be carefully guarded against. We have no more sympathy for the observance of the seventh day, the Jewish Sabbath, than for the rite of circumcision. At the same time, we believe that the principle, for which these memorialists contend, is the true principle. It is the one which Baptists, especially, ought to maintain. The self-sufficiency of the Gospel has been demonstrated in the past. It can sustain itself without, or even against the enactments of the civil power. Pure religion—the true religion of Christ, needs not to hobble along on the crutches of the civil law. It can run and be glorified by its own inherent strength. [Christian Chronicle.

CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN CHINA.

The January number of the "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith," published at Lyons and Paris, gives a long account of the labors of Roman Catholic missionaries in China. The Rev. Father Esteva, writes from Shanghai, under date of June 1st, 1846, describing a visit he made to the adjacent island of Tronming. Under the Emperor Kang-hi, this province contained, he says, 300,000 Christians; but, owing to the persecutions exercised against the faithful, and, more especially, the want of Apostolical laborers, the number does not, at present, exceed 60,000. Formerly, there were eighty large chapels—some of which might be called churches—but almost all of which have been destroyed, or converted into pagodas. During the last three or four years, several chapels have been erected. This zealous missionary also gives some details concerning what he calls the Chinese Christian Virgins, who dedicate themselves to a life of celibacy, and devote their time to the service of the church and the conversion of the pagans. He says there are three hundred such in his district, which contains only about nine thousand Christians. An important part of their work is to baptize young children.

Father Clevelin writes from Tronming, under date of May 31, 1845, giving some sad details of the extent to which infanticide is carried in that part of China:—

"Notwithstanding all their efforts, the number saved is but 'as a drop of water from the river.' 'How many of these infants have I not seen,' writes the Father, 'in the ditches filled with water. They are thrown in during the night, and in two minutes they are suffocated. We must, however, say that the bodies of deceased infants are sometimes thrown into the ditches by their parents, unwilling to be troubled with the ceremony of burial.' In the Peninsula of Kreman, men are sometimes seen who have several of these infants to sell, and always at a low price. A Christian Virgin bought three of them, and baptized three others who were dying. Those whom she bought cost her something less than ten cents! These died in a few days. The missionary has given orders to the Christians to buy as many of these poor infants as should be offered for sale."

The following extract gives the substance of another letter from the same missionary, dated July 25, 1846, and showing very well the mode of operations by which so much is done in so short a time:—

"He describes the province of Kiang-nan as the most beautiful, most fertile, richest and most intellectually cultivated of any in China. Its population he puts at 30,000, while the Christians only number 7,000! and these are spread over a district as large as France, and divided into thirty-six Christian settlements or congregations. The greater part of this flock can only approach the Sacraments once in four years! One-half of the missionary's time is devoted to sick visits; and yet, many die without the Sacraments, as from the above facts must necessarily be the case. The Emperor has issued another (the third) Edict in favor of the Christians, the advantages from which, however, the missionary describes as more apparent than real. The Anglican (Protestant) missionaries distribute their Bibles by millions, but as yet have not made a single convert in Kiang-nan; while the Catholic missionary can scarcely answer the calls made on him. This failure is not to be attributed to want of zeal—still less to want of money—on the part of the aforesaid missionaries, but must be regarded as an indication of what may be expected from unsent Apostles."

Another missionary, Father Gonnet, gives the following account of his efforts:—

"Since I have begun to stammer out a few Chinese words, I have had the happiness to baptize more than eighty adults. At this moment, I have more then 200 catechumens preparing for baptism. I do not speak of idolaters who have a leaning towards Christianity: they are without number. Oh, were there but enough of Apostolical laborers to come, we would see, in a few years, millions of these poor blindfold creatures enter the way which leads to life. But a few days ago, I baptized seventeen adults at the same time, being four entire families.' In the year from 1845 to 1846, the missionary, aided, as it appears, by the Christians in his district, baptized more than 2,000 infants, whom their barbarous parents had destined for death, and most of whom, in fact, subsequently died."

MICROSCOPIC WONDERS.

Upon examining the edge of a very sharp lancet with a microscope, it will appear as broad as the back of a knife; rough, uneven, full of notches and furrows. An exceedingly small needle resembles a rough iron bar. But the sting of a bee, seen through the same instrument, exhibits every where a most beautiful polish, without the least flaw, blemish or inequality, and it ends in a point too fine to be discerned. The threads of a fine lawn seem coarser than the yarn with which ropes are made for anchors. But a silk-worm's web appears perfectly smooth and shining, and every where equal. The smallest dot that can be made with a pen, appears irregular and uneven, but the little specks on the wings or bodies of insect are found to be most accurately circular. The finest miniature paintings appear before the microscope ragged and uneven, entirely devoid of beauty, either in drawing or coloring. The most even and beautiful varnishes will be found to be mere roughness. But the nearer we examine the works of God, even in the least productions, the more sensible shall we be of his wisdom and power. In the numberless species of insects, what proportion, exactness, uniformity, and symmetry do we perce in all organs!—Azure, green, and vermilion, gold, silver, pearls, rubies, and diamonds, fringe and embroidery, on their bodies, wings, heads, and every part! How high the finishing, how inimitable the polish we every where behold.

General Intelligence.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Senate.

The discussion upon the Loan Bill occupied a good deal of time. In the course of the discussion several estimates were made of the present debt of the United States, which was generally placed at about one hundred million of dollars. No action was taken upon the bill.

A bill in relation to ascertaining and paying the claims against the United States growing out of the operations of our forces in California, was also discussed at considerable length.

Joint resolutions were introduced tendering the congratulations of Congress to the people of France for their brilliant success in establishing a Republican form of Government. The passage of the resolutions at present was thought by many to be premature, and they were not disposed of, although they elicited many remarks.

A petition was presented, numerously signed by citizens of New York, praying that Congress would make a report expressive of its opinion whether Slavery ever had a constitutional existence. The Senate decided against receiving the petition.

Several petitions were presented, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the purchase of the Estate of Mount Vernon, and that the title of the same might be vested in the United States Government and become the property of the nation.

Much time was spent in Executive Session discussing questions and examining witnesses relative to the manner in which the Mexican Treaty was made public before the secrecy of the Senate was officially removed. A resolution was presented and unanimously adopted, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to make an inquiry as to the expediency of providing by law for the adequate punishment of such persons as shall surreptitiously obtain and publish any executive document before the injunction of secrecy with regard to it shall have been removed.

House of Representatives.

We find but little to report in the doings of the House. A bill in favor of refunding moneys advanced to Volunteers, was discussed, but not passed. A bill for the appointment of a Governor of Oregon, and the regular organization of that territory, was also under consideration.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION—ITS EFFECTS.

We gave last week a hasty sketch of the news from Europe received by the steamer Caledonia. The following summary contains some additional items in relation to the character and influence of the French Revolution, which is the principal topic treated of in the foreign papers:—

Louis Phillippe and his wife embarked in a fishing boat with the intention of crossing the Channel, but were soon picked up by the Southampton and Havre steamer Express, and landed at New Haven, near Brighton, England. Previous to their departure from France, the King and Queen had been for days wandering from farm-house to farm-house, and at the time of their departure were nearly exhausted with fatigue. The king escaped without a change of clothing. The royal pair were kindly received by the people of New Haven.

The palace of the Tuilleries has been formed into a hospital for workmen, under the name of the Hotel des Invalids Ouvriers. The Chateau of Nuilly has been sacked and burnt to the ground.

The character of the new government may be judged of by the decrees and proclamations published. From the large number issued we select the following:—Capital punishment to be abolished; all political prisoners to be liberated and furnished with means to join their families; the liberty of the press guarantied and freedom of thought secured; national workshop open for the unemployed; abolition of all titles and nobility; the stamp duty on periodicals suppressed; the persons, properties, and rights of foreigners to be respected; all the citizens to be armed and clothed as national guards; an act to be prepared for the immediate emancipation of slaves of all the Colonies; all prosecutions against the press or for political offences to be withdrawn, and the prisoners confined for such offences to be released. National assembly to meet on the 9th of April, and decree a Constitution, population to be the basis of election, Representatives of the people fixed at 900, including the Colonies—Suffrage to be universal—all Frenchmen 21 years of age to be electors, and all of 25 years eligible to be elected, the ballot to be secret, voters to be furnished with a ballot list and to vote at the principal place in each Canton; royal residences to be sold and proceeds applied to the victims of the Revolution, and as some compensation for losses in trade and manufactures. Decrees have also been issued changing the name of several vessels in the Navy, as also the names of those of the streets which had any reference to monarchy or the members of the fallen King's family. All institutions having the name Royal prefixed to be called National.

England.—The revolution in France has excited the lower orders in England, who have shown a disposition to riot in London and Manchester.

Prussia.—There is a determination on the part of the people of the middle class to achieve political independence.

Austria.—Metternich has resigned. At Vienna the French revolution had caused great consternation; all the ministers had met in council. 30,000 troops were ordered to Italy.

Bavaria.—A constitution has been extorted from the King at the point of the bayonet.

Italy.—The King of Naples had bombarded the city of Messina for forty-two hours, carrying fire and sword into it. The ministry have resigned.

"Cannot take care of themselves."—A letter from Oberlin states that "Mrs. D. is teaching a colored school of about 40 scholars, almost every one of whom have emancipated themselves, and are now sustaining themselves here, paying their board, tuition, &c. Bro. George Thomson, a few evenings since, addressed the colored people on the subject of Kaw-mendi mission, and at the close 75 dollars were subscribed for his outfit. This was subscibed by thirty-one individuals, every one of whom had tasted the sweets of slavery."

SUMMARY.

In a recent discussionin the Assembly of New York on the Passengers bill, Mr. Upham remarked that German emigrants alone were fleeced out of more than $200,000 the past year. Mr. Spaulding had known forty and fifty at a time left upon the docks at Buffalo, defrauded and pennyless—robbed of every farthing by unprincipled runners. The system commences in New York. Runners board vessels, bribe the captains, inveigle emigrants to passenger boarding-houses, there sell tickets, sometimes worthless ones, and sometimes at enormous prices. The same game is played in Albany, then at Troy, an often at Buffalo.

Died, in New Prospect, Bergen Co., N. J., on the 24th ult., Mrs. Charity Berry, at the extraordinary age of one hundred and ten years! She was married during the Revolutionary War, and was the mother of thirteen children, all of whom still survive! Her husband was captain of a militia company in active service, and aided in driving the British troops from Hoppertown. Generals Washington and Lafayette together, dined with her one day under the shade of a stately elm tree near her door, a circumstance she was fond of relating. Her eye-sight never failed in the least until her death, and she was able to go about until about five years back.

The Albany Evening Journal publishes the following extract of a letter, dated Leroy, March 29: "A painful and fatal accident occurred last evening, in the family of L. S. Bacon. One of the gas lamps exploded, and burned both of his children. They died before morning. The servant girl may not live through the day. Mr. Bacon had gone to Rochester, and has not yet returned. How changed the scene in that family! He is left childless. The bell is now tolling for the funeral of the children. One was four and the other six years old.

The Springfield Republican says that two brothers named Goodwell, of the town of Wilbraham, have been sued by that town for the support of their mother, who has been taken care of by the town as a pauper. The defendants put in a plea of inability, but it was proved that they were in comfortable circumstances as small farmers, and the case was decided against them.

Gov. Young has pardoned Peter Williams, who was convicted, about four years since, of manslaughter in the first degree, in killing a lad named Daniel Stanley, and who was sentenced to twenty-one years and six months imprisonment. Also Jesse Chene and Edward Hampson, convicted of burglary, and Richard Lane, convicted of grand larceny. The President has also pardoned Nicholas Coyle, who was sentenced in 1843 to the State Prison for counterfeiting United States coin.

In Hamilton, U. C., recently, an old man and his wife were found lying dead together on the floor of their house, on a parcel of old rags, having killed themselves by swilling whiskey. A child of the wretched people, a boy about seven years old, was found lying close to his father's dead body.

Dr. V. P. Coolidge, of Waterville, Me., has been found guilty of murdering Mr. Matthews, and on Friday was sentenced to be hung. The law of that State provides that a criminal shall not be hung within a year of his conviction, so that he may have the advantage of any testimony that may come to light in that time. It is said that Dr. Coolidge has since died in his prison.

The Constitution of the U. S. has been in operation from the 3d of March, 1789, being a period of fifty-nine years, in the course of which we have had eleven Presidents. Of these eight have sunk into the tomb; and only one of them leaves a son behind him. The last three Presidents survive, namely: Mr. Van Buren, Mr. Tyler, and the acting President, Mr. Polk.

On the 28th of March, the Home Print-Works, near Central Falls, R. I., were the scene of a terrible explosion. The steam boiler of the establishment blew up, destroying the main building, and burying many of the workmen in the ruins. Eight bodies had been taken out at last accounts, and six more were supposed to remain among the rubbish.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Traveler says that he lately saw a long funeral procession passing by the Park, up Chatham-st., and the driver of the hearse, mounted in front of the coffin, was smoking his cigar as unconcerned and leisurely as if it was a holiday!

Hydrophobia is said to be cured in Germany by the cold water remedy. The douche was applied to the head of the patient, who was entirely cured. The warm bath, wet sheet, douche, &c., are the usual method with the disease, and remarkable success is reported.

It is stated by some statistical hunter, that the sum annually expended for bread by the population of Great Britain and Ireland, amounts to twenty-five millions sterling, while the money expended in distilled and fermented drinks amounts to upwards of fifty millions annually.

The news of the revolution in France was carried by an express locomotive from London to Glasgow, 472 miles, in 10 hours. The average running time being 52 miles an hour.

In primitive times the Bishops at Rome, like other pastors, were chosen by the people; they were next appointed by the German Emperors. Gregory VII., better known by the name of Hildebrand, is said to have transferred this power to the College of Cardinals.

An association has been formed in Maryland, called the Independent Order of Anti-Gamblers. Its object is to reform persons who have become addicted to this ruinous vice.

Origen Bacheler died in Boston, on the 14th ult., aged 48 years.

A bill has been introduced into the Legislature of Pennsylvania, of a stringent kind, against those arrant impostors who go under the name of fortune tellers. If a clause could be added, providing for the punishment of the miserable dupes who countenance and resort to them, the bill would be more perfect.

The Brunswick (Me.) Advertiser states, that among the medical students at the present session of the medical school, are several colored gentlemen, and remarks that they will find that respectable people in Brunswick, respect the respectable, of whatever nation or complexion they may be.

In consequence of the unfavorable accounts from the tanners respecting the scarcity of bark to tan the stock of hides now out, and the consequent delay which is likely to occur in bringing the spring stock of leather to market, and also the great reduction of the stock on hand, caused by the heavy auction sales, through the summer months, prices have improved and may now be quoted at one cent higher than the last year's sales.

It is stated that Mr. Hotchkiss, the gentleman who was so nearly murdered in Brooklyn some months since, has recovered his bodily health and is slowly regaining his mental faculties. He seems to have forgotten everything he learned during his life, and has to be taught to speak and learn his letters as if he was a child. The sound of his own voice in learning to articulate a new word amuses him exceedingly.

Responses to the French Revolution have been given in many parts of the country, and by representatives of nearly every nation, within a week or two past. In New York, on Monday last, there was a great demonstration, at which the Mayor presided, assisted by gentlemen from different nations who directed the proceedings of their respective countrymen.

Late French papers say that Jean le Capelin, petit, or little John Capelin, has invented a sewing machine that makes 240 stitches per minute, which by the turn of a screw are changed from fine to coarse in a moment. It will sew, stitch, and make edgings by the same movement.

The "Metalized India Rubber," made for the purpose of being placed under iron rails, where they have a bearing on iron or wood, with a view to diminishing the wear of engines and cars, is to be tried on the Stonington route, four miles of which will be laid with it by the 1st of May.

The act of abdication signed by the King before quitting the Tuilleries was in the following words—"I abdicate to the hands of the French, on the head of my grandson, the crown which I received from the French nation."

Detonating balls as well as red lights are used in cases where trains are detained on the English railways. Under the wheels of any approaching engine the balls explode with an exceeding loud report.

A large sugar refinery was burnt in New York on Sunday morning last. In the progress of the fire some kind of gas was generated from the sugar or other substances in the building, which exploded and forced a great part of the front wall into the street, killing two firemen, and wounding several others.

Some citizens of Alleghany, Pa., discovered a very neat white box floating down the Alleghany river. They at once brought it to the shore, and on opening it, strange to behold—they found a child in it alive!

Sufficient wire has now been suspended across the Niagara at the Falls to make crossing perfectly easy and safe. Passengers are drawn across in a basket at fifty cents a head. In a few days the line will be strong enough to pass over cattle.

The Mad River (Ohio) Railroad is expected to be completed by the 1st of May, making a continuous line from Cincinnati to Lake Erie at Sandusky. Passengers will then be conveyed from Cincinnati to New York, via Buffalo, in three days and one hour, or to Boston in three hours more—all by steam.

The N. Y. Tribune says that on the 27th ult., during the rain, the Troy and Montreal telegraph worked successfully from Troy to Burlington, a distance of 186 miles, with a battery of ten cups, in which spring-water was substituted for Sulphuric acid; and the battery had been at work with the water for four or five days previous.

A sealing expedition, consisting of 103 vessels, has been despatched from St. John's and the outports, giving employment to 3,541 men. At some of the outports the people are in a starving state.

The Boston Whig denies peremptorily the statement that Mr. Charles Francis Adams is about to publish the wtitings of his distinguished father. Mr. C. F. A. is the Editor of the Boston Whig.

In Philadelphia, an old house has just been torn down to make room for a new one. It is the same house occupied by Louis Phillipe, many years ago, in the days of his comparative obscurity.

It is said that Louis Phillipe has from ten to twenty millions of dollars invested in real estate in the city of New York. It is not very improbable that he may arrive in this country in the course of a few months.

It is said that upon an official canvass of the votes upon the license question, it is found that Vermont has given a majority of thirteen for the sale of spirits.

Mr. Archibald Green, of Bloomfield, Ohio, made, during the past season, 7,000 pounds of cheese from fourteen cows. David Crowell of Rome, same State, made 8,100 pounds from thirteen cows.

Dr. Holland says, "that if persons are always supposing that they are liable to a certain distemper, the nerves will so act upon that part that it is very likely to come upon them."

The Collector of New York has lately received from a merchant $226, which he says is the amount of an error made against the government in a business transaction at the custom-house in 1847.

Men are frequently like tea—the real strength and goodness is not properly drawn out of them till they have been for a a short time in hot water.

Mr. James Purcell advertises in the Columbia (N. Y.) Democrat for a wife. He says he is no "peculiar critic with respect to morals or personal refinement, neither does he stand for the want of a finished education; plain house-work, fidelity and a civil tongue, is all that is required." He will attend to all letters, post paid, directed to New Lebanon Centre, N. Y.

A Cincinnati paper says a lady of that city upon a visit in Kentucky, hearing a household servant, the best educated and the most cared for of the slave population, repeat the ten commandments, asked what was the meaning of the command, "Thou shalt not steal." The slave replied that it meant, "they should not take things from the white people."

John Jacob Astor is dead. He breathed his last on the 29th ult., aged 85 years. His immense wealth has made him extensively known. It remains to be seen whether his disposal of it, when it was no longer of any service to him, will make him as extensively remembered.

At a recent meeting of the Virginia Bible Society, in Richmond, says the American Messenger, the agent for the State stated that there were about 60,000 white persons in Virginia over 20 years of age, who were unable to read, and about 16,000 families which did not possess any portion of the word of God.

The late residence of Joseph Bonaparte, on the banks of the Delaware, at Bordentown, N. J., is now undergoing repairs and furnishing for a summer resort, and will be opened for visitors on the 1st of May, by Charles H. Miller, formerly an assistant in the Delavan House at Albany.

Sir John Franklin, the Navigator, has not been heard from since 1835, and fears that he is lost are entertained. His wife requests American whalers and other vessels visiting the Northern seas, to look for traces of him. The British government are fitting out two expeditions to go in pursuit of him.

At New Haven, Conn., one Mr. Davenport, who died lately without children, left a handsome property to be enjoyed by the widow during her life, and then to go to the Orphan Asylum. Mr. D. made his property by keeping a toy-shop—and remarked, that as he "had made his money out of the children, it was right it should go back to them."

On the evening of the 16th instant, Judge John Hyde, of Connecticut, was visited with an apoplectic stroke at his tea table.

MARRIED,

In Fulton, Rock Co., W. T., March 2, by Eld. Z. Campbell, Mr. William Vincent, of Milton, to Miss Sophronia Burdick, of Fulton.

DIED,

In Milton, W. T., January 28, of consumption, Adelia M., wife of Benjamin F. Bond, eldest daughter of Eld. Stillman Coon, aged 19 years. The subject of this notice experienced religion in early life, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist connection, of which she remained a worthy member till death. Though long confined, and at times her distress was great, she bore it with Christian patience, conversed freely of her departure, said she was willing to die, and after resigning all into the hands of Jesus, died in the triumph of the Christian faith.

In Milton, W. T., February 17, Job Maxson, in the 43d year of his age. Bro. Maxson was long an acceptable member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Wirt, N. Y. For a number of the last years of his life he enjoyed but a poor state of health. He found the religion he professed while young, was his support when earthly comfort fled. A few hours before he died, he called the family to his bed-side and bade them farewell. Some of his last words were, 'Come, come, sweet Jesus.' He has left a companion and four children to mourn the loss.

In Truxton, N. Y., March 5, 1848, Laura Burdic[illegible], daughter of Dea. Varnum M. Burdick, in the 15th year of her age. In the fullness of her first love, she left the church militant to join the church triumphant, having been a visible member of the former only four weeks and one day. But short as was her service, it was manifestly full of blessedness.

In Oxford, Chenango Co., N. Y., on the 25th ult., Charlotte Maria, daughter of James and Phebe Wells, aged 3 years and 5 months.

"Dear one, thou art gone to a world on high,
Where saints are blessed, above the sky,
To dwell with Jesus, that dear Friend
On whom our hopes of heaven depend;
Although thy loss we deeply mourn,
We cannot wish thee to return
Back to this world of care and pain,
To feel the pangs of death again." J. C.

REPUBLICATION OF
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

IMPORTANT WORK!
Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.
CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

NATURE'S NOBILITY.

BY REV. GEORGE ASPINWALL.

Room for a nobleman to pass!
In costly robes? in trappings gay?
A fop tricked out before the glass?
No! clad in sober grey;
A nobleman in heart is he,
With mind for his nobility.

His crest, a soul in virtue strong;
His arms, a heart with candor bright;
Which gold bribes not to what is wrong,
Nor blinds to what is right;
The patent of his courtly race—
Behold it in his open face.

He cringes not on those above,
Nor tramples on the worm below;
Misfortunes cannot cool his love,
Or flattery make it grow;
Staunch to his friends in woe or weal,
As is the magnet to the steel.

He envies not the deepest sage;
He scoffs not at the meanest wight;
And all the war that he doth wage
Is in the cause of right;
For broad estate, and waving land,
He hath the poor man's willing hand.

He is not rich, and yet, indeed,
Has wealth; nor poor, his stock though small;
Not rich, he gives so much to need,
Not poor, for on him fall
Such blessings from relieved distress,
To crown his path with happiness.

Room for a lord! ye truckling crew,
Who round earth's great ones fawn and wind;
Fall back! and gaze on something new—
A lord, at least in mind—
That bravest work in nature's plan,
An upright, independent man!

MASSACHUSETTS BAY, BOSTON, &c.

Dr. Burns, one of the Deputation from England to the Triennial Conference of the Free-Will Baptists of America, is publishing in a London paper Notes of his Tour, from which the following account of places in the vicinity of Boston is copied:—

The day we first gained sight of the American shores, was most lovely. The sky was beautifully serene. The heat, to a European, comfortably warm—the thermometer being about 86. It is difficult to convey a just description of the lovely appearance of the bay of Massachusetts. Having left Cape Ann on the south, the harbor contains many beautiful islands, and is not only safe, but large enough to contain the largest navy in the world. Three miles below the city there is a narrow pass, well protected by forts Independence and Warren. The outside harbor is defended by a very massive fortress in George's Island, erected by the Government at a great expense. The appearance of Boston from the river is very much like that of a crescent, and its quays crowded with shipping, and its numerous lofty spires and elevated buildings, present a most striking and lovely aspect. Boston is one of the oldest and most respectable cities in the Union. It was founded in the year 1630, and its Indian name was Shaumut, but the early settlers called it Tremont or Trimontain, from its being built upon three hills. Its present population is about 120,000. It became an incorporated city in 1832. Boston is emphatically a city of bridges. Hence the stranger in his various wanderings into the suburban towns and villages will have to cross the Charlestown bridge, 1500 feet long, Warren bridge, which is 1400 feet, West Boston bridge, Boston Free bridge, &c., &c., &c. These bridges, of course in true American style, are all built of wood. The streets of Boston are generally crooked and narrow—many of them inconveniently so. But the houses and shops are substantial erections, and are distinguished for their vast number of windows, the Americans having never yet been required to tax the light of heaven for the support of their Government.

Cornhill and Washington are the chief streets for Editorial offices, Booksellers' shops, &c., &c. Tremont street is very elegant, and contains some highly respectable mansions, hotels, and other public buildings. Boston is a place of great commercial activity, and its spacious warehouses, massive quays, and numerous banks are all indicative of its rapid growth and prosperity. Boston Common, or as it ought to be designated, the park, is a beautiful piece of ground of 75 acres, and is tastefully planted with trees and surrounded by ornamental iron palisades. This is the public promenade of both Bostonians and strangers, and adds greatly to the comfort and health of the city. The State-house is a lofty splendid building situated on the summit of Beacon hill, and fronts the common. The foundation is 110 feet above the level of the sea. This building cost 133,330 dollars. On the entrance floor is the beautiful statue of Washington, by Chantrey. From the cupola a most delightful view is obtained, not only of Boston and its harbor, but of the bay, its islands, and extensive range of beautiful country. It is said that 54,00 persons ascended the Cupola, from April to November, 1846.

Faneuil Hall is 108 years old. It is generally called the Cradle of Liberty, as it was within its walls the Fathers of the Revolution met, deliberated, and delivered their spirit-stirring addresses. It is a fine building, will hold probably 2000 persons, and is often occupied for public meetings, for political, literary, and benevolent purposes. It was presented to the city by Peter Faneuil, who died in March, 1743.—Boston is admirably accommodated with railway and water communication. By rail and water it is connected with Portland, in the State of Maine; with Dover, N. H.; with Lowell, Concord, Albany, &c. The newspaper and periodical presses flourish in Boston. There are about 14 daily and 54 weekly and semi-weekly papers published in Boston, besides a considerable number of monthly and quarterly magazines. In fact Boston is the Literary emporium of the United States. Boston is justly distinguished for its numerous, handsome and commodious places of worship. The Clergy, for so all ministers are designated, number upwards of a hundred, giving one to about every 1100 of the population, and providing a religious house of worship to every six hundred persons of those who can attend at the same time.

Adjacent to Boston, and within one mile, we arrive at Charlestown—a fine lively town of from 12,000 to 14,000 inhabitants. Here is the Massachusetts State Prison—one of the most orderly and best conducted prisons in the world. We visited every department of it. Its spacious workshops, clean and well-aired cells, its commodious chapel, useful library, kind yet efficient discipline, all excited our admiration; and, instead of this institution being a heavy expense to the State, it is an actual source of revenue. In Charlestown is also the lofty massive Bunker's Hill Monument. This monument is erected on a fine open and elevated spot, is built of granite; has nearly 300 steps to its summit, from whence there is a splendid view of Boston and the surrounding country. It is almost needless to say, that this monument was raised to commemorate the celebrated battle of "Breed," or Bunker's Hill, fought June 17, '75.

Cambridge is an incorporated city, two miles West by North-west of Boston, and is chiefly distinguished as the location of Harvard University, the oldest and most wealthy College in the United States. We were very politely shown through the library, by the librarian, and found it rich in literary antiquities, as well as in our most modern authors. A law school, medical school, and a theological seminary, form part of the University. The students generally average from 400 to 450. Its funds at present exceed half a million of dollars.

Roxbury is another incorporated city adjoining Boston, containing upwards of 10,000 inhabitants. It is delightfully situated, and has a number of handsome places of worship, respectable villas, &c. To this list we might add, Chelsea, about one mile from Boston, and also the suburban towns of south and west Boston. But we pass on to notice a place of considerable interest, and which is very generally visited—Mount Auburn. Mount Auburn is the site of a recently formed cemetery. The cemetery consists of 110 1-2 acres of most picturesque ground, laid out with great skill and effect. Though only opened in September, 1831, it contains a considerable number of chaste tombs and striking monuments, cenotaphs and mausoleums. We were particularly struck with the monument to Spurzheim, the celebrated Phrenologist—to the Hon. Nathaniel Bowditch, LL. D., the American Navigator—and to the Rev. Dr. W. E. Channing, the elegant Scholar and Philanthropist. Mount Auburn is about four miles from Boston, and is constantly and cheaply accessible by the numerous omnibuses that ply all day long.

MRS. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mrs. Adams was born in England on the 11th of February, 1775. She was the daughter of Joshua Johnson, a Maryland gentleman, who went from America to London, where he became eminent as a merchant. During the war he left England for France, where he acted as the Commercial Agent of this country, and returned upon the ratification of the treaty of Peace. Mr. Adams found his future wife in London, when acting under a commission conferred upon him by General Washington, in 1794, for exchanging the ratifications made under the treaty of November of that year. Mrs. A. was married at All Hallows Church, London, on the 26th of June, 1797, and followed her husband to Prussia, where Mr. A. was presented as the first American Minister from the United States. Mrs. Adams conferred honor upon the country at a time when the United States was just recognized as an equal among the nations of the earth. Her next theatre of service was in Washington, and after this again the Court of St. Petersburg, and this from 1809 to 1814, the most exciting, and perhaps the most revolutionary period in the history of Europe, and embracing a part of that interesting period of our history when the country was at war with England. Mr. Adams resided longer at St. Petersburg than any one of our American Ministers, excepting Mr. Middleton, and his lady was left there for a brief period, while her husband was called to another field of service. Mrs. A. came alone from St. Petersburg to Paris, after the treaty of Peace had been signed by Mr. A. at Ghent. She was at Paris during the most memorable period of Napoleon's supremacy, and passed the world-wide "hundred days" at the Frence metropolis, in the midst of the whirl of excitement incident to the struggle between the Bourbons and the Revolutionists. After a short residence in France, followed by a longer one with her parents in the neighborhood of London, Mrs. Adams came to Washington in 1817, where her husband had been called as the principal member of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet. Eight years as Secretary of State, four in the White House, and fifty-one years the companion of her distinguished husband, Mrs. Adams has seen more of Court life, and that in every variety, from the boastful ostentations of Royalty to the simplicity of our own Republican habits, than perhaps any living woman.

The illness and death of Mr. A. seem to have quite overcome her, and twice while at the Capitol before his death, she fainted, and was borne to her own home. [Pittsburgh Gaz.

INFORMATION FOR THE STARVING.

Douglass Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper publishes a report of the speech of the Dean of Westminster, at the opening of the Ipswich Museum. The following paragraph from it contains a wonderful recipe, which we copy for the benefit of all whom it may concern. Surely this is a day of discoveries:—

"If the animal be cold or take exercise, he eats twice as much. If it should please God to cause a return of the visitation to which I have alluded, to those who can find no food, nature has given us examples, in what happens in hybernate animals. When cold comes on with scarcity of food, in woolly materials they sleep through the winter in their retreats. They are maintained in health, and again come forth very little wasted, and resume their natural functions when the sun of spring again calls them into activity. Now our laboring classes, many of them, practically carried out that principle. They felt it was in vain to be turbulent—that it was a condition not the result of their employers' proceedings—that it was a condition which it was their duty to tolerate with patient obedience; and thus, in the repose of their beds, and the warmth of their coverlets, they sought that comfort which maintained them in health, and that too on small, on infinitesimally small quantities of food. Why, had they come forth into rebellion, they would only have stimulated their stomachs to greater hunger, and periled their lives in the destruction of the property in the neighborhood. Now these are the political advantages that result from the education of the people."

LUXURIES OF THE OLDEN TIMES.

The table luxury of the Romans commenced about the period of the battle of Actium, and continued to the reign of Galba. Their delicacies consisted of peacocks, cranes of Malta, nightingales, venison, and wild and tame fowls. They were also fond of fish. The reigning taste was for a profusion of provisions; whole wild boars were served up, filled with various small animals and birds of different kinds. This dish was called the Trojan horse, in allusion to the horse filled with soldiers. Fowls and game of all sorts were served up in pyramids, piled up in dishes as broad as moderate tables. Mark Antony provided eight boars for twelve guests. Caligula served up to his guests pearls of great value, dissolved in vinegar. Lucullus had a particular name for each apartment, and a certain scale of expense attached to each. Cicero and Pompey agreed to take supper with him, provided he would order his servants not to prepare anything extraordinary. He directed the servants to prepare supper in the room of Apollo. His friends were surprised at the magnificence of the entertainment. He then informed them that when he mentioned the name of the room the servants knew the scale of expense. Whenever he supped in the room of Apollo, the supper always cost 6,240 dollars.—He was equally sumptuous in his dress. A Roman Prætor, who was to give games to the public, requesting to borrow one hundred purple robes for the actors, Lucullus replied that he could lend him two hundred if he wanted them. The Roman furniture in their houses corresponded with their profuseness in other respects. Pliny states that in his time more money was often given for a table, than the amount of all the treasures found in Carthage when it had been conquered by the Romans.

AFRICAN BRIDGES.

I proposed to swim myself and horse across, but this was opposed by the caboceer, on account of the rapidity of the stream. Besides, how were the officers' wives, who carried their baggage, and also my own carriages, to get across? For this purpose I proposed rafts to be made from branches of trees, cut into lengths and lashed together and passed across by a rope, formed from the long fibres which grow downwards from the branches of the large trees on this bank, resembling hundreds of ropes of various thicknesses. These extraordinary fibres are sometimes 30 and 40 feet long, according to the height of the branches from which they grow, and are extremely tough. They are pliable and of great strength. When they reach the ground they insert themselves some depth, and again take root, from which other trees spring upwards. They frequently form a colonade of considerable extent along the banks of the rivers, and resemble mangroves. My proposition was not approved of, and a council of officers being held, it was in a short time determined to adopt rather a novel method, which it may be interesting to describe. As I have already stated, large trees of a species which I have previously mentioned, grew on the banks on either side of this river. A number of small trees were cut, each of the private soldiers cutting with his short sabre, or knife, till a sufficient number were thus obtained. These poles, newly cut, were tied to the long fibres hanging perpendicularly from the branches of the larger trees, and were then attached in succession, horizontally till they reach the hanging fibres of the trees on the opposite bank. After having fixed two lines of poles across in the manner I have described, about one yard apart, short pieces of wood were cut and placed across, and small boughs, and grass or reeds, placed on the top, so that a suspension bridge was thus simply constructed in the short space of half an hour. The whole party then passed over in safety. I was informed in reply to a question, that this was by no means an invention of the Dahomans, but has long been practiced in Central Africa, especially in time of war, and where the rivers are not too wide floating bridges are also constructed in the same manner, where the above method cannot be adopted.

[Duncan's Travels in Africa.

A NEW "STRIPED PIG" MOVEMENT.

"Is the Cape Ann stage in?" inquired two gentlemen of the bar-keeper of a hotel in Portsmouth.

"Yes, sir," was the reply. "Two back seats, inside," said one of the gentlemen, and they both left the room. In a moment after, a single gentleman came in. "The Cape Ann stage in?" inquired he.

"Yes, sir," said the bar-keeper. "One back seat, inside," responded the gentleman, and went into the back room. In this way several entered, some engaging back seats inside, some two or three took front seats inside, and one man took an outside seat.

I remarked to the bar-keeper that there was a great deal of travel on the Cape Ann route, observing at the same time that it was a little strange that passengers should prefer a stage to the railroad; beside, how do you find so many back seats?

The bar-keeper looked shy, put his finger to his nose and winked. I was a little suspicious before, but at this manœuver I knew there was a mystery, and, determined to find it out, commenced questioning him. He looked wise, twisted himself a little and said, "Then you don't know the secret?" "No," said I, "but I have a great curiosity to do so." A gentleman who entered overheard the last of the conversation, and coming up to me, said, "Friend, I'll let you into the secret, but before I can do it you must engage a seat." "Very well," said I. He went up to the bar and inquired of me what seat I would take; I replied that the stage was pretty well filled inside, therefore I would prefer an outside. We went into the next room, where several were drinking, and sat down. Soon after a waiter came in, bearing a glass of brandy and water, and one of lemonade. The mystery was solved, the secret brought to light, and I was astonished.

So many back seats inside, were so many glasses of brandy and water (strong.) The front seats inside were so many glasses of gin and sugar. The two outside seats were two glasses of lemonade, one of which I was fortunate enough to choose.

Soon after this discovery, the travel on that route began to fail. The cold water folks broke it up entirely. [Emancipator.

Locust Groves.—Locust groves may be grown on very poor soil, averaging from $4 to $7 worth of timber per annum, per acre, and still yield as much grass for sheep as if no trees grew there; and all this time the land is becoming richer, rather than poorer. The reason of this is, that if the light sandy soil is not covered with shade trees, the grass, except during a very wet season, dries up and yields little. The trees keep the ground cool and moist, and the grass continues growing all summer. We are of opinion that if a top dressing of two or three bushels per acre of plaster of Paris were sown early in the spring, it would add considerably to the grass product. We have known instances of locust groves on Long Island growing up to be worth $300 per acre, within forty years. Nothing can exceed their beauty and comfort for sheep pastures. [Am. Agriculturist.

Advice of Counsel.—There is a well known custom prevailing in our criminal courts, of assigning counsel to such prisoners as have no one to defend them. On one occasion, the court finding a man accused of theft, and without counsel, said to a lawyer who was present—

"Mr. ——, please to withdraw with the prisoner, confer with him, and then give him such counsel as may be best for his interest."

The lawyer and his client then withdrew, and in 15 or 20 minutes the lawyer returned into Court.

"Where is the prisoner?" asked the Court.

"He is gone, your honor," said the hopeful legal limb. "Your honor told me to give him the best advice for his interest, and as he said he was guilty, I thought the best counsel I could offer him was to cut and run, which he took at once."

Substitute for Silk.—A letter from Leipsic, (Saxony,) of the 14th, says, "The owner of some spinning mills, at Berlin, has lately brought into the market a new species af flaxen thread, which is extremely long and silky, white in color, and spun and dyed with extraordinary facility. This primary material, which possesses, even in a superior degree, all the qualities of silk, is likely to compete with it, from its simple and rapid fabrication, and from its price being very low as compared with that of silk. The appearance of this new article of commerce has caused a great sensation among the dealers at the fair at Leipsic, and an Englishman has offered the inventor £20,000 for his secret, but this was refused, as the owner intends to reserve to himself all the benefits of his discovery.

VARIETY.

The Egyptians had a funereal tribunal, by which the dead were tried before they could be buried. After death, every Egyptian was brought before this tribunal, and, if convicted of having in his life acted unworthily, he was denied a place in the burial place of his ancestors. This was a great disgrace to his family; and, according to the Egyptian theology, it deprived the spirit of the deceased of an entrance into heaven. One of the things which caused the infliction of this mark of disgrace was that of dying in debt. If, however, the children or friends of the deceased should pay his debts, as they sometimes did, he was allowed to be buried.

The Scientific American says that a new description of vegetable manure has been received from Africa by Messrs. Keding & Hunt, of London, which is likely to become as important to the agricultural interest as guano. The article is called "Tremoco," or "Lupens," and it is said to be the richest vegetable manure discovered. It is sown the same as any other grain, and when tender, before or about blossoming, is dug up and spread on the land with earth, when it rots in two or three weeks, and the land becomes loose and rich for every agricultural purpose.

A Temperance Society has been formed in Portland, under the name of the "Telegraphic Spike Society." It was formed by two individuals, who, believing they had been in the habit of spending too much of their hard earnings for liquor, drove a spike into a post, and under a ten dollar obligation, agreed that the first one who should drink must draw out the spike with his teeth, or forfeit the above sum.

A Mr. Desehamps has recently addressed a letter to the Academy of Sciences, (Paris,) in which he asserts that he has discovered an infallible remedy for diseases of the lungs, even when tubercles have formed. He has forwarded his receipe, and sent security to the value of 70,000 francs, to be forfeited in case the efficacy of his remedy should not be established by experience.

So many cases of abandonment of native wives by foreigners, have occurred in the Sandwich Islands, that a law has been enacted obliging all who marry Hawaiin women to give a bond of $1000, and take an oath never to abandon their wives: or to take the oath of allegiance and bocome Hawaiian citizens.

There was a fire at Watertown, N. Y., on the 21st inst., by which the paper mill of Messrs. Knowlton & Rice, together with a number of other buildings, was destroyed. Estimated loss fifty thousand dollars. But the worst of all is, two men were burned to death.

An Irish gentleman being reduced to the necessity of obtaining a living by some employment was prevailed upon to sell mutton pies in the place he had ridden in his carriage. On his being compelled to cry out, "Hot mutton pies!" he shrugged up his shoulders and said, in a whisper, "I hope nobody hears me!"

Fifteen kingdoms, twenty-three, duchies, and eight republics, in Europe, have constitutional governments—in all forty-six governments, which have constitutions. At the epoch of the American Revolution, there were only seven republics and two monarchies, which had constitutions.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

JAMES R. IRISH, Principal.
AURELLA F. ROGERS, Preceptress.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners o[illegible]r students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

☞ Presuming that our readers would like to know what the Jews think of the recent decision against them in South Carolina, we copy the following article from "the Occident and American Jewish Advocate." Maj. Noah, an influential Jew of this city, has expressed the opinion that his brethren have no just cause to complain of the Sunday laws, but ought rather to be thankful for the measure of freedom which they now enjoy. We are glad to know that a portion of the Jews differ from him, and are not willing to receive as a gift the mere fraction of what belongs to them as a right.

SUNDAY LAWS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Review of Judge O'Neal's Opinion.

Every lover of religious toleration, nay, of true religion, as contradistinguished from fanatical bigotry, must mourn over the promulgation of such sentiments as are found in the opinion of Judge O'Neal, in the case of the City Council vs. Benjamin, and published in The Occident of March last. If, like Judge Wardlaw, he had confined his opinion to the naked legal question in the case, though we might have regretted the decision, we could take no exception to the grounds on which it was based, nor to the politico-religious sentiments expressed.

Judge O'Neal is unquestionably a fanatic, in the widest extent of the term, and I regret that the Court had not assigned to some other member the writing of its opinion. I believe him honest, but his ultraism evidently renders him an unsafe judge on all questions bearing directly or indirectly upon his own bigoted notions.

I deny that Christianity is a part of the Common Law as adopted by South Carolina, and I am sustained by reason, and by adjudicated cases, in South Carolina and elsewhere. The Common Law "is of force only so far as it is consistent with our Constitution, customs, and laws." State vs. Allen, 1 McCord's So. Ca. Rep., 525—531. The same doctrine is laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Girard's Will, 2 Howard's Supreme Court Rep. 127-198. Christianity then is only so far a part of the common law of this country, as it is modified by our free constitutions. The Constitution of the State of S. C. fixed this matter; and let us appeal to it. The 1st Sec. 8th Art. declares, "that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall for ever hereafter be allowed in this State to all mankind, provided that liberty of conscience thereby declared shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State." This is the supreme law of Carolina, and controls the common law of England; and I ask any unprejudiced man to say whether a law which creats a "discrimination or preference" in favor of any religious sect, by forcing an observance of its day of rest, is not in contravention of the above article of the Constitution? If a Jew can be compelled to close his store on Sunday, because it shocks "the moral sense of the community," why may he not be compelled, by a parity of reasoning, to attend some place of Christian worship, on that day? Why may he not be compelled to support a Christian ministry? The Jew may in vain hold up the Constitution of the country; Judge O'Neal will reply, 'That means "religious toleration"—you may worship God as you please—you may offer up your "evening sacrifice, and morning worship," but there is a "Christian construction" to this section of the Constitution, which guards us against "acts of licentiousness." It shocks my "moral sense" to see you, (though you do so noiselessly,) pursuing your daily avocations on Sundays. It is revolting to "Christian morality" to see you strolling about the streets in your every-day working dress. "By the security and protection given to you by our laws, you make great gain;" therefore it is but common justice that you should support that Christianity to which you are indebted for your toleration.' This is not stretching the argument of Judge O'Neal one tittle too far. He expressly places his decision on the ground that Christianity is a part of the common law of Carolina, and that the opening of a store on Sunday is an "act of licentiousness," because it shocks the "moral sense" of Christians. The true construction then is, that there should be no "discrimination," no "preference." If I am compelled to close my store on Sunday for the reason given, may I not also be bound to close my lips upon any of the dogmas of Christianity? If the opening of my store on Sunday is such an "act of licentiousness" as shocks the "moral sense" of Christians, I put it to Judge O'Neal, and ask him whether I would not much more shock that "moral sense," if I were to denounce the trinity, and the atonement, as blasphemous, and immoral? If such be the law, how do the Jews in this country stand? The country may be flooded with denunciations against the Jewish religion, and no principle of the law will be found to check the torrent of abuse, of slander, and of falsehood; whilst ample protection may be given to Christianity from any attack that would "shock the moral sense" of Christians. Is this no "discrimination," no "preference?" Under this rule of law, I suppose Judge O'Neal would, if on the Chancery Bench, grant an injunction to restrain the publication of the "Occident," on the ground that it was anti-Christian, and therefore contra bonos mores, and in violation of the law of the land.

But let us examine what are "acts of licentiousness" in the obvious meaning of the Constitution of South Carolina, and of the spirit of our institutions. Judge O'Neal has furnished us with his definition of these words, and let us test its truth. He deems the opening of a shop, a play-house, or circus, on Sunday, "acts of licentiousness." I will not pause to show this priestly judge that his strict observance of Sunday was unknown to the early Christians, nor that his quotation of Christ's words, "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," was ill made in a decision going to compel a strict observance of Sunday; for by reference to his New Testament, he will find that those words were used to justify Sabbath-breaking. But let us proceed. Is his definititon supported by the doctrine, and the practice, of the Christian world? Clearly not! The Catholics, constituting a majority of the Christian world, would deny a part of the definition; the Seventh-day Baptists would repudiate the whole; Sunday is no holy day, no day of rest to them. Again, when is Sunday to begin, and when to end? Here the Judge would find himself in opposition to a large body of Christians, whose day of rest ends with the setting sun of Sunday. Thus would the standard of "acts of licentiousness," of "Christian morality," be fixed, not "according to the measure of his Honor's foot," but by the people among whom he might be at the time of his decision. Now, I contend that no such rule can be a good one. "Acts of licentiousness," then, can only mean such acts as violate those eternal and immutable principles of morality, which have been revealed to mankind by God, through his prophets, or such as would shock the sense of propriety of all civilized men. The common-sense construction of the words, and cotemporaneous exposition, sustain my interpretation. The quotations made by Judge O'Neal from cotemporary writers, support this view of the question. My religion "must not disturb the peace, the happiness, or the safety of society." If, then, Judge O'Neal is right, that the 1st sec., 8th art., of the South Carolina Constitution only means "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship," what becomes of Carolina's boasted freedom? The Jew, in this sense, has religious toleration in many other countries, where he has not one privilege of a freeman. But this clause of the Constitution has a broader, a more liberal and enlightened meaning; it includes religious toleration, and excludes "discrimination" and "preference."

But I object to the whole tone of the decision, and the spirit in which it was written. The Judge, throughout, treats the Jews as though they were not his equals—his fellow-citizens.—He seems to regard them as inferiors, to whom Christian charity has granted the boon of toleration. He says, in so many words, "We say to him (the Jew), simply, respect us by ceasing on this day from the pursuit of that trade and business, in which you, by the security given to you, by our laws, make great gain." I protest against these terms, "you," "us," "our laws." Such language is unworthy of an American Judge, and in direct opposition to the spirit of our institutions. The Jew receives religious toleration in this country, not as a boon, but as a right. He stands upon the same platform as his Christian fellow-citizens, and breathes with him the pure air of American freedom, untainted by bigotry, tyranny, or intolerance.

But I have other objections to this opinion, and its dicta. He says, "What constitutes the standard of good morals? Is it not Christianity? There certainly is none other." This is rank blasphemy against the God of Heaven. God gave the Jew a religion, to fit him for time, to prepare him for eternity. He taught him, by His inspired prophets, his duty to his Maker and to his fellow-mortal. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy might: and thou shalt love the stranger, and thy neighbor as thyself." —Lev. xix. 18-34. He has taught us to "do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God." He gave us, amidst the thunders of Sinai, written with his own hand, those eternal "Commandments" before which all civilized nations bow down, and upon which every civilized code of laws is based. We have all this, and yet the Jew has no "standard of good morals!" I call upon Judge O'Neal to point out one moral precept in the Christian's New Testament, which is not found in the Bible of the Jews. Take from the Christian our moral law, our standard of morals, and he will, indeed, be enveloped in thick darkness. The zeal of this modern Apostle has led him astray, and I trust that his sense of propriety will induce him to make a public profession of his error. In conclusion, I may say, with perfect truth, that but for the obnoxious grounds on which the decision is based, and the blasphemous libel upon my religion, I should have remained silent.

AN HEBREW.

THE DIAMONDS OF THE EPHOD.

Dama was a jeweler at Ascalon, and distinguished by many virtues. One day the elders came to him to purchase precious stones, to ornament that part of the costume of the high priest which the Bible designates under the name of the Ephod. They explained the object of their visit, and offered him a reasonable price for the diamonds they desired. Dama replied he could not let them see any stones at that moment, and requested them to call again. Desirous of terminating their choice without delay, and fancying the reply of the jeweler was only a pretext to increase the value of his merchandise, the elders insisted on closing the business immediately. As some fine stones were absolutely necessary, and as Dama possessed those of the requisite quality, they doubled and tripled the price which they had first offered; but as Dama persisted in his refusal, and resisted their solicitations, they went away in very bad humor. Some hours afterwards, he placed before them the requisite diamonds, for which they tendered the price they had offered; but he said: "I will only accept the price which you first proposed to me this morning, for that is all the stones are worth." "Why, then, did you not close with us forthwith?" asked they, in astonishment. "When you came, my father had the key of the chest wherein the diamonds were inclosed, and, as the old man was then asleep, I should have been obliged to awake him, to satisfy your demands. At his age, a short hour of sleep does him a great deal of good; and, for all the gold in the world, I would not be wanting in respect to my father, or deprive him of a single enjoyment." The elders, affected by these feeling words, spread their hands on the hands of Dama, and said: "Thou shalt be blessed by Him who has said: 'Honor thy father, and thy mother;' and thy children shall one day pay thee the same respect and love thou hast displayed to the author of thy being." JERUSALEM.

BY WILLIAM SINCLAIR.

Thou city of the Lord, whose name
The angelic host in wonder tells!
The halo of whose endless fame
All earthly splendor far excels—
To thee from Judah's stable mean
Arose the Prince from Jesse's stem,
And since hath deathless glory been
With thee, Jerusalem!

What though thy temples, domes, and towers,
That man in strength and weakness made,
Are with their priests and regal powers
In lowly dust and ashes laid!
The story of thine ancient time
Steals on us, as it stole on them,
Thrice hallowed by the lyre sublime
Of thee, Jerusalem!

We see within thy porches, Paul
Uplift the arm, the voice command,
Whose heaven-taught zeal, whose earnest call,
Could rouse or paralyze the land—
Though gold and pomp were his, and more,
For God he spurned the glittering gem
And cast him prostrate all before
Thy gates, Jerusalem!

Even from the Mount of Olives now,
When morning lifts her shadowy veil,
And smiles o'er Moab's lofty brow,
And beauteous Jordan's stream and vale,
The ruins o'er the regions spread,
May witness of thine ancient fame,
The very grave-yards of thy dead—
Of thee, Jerusalem!

The temple in its gorgeous state,
That in a dreadful ruin fell,
The fortress and the golden gate
Alike the saddening story tell,
How He by Hinnom's vale was led
To Caipahas, with mocking shame,
That glad redemption might be shed
O'er thee, Jerusalem!

Fast by the Virgin's tomb, and by
Those spreading olives, bend the knee,
For here his pangs and sufferings
Thrilled through thy caves, Gethsemane,
'Twas here beneath the olive shade,
The Man of many sorrows came,
With tears, as never mortal shed,
For thee, Jerusalem!

Around Siloam's ancient tombs
A solemn grandeur still must be;
And O, what mystic meaning looms
By thy dread summits, Calvary!
The groaning earth, that felt the shock
Of mankind's crowning sin and shame,
Gave up the dead, laid bare the rock,
For fallen Jerusalem!

Kind woman's heart forgets thee not,
For Mary's image lights the scene;
And casting back the inquiring thought
To what thou art, what thou hast been,
Ah! well may pilgrims heave the sigh,
When they remember all thy fame,
And shed the tear regrettingly
O'er thee, Jerusalem!

Now awful desolation lies,
In heavy shades, o'er thee and thine,
As 't were to frown of sacrifice,
And tell thy story, Palestine;
And never was there darkness yet
Whereto His glory never came;
And guardian angels watch and wait
By thee, Jerusalem!

The lustre of thine ancient fame
Shall yet in brighter beams arise,
And heavenly measures to thy name.
Rejoice the earth, make glad the skies;
And, with thy gathered thousands then
O! Love and Peace shall dwell with them,
And God's own glory shine again
O'er thee, Jerusalem!

THE BROKEN PLEDGE.

"Join us in the pledge, Colonel, surely you will not refuse me," said a beautiful bride, emerging from a bevy of bridesmaids, and extending a glass of brimming champaign as she spoke.

The gentleman whom she addressed had studiously refrained, during the evening, from drinking of the costly wines prepared for the guests. But finding himself thus the object of general attention—for when the bride spoke every eye was upon him—he colored, stammered a few indistinct words, took the glass, and, bowing gracefully, drank long life and happiness to the bride.

"I told you I should succeed," said the young and happy creature, her eyes sparkling with triumph, as she retired into her circle of bridesmaids. I knew Colonel Warren would not refuse me. What a pity he has got such puritanical notions in his head. He used to be the foremost with a happy allusion or eloquent sentiment when the wine circulated."

No one was there to contradict this joyous but thoughtless creature, or to tell her that Colonel Warren's indulgence in wine had nearly proved his ruin. He had been absent from his native city for some years, during which period he had formed a resolution not to drink, in consequence of a conviction of his own weakness. On his return his old associates in vain persuaded him to alter his determination. On various festive occasions they had endeavored to induce him to join them in pledging each other, but his answer had always been the same. This was the first time since his return, that wine had been introduced into the presence of ladies. It was resolved to try whether the influence of the sex would not break a resolution which more than one felt to be a reproach on himself. How the scheme succeeded we have seen.

No pen can adequately describe the emotions of Colonel Warren during the instant he hesitated, before taking the proffered glass from the bride. He was chivalrous to a fault in his demeanor to the sex, and had never been known to refuse a favor to a woman. The bride was the daughter of his early friend, a cherished treasure, whom he had many a time dandled on his knee, and whom he had never done anything to slight or pain. He stood as we have seen, irresolute for a moment, hesitating between fears for the result, and a dislike to disoblige his favorite on this her wedding night. But at length he had fatally yielded.

Little did the young bride think of the dreadful issue of her tempting words and smile.—Little did she dream that the hankering love for wine, which had once reduced her victim to the verge of confirmed inebriacy, awoke again at the taste of that glass, and raged with more violence than ever. Young, happy and thoughtless, she looked only at the present triumph, without considering the result. How then was she surprised to hear a few months after her marriage, that Colonel Warren was becoming an inebriate—that he rarely retired to bed unless in a state of intoxication—and that, in consequence, his fine person was becoming disfigured, and his large fortune wasting away.—She shuddered, but still did not think of her own agency in the matter, and when she next met him, with the privilege of youth and beauty, she ventured to plead with him on the subject.

"Madam," said he in reply, and the melancholy and somewhat stern tone in which he spoke, never left her memory, "it is too late! I was once as I am now—I rallied and took a resolution never to drink again—I broke that resolution, you know how, and when, and now I am a hopeless inebriate."

He turned and left her presence. Her eyes were open. Oh! how bitterly did she reproach herself for having spoken those fatal words.—For nights she could not sleep. She sought again and again to see her victim, but he avoided her presence. They never met again but once. Reader, would you know how?

Some years after, on a cold, bleak morning in January, a traveling sleigh, drawn by two splendid horses, was dashing along the turnpike between Norristown and Philadelphia. There had been a snow-storm during the night, and the flakes lay piled against the fences and banks where they had been driven by the icy wind which swept down from the hills beyond the Schuylkill. The sky was still overcast; the wind yet raged violently, and it was intensely cold. Few scenes could be more desolate.—Houses, barns, trees and hay-ricks were covered with snow, and the cattle, cowering in the sheds, seemed every where to beseech the sky in vain. As the sleigh, with its merry bells, whirled down the long hill that leads to the Manayunk turnpike, the horses suddenly shied, nearly precipitating the vehicle into an opposite snow bank. A lady slightly screamed and looked out in alarm from the furs which enveloped her; but seeing no cause for danger, she was about to order the driver to proceed, when her little boy, pointing to the object which had startled the horses, said—

"Mother, what can that be in the road? Surely it is a man's hat!"

The lady turned. In the centre of the highway was a drifted snow pile a little longer than a human body. One end of the pile had been blown away, disclosing, as the boy said, a man's hat.

"Gracious heavens!" she exclaimed, "can it be that some poor wretch has frozen to death here? James," said she, turning to the footman, "go and see."

With intense interest the lady watched while the servant brushed away the snow. In a few seconds, it was apparent that a corpse was indeed there, and it was not long before the cause of the man's death was evident in an empty jug beside him. The spectators breathlessly awaited while the icy flakes were being removed from the face, for the lady was within a short distance of her home, and thought that, perhaps she might recognize the being. She stepped out of the sleigh, and approached the corpse.

"Colonel Warren!" she said, becoming hastily pale and staggering: "Colonel Warren dying thus, a common drunkard! Oh! just Heaven, this is too much!"

And thus the victim and his destroyer met for the last time. It was the once thoughtless bride who now stood above the corpse.

LUTHER AND CALVIN.

The review of Mr. Giles, for the Christian Examiner, exhibits a contrast between Luther and Calvin, so striking and beautiful, as to command the admiration of every intelligent reader. We make room for the following two paragraphs:—

Born as Luther and Calvin were for the same age, and in it, yet their characters stand in very striking opposition. Luther was made for the forum; Calvin for the cloister. Luther was the greatest orator of the reformation; but Calvin was the greatest thinker. Luther was a man of indomitable energy; Calvin was a man of profound meditation. Luther was a man of impulse; Calvin was a man of logic. Luther was a man of action; Calvin was a man of dogma. Luther communicated his glowing passions to the living multitude; Calvin wrote his creed on the intellect with a pen of fire, and the intellect into which he had burned his opinions retained the marks of them forever. Indicating, as we are, the oppositions of the individuals, we should not disregard the further modification of this opposition by the difference of nationality. The mind of Calvin was eminently French; it was precise and definite, with the tendency that characterizes that mind in general, to reduce all thoughts and things to a system, added to a hard consistency, all his own, which carried logical extremes into practical results.

Luther's mind, on the other hand, was thoroughly German—deep, thoughtful, many-sided, and capacious; prolific in imagination, and ample in discourse of reason; not arrayed with ornament artfully disposed, but rich in native beauty; crowded with ideas, not marshaled and set in order, but mingling as a throng of worshipers in a mediæval church—the great with the low, the noble with the mean, where pictures of saintly loveliness were near to others grotesque, laughable, and odd—yet where the soul melted into harmony in the softness of a dim, religious light; a mind more full than exact; not so much analytical as poetic; melancholy and mystical withal; given to see visions and dream dreams; partaking of the superstition which often haunts the greatest souls, the second sight that sees more things in heaven and in earth than technical philosophy conceives of, or will allow, yet that has, in its apparent folly, glimpses of eternal truth, to which the utmost wisdom of sensualism is obtuse and blind. If we dared to contrast the minds of Calvin and Luther by visible similitudes, we should find the likeness of Calvin's in the regularity and method of a modern post office; and that of Luther in the massive and sublime complexity of an ancient cathedral.

RELIGION IN PALACES.

It is related that when the late Duke of Kent was expressing concern about the state of his soul in the prospect of death, his physician endeavored to soothe his mind by referring to his high station, and his honorable conduct in the distinguished situation in which Providence had placed him—and that the Duke stopped him short by saying, "No; remember, if I am saved, it is not as a prince, but as a sinner." On asking his physician if he were accustomed to pray. The latter replied, "Please your royal highness, I hope I say my prayers; but shall I bring a prayer book?" "No," was the answer; "what I mean is, that if you are accustomed to pray for yourself, you could pray for me in my present situation." The doctor then asked if he should call the duchess. "Do," said the prince; the duchess came and offered up a most affecting prayer in behalf of her beloved husband. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." "How hardly," says He who cannot err, "shall they who have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven—with men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." The Countess of Huntington used to say, she was thankful for the letter M in the word many in the passage above-quoted; if that had been left out, she should have been excluded from heaven.

LOSS OF "THIRDLY."

The Rev. Mr. ——, minister of ——, had the custom of writing the heads of his discourse on small slips of paper, which he placed on the Bible before him, to be used in succession. One day, when he was explaining the second head, he got a little warm, and came down with such a thump upon the Bible with his hand, that the ensuing slip fell over the edge of the pulpit, though unperceived by himself. On reaching the end of the second head, he looked down for the third slip, but, alas! it was not to be found. "Thirdly," he cried, looking around with great anxiety. After a little pause, "Thirdly," again he exclaimed, but still no Thirdly appeared. "Thirdly, I say, my brethren," pursued the bewildered clergyman, but not another word could he utter. At this point, where the congregation were partly sympathizing with his distress, and partly rejoicing at such a decisive instance of the impropriety of using notes in preaching, which had always been an unpopular thing in the Scotch clergy, an old woman rose up and thus addressed the preacher:—"If I'm not mistaken, sir, I saw Thirdly fly out at the east window, a quarter of an hour syne." It is impossible for any but a Scotchman to conceive how much this account of the loss of Thirdly was relished by that part of the congregation which condemned the use of notes. [Chambers.

WORKING LIKE A FOOL TO PLEASE FOOLS.

The late Rev. Samuel Lowell, of Bristol, being once at Brighton, expressed a wish to walk on the Steyne, and to have the public characters pointed out to him. Amongst the rest, a celebrated comedian was noticed. "Ah," said Mr. L. "is that ——, my old school-fellow? I'll speak to him." He accosted him, and the following conversation took place.

Lowell. Sir, I believe I have the pleasure of addressing Mr. ——.

Player. Yes, sir, my name is ——; but I have not the pleasure of being acquainted with you.

L. What, Samuel Lowell?

P. What! are you Samuel Lowell?

L. Yes, I am.

P. Well, I am very glad to see you, now tell me your history in five minutes.

L. First, my name is Samuel Lowell; I am a dissenting minister at Bristol, where I have lived upwards of twenty years; I have a large family.

P. So, you are a dissenting minister; well, you are a happy man, for you go to your work with pleasure, and perform it with pleasure; you are a happy man. I go to my work like a fool, to please fools; I am not a happy man.

THANK GOD FOR YOUR REASON.—An individual, as he was passing along the streets of London, was accosted by a stranger with the question, "Did you ever thank God for the use of your reason?" "No," was the reply, "I never thought of it." "Well, do it quickly," rejoined the stranger, "for I have lost mine." For years after reading the account of the above occurence, we have no recollection of ever kneeling in prayer without rendering distinct and express thanks to the Father of mercies for the continued possession of this inestimable blessing. Reader, suppose that you should be accosted by some spirit from that world on which hope never dawns with the question, "Did you ever render suitable thanks to God, that you are not all that I am?"—what would be your reply? And with what feelings, so you should subsequently "bow the knee to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," would you express the grateful remembrance of the fact, that you are not lost?

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 13, 1848.

COMPULSORY SABBATIZING IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Last week we had the pleasure of publishing a report adopted by the Senate of Massachusetts, in which the opinion was expressed, that penal laws to prevent traveling on Sunday are not only impolitic, but liable to be abused for the oppression of upright and conscientious men. This week we are sorry to have occasoin to publish a very different report, upon a kindred subject, adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania. The following is the report as it appeared in the Philadelphia North American:—

Mr. Redick, from the Committee on Vice and Immorality, to whom was referred a petition from inhabitants of Chester and Lancaster Counties, asking for certain changes in the law relating to the Sabbath, reported:

That they have given the subject that careful consideration which its importance demands, and are of opinion, that the petitioners mistake the character and bearing of the laws relating to the Sabbath. That while we agree with the petitioners that it is not within the power of legislative bodies to enact penal laws compelling the observance of religious ceremonies, and also agree that such laws are contrary to the spirit of the Constitution of the State, and a gross violation of the rights of conscience, we cannot see that the laws relating to the Sabbath partake in the slightest degree of that character. Nor can the law which sets apart one day in seven for man to rest from his weekly labor and worship his Creator, be a violation of the rights of conscience, inasmuch as that express portion of time was divinely imposed, and made perpetual in its obligations by the Creator, who placed the conscience in every man as His vicegerent, to reprove or else excuse in things pertaining to morality, and who also made the Sabbath for man. The Committee believe, moreover, that to grant the request of the petitioners, "leaving all persons at liberty to observe such days as may seem to them best," would be in effect to abolish the Sabbath; without the privileges of which that knowledge and virtue cannot be diffused which is necessary to the purity and permanency of our free institutions, which might well cause every enlightened patriot, and especially every Christian, to tremble.

The laboring portion of the community would also be deprived of those waymarks of their lives which many can look back upon, and forward to, with delight, being weekly refreshed thereby, are thus cheered on through life, who, were it abolished, might be doomed to toil on in perpetual gloom, dragging out a miserable life of ignorance and vice, comparatively shortened for want of those periods of rest so wisely arranged by our Creator, who knew the wants of the human frame. The Committee believe, that as ours is emphatically a Christian Commonwealth, there can be no difficulty in fixing the day in which it shall not be lawful to disturb the devotion, moral instruction, and rest of the people, by unnecessary secular business, inasmuch as the resurrection of the great Founder of our Christian religion is the event commemorated by the observance of the first day, and the command requiring a specific day of the week is a positive precept.

The change of the day from the seventh to the first does not interfere with its unchangeable obligations, but is a most appropriate commemoration of that event, which, together with the example of the Apostles and early Christians, and the countenance of the Redeemer after his resurrection, has fixed the Lord's day to be the Christian Sabbath beyond a doubt. The committee feel satisfied that it is the duty of the civil magistrate to enforce a cessation from all secular employment, amusements, and public vices, on that day, with suitable penalties; but as regards the observance of religious ceremonies, that belongs to the conscience, and is beyond the jurisdiction of the civil laws. The committee further believe that there can be no loss to temporal pursuits from the rest of man and beast on the Sabbath day. We know that any spring which is continued long on a strain loses much of its elasticity; much more so is it with animal nature; when it is deprived of its proper time of rest, it loses its capability of endurance. This familiar principle is equally applicable to man and beast. As the committee can see no possible benefit that could accrue, but incalculable injury and wrong, therefore,

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient and would be wrong to grant the request of the petitioners, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

And on motion, the said resolution was read the second time, considered and adopted.

Here, then, we have one branch of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in favor of enforcing by civil penalties a cessation of all "secular employments" on Sunday. The process of reasoning, or rather of assertion, by which the Committee endeavor to justify this position, is somewhat note-worthy. They tell us, that "the law which sets apart one day in seven for man to rest from his weekly labor and worship his Creator," can not be "a violation of the rights of conscience, inasmuch as that express portion of time was divinely imposed and made perpetual in its obligations." But what has this to do with the case in hand? Just nothing at all. Among the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, there is a great diversity of opinion in regard to the Sabbath—some believing that the first day of the week is the Sabbath; others that "the seventh day is the Sabbath;" and others that no one day of the seven ought to be exclusively devoted to sabbatical purposes. All these persons are acknowledged to be conscientious in their opinions, and therefore entitled to the protection of the civil authorities. But the authorities, instead of protecting each in the exercise of his own opinion, have declared by law that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, and that the man who works on that day shall be fined or imprisoned. Now it is proposed, either to abolish this law entirely, of so modify it as not to apply to persons who are conscientiously opposed to sabbatizing on the first day. To tell the persons who petition for such an object, that their rights of conscience are not violated, inasmuch as God commands them to rest one day in seven, is to talk nonsense. Is the fact that God commands a man to rest one day in seven, any reason why the Legislature should command him to rest on the first day of the week? Every man who understands himself will say, No. Then, of course, this plea of the Committee amounts to nothing.

Again, they tell us that "to grant the request of the petitioners, leaving all persons to observe such days as may seem to them best, would be in effect to abolish the Sabbath." Would it, indeed? Did the abolition of the old statutes by which every man in this country was formerly taxed for the support of religion, amount to the same as abolishing religion? Has the experiment of leaving every man to do "as may seem to him best" about being baptized and joining the church, led to the abolition of baptism and the church? Far otherwise, although such results were predicted by the opponents of reform in old times. There is no reason to fear for the result of abolishing the Sunday laws. We believe it would not only relieve burdened consciences, but lead to a more thorough investigation of the whole subject of sabbatizing, and perhaps to the rejection of many hurtful errors, as well as the reception of some wholesome truths.

The notion that to abolish the Sunday laws would deprive the laboring man of a day of weekly rest, is about as preposterous as the notion that their abolition would be equivalent to abolishing the Sabbath. No such consequences necessarily follow. And it is surprising that the idea is so often suggested by a class of persons who frequently talk about the Sunday laws as a dead letter on the statute book, and tell us also what a strong hold the Sabbath has upon the affections of the people.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

The recent revolutionary movement in France, by which a powerful Monarchy has been overthrown, and a Republic established in its place, finds a hearty response in this country generally. A few timid souls, it is true, are troubled with fears that the people of France are not prepared for a Republic. But the great majority think they are as well prepared for it as they ever could be under the blighting influence of a Monarchy. Hence they do not hesitate to express their joy in view of the movement, and their confidence of its ultimate success.

There are several features of this movement, which distinguish it from most other revolutions, and augur well for the future. The moderation and forbearance of the people is particularly note-worthy. Louis Philippe, although elected by the citizens and called the Citizen-King, had evidently forgotten the source of his power; and instead of living to improve the condition of his subjects, his great business for a long time past seems to have been to enrich himself and establish his family. He has increased the standing army, strengthened the national defences, circumscribed popular rights, and opposed the spirit of reform. His last mad effort to prevent the Reform Banquet, roused the indignation of the people, and led to his overthrow. But even then he was not made the object of popular indignation. A sentiment of pity for the 'poor old king' seems to have pervaded the people, and they therefore suffered him and his family to escape without molestation. The same course was pursued to a great extent towards all others connected with the unpopular government.

Another note-worthy feature of this movement, is the general respect shown for public and private property. Amid all the confusion and excitement incident to such a scene as the three days' struggle, there was but little pillaging, and few brutal excesses. The summary punishment inflicted on a man found stealing at the sacking of the Palais Royal, will show the popular feeling. He was caught purloining some silver spoons. "You are not of us," said those about him; "you are a thief; kneel down." He was pierced with five balls, and his body, labeled "Thief," was left as an example to others. The public carriages were overthrown to form barricades; the noble trees that adorned the Boulevards were cut down; but the vehicles of private persons were unmolested, and the scaffolding, the property of individuals, was left untouched.

The measures adopted by the Provisional Government since its establishment, are of an encouraging character. One of its first acts was to decree the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the French Colonies—an act which puts to shame the boasted republicanism of our own country with her three millions of slaves. This act was followed by many others which show a sincere regard for human rights, and a disposition to improve the condition of the laboring classes. In view of such circumstances, we look hopefully for the developments of the future. That there will be many and serious difficulties to encounter, it is but reasonable to expect. Still these difficulties may be overcome, and will be, if the spirit already manifested continues to pervade the movement. It is impossible to predict what will be its influence upon Europe. Let the Christian hope and pray that it may tend to weaken the influence of formal religious systems, and introduce the day of freedom and spirituality.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS.—The missionary efforts of the United Brethren or Moravians in Great Britain, are particularly interesting, as showing what can be done by a small denomination when devoted to the work. It seems, from the Dissenter's Almanac, that they have in England only some two thousand communicants; about one in every twenty-five of their active and talented members being sent out as missionaries. They have 42 missionaries in the three Danish West India Islands, having under their instruction 9,570 negroes; in Jamaica they have 35 missionaries, instructing 13,782 negroes; in Antigua, 27 missionaries, and under their care 10,022 negroes; in St. Kitts, 10 missionaries, and 3,911 negroes; among the Greenlanders, 24 missionaries, instructing 1,878 persons; in Labrador, 30 missionaries, and 1,167 Esquimaux Indians; North America, 10 missionaries, among the Delaware and Cherokee Indians; in Surinam, S. A., 41 missionaries, laboring among 11,442 negroes; in South Africa, 47 missionaries, laboring among the Hottentots, Tambookies and Fingoes. They are about to establish missions, also, in the Caffre country, S. A., among the Indians on the Musquito Shore, and in New Holland. Total number of missionaries, 282, converts, 64,268.

DECREASE OF THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS.—A gradual decrease for several years past of candidates for the ministry in the Old School Presbyterian Church, is noticed with some expressions of alarm, by the Presbyterian Treasury. In 1844, there were 364 students, in the various stages of education, preparing for the ministry of that church; in 1846 there were but 339. In the same time, there was a diminution of new candidates from 99 to 67. To show the relative deficiency, the Treasury remarks that the Free Church of Scotland, with about seven hundred ministers and eight hundred congregations, has nearly as many theological students as the Old School Church, which has seventeen hundred ministers and twenty-four hundred congregations. A like decrease is asserted of the graduates of the Congregational and New School Seminaries. In 1843, there were 177 graduates from these institutions, and in 1846 only 150.

A RARE BOOK.—A princely bequest has been made to the British Museum by the Hon. Thos. Granville, of London, lately deceased. It consists of a rare and valuable collection of books, exceeding twenty thousand volumes, and valued at £100,000. Among them is a copy of the Biblia Sacra Latina, on vellum, the first book printed with moveable types. It was printed at Mentz, in 1455, by Guttenburg and Faust. This edition is called the Mazarin Bible, on account of a copy having been found in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. This is so rare that but four copies in vellum and fourteen on paper are known to exist, nearly all of which are in public libraries.

PROTESTANTISM AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—Mr. Carr, the American Ambassador at Constantinople, as reported by the missionaries of the American Board, January 7, had procured a Vizirial letter from the Porte, ordering the Pasha of Trebizond to see that the Protestants of that place be permitted to have a burial-ground of their own. He has also complained of the expulsion of Mr. Johnston from 'Aintab; and, in consequence, a somewhat severe letter has been sent to the Pasha of Aleppo, for the Governor of 'Aintab, which will probably prevent any repetition of the offence. Two members were added to the church on the 6th, making the whole number one hundred.

MADISON UNIVERSITY.—A bill has passed the Assembly of the State of New York, authorizing the removal of Madison University, now located at Hamilton, to Rochester, Syracuse, or Utica, provided that the citizens of Madison County do not raise fifty thousand dollars for its endowment previous to the second Monday in June next. It is probable that a vigorous effort will be made to raise the money necessary to retain the institution in its present location, but there is much reason to doubt its being done. If it should be done, it is said that the Baptists in Western New York intend to endow an institution in that section.

TRIUMPH OF LIBERTY AND LAW.—The Editor of the N. Y. Tribune learns by a letter from Lexington, Ky., that a verdict has just been rendered in the State Circuit Court, sitting at that place, of $2,500 and costs, in favor of Cassius M. Clay, against some of those who combined to take down and send off the printing office of his True American in 1845. This is, probably, the death-blow of mob law in Kentucky. Rejoice, advocates of Universal Liberty! Your triumphs are not confined to one hemisphere.—They irradiate the deepest darkness of despotism, alike in the New and Old World.

BAPTISTS IN ENGLAND.—The Baptists have in England 1,881 churches; their net increase during the year 1846 was 2,183; the average number of church members was about 112 in each church, which would give a total of about 209,672 church members. They have, besides their regular churches, about 756 village stations. Their Sunday-school scholars amount to 93,435. They have 249 missionary stations and sub-stations; and a total of members in their missionary churches of about 36,463. The total receipts of the denomination for missionary purposes during the year are set down at £28,223.

MR. ABBOTT IN ARRACAN.

The Macedonian for March says that Mr. Abbott, the Baptist missionary to Arracan, arrived at his station in less than three months from the time of his embarkation, having been eleven days in traveling from Boston to Liverpool, forty-four from England to Calcutta, and eleven from Calcutta to Arracan. The following is an extract from his letter:—

"I walked up to the mission house, and saw Br. Ingalls in his verandah. When I stopped before him, he looked me in the face and coolly said, 'Good evening, Sir.' 'Well,' said I, and he cried out, 'Why Br. Abbott!' We mingled our sympathies and our tears. Our hearts ran together like two drops of water. We had drank deeply in the same bitter cup. Our wives and our little ones, where were they? Our communings, though mournful and sad, were sweet and salutary. He has his only surviving child with him, a daughter four years old. Dear motherless babe! How my heart yearned over that child, and what reason I have to praise God that my own children are in the hands of one who loves and watches over them as their own mother. Br. Ingalls and I sailed together on this journey twelve years ago, and formed for each other an enduring friendship, and Mrs. Ingalls and Mrs. Abbott loved each other tenderly. Eight years ago our wives were with us, and we full of hope. But how changed our circumstances, and how striking the resemblance of our experience! No wonder he should hail my coming with joy, left on this great mission field alone, notwithstanding his stirring appeals. With his eyes filled with tears, though he seldom weeps, he said, 'Br. Abbott, it is as cruel as the grave,' and my own heart yields its concurrence. I am now awaiting the arrival of Br. Beecher, expected in a few days. I am getting native boats to take us to Sandoway."

REVIVALS AND FOREIGN MISSIONS.—A letter from Rev. Mr. Dean, the Baptist missionary at Hong Kong, China, contains some very appropriate and timely suggestions respecting the influence of revivals upon the work of foreign missions. The following paragraph in relation to the duty of young converts, presents a great truth, which we would gladly see impressed upon every mind:—

"I truly rejoice in the accessions to your church, and the increasing interest of sacred things among you. Every true convert to Christianity is an achievement of grace, an accession to the missionary society—an actual admission to a 'Life Membership of the Union,' and an augmentation of the means and agencies for giving the gospel to the world. I rejoice with angels over sinners who repent, and I rejoice for the heathen at the multiplication of servants to Christ who are to publish his truth by rejoicing in the increase of your flock and the piety of your people."

RELIGION IN BUENOS AYRES.—The Methodist Missionary to Buenos Ayres, Rev. D. D. Lore, writes to the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser in the following strain:—

"I find the congregation much larger than I expected. In respectability and intelligence it would not suffer by comparison with most in New York. There are but few church members, but the congregation generally take a deep interest in church affairs. We have an unusually fine Sunday-school, quite large, and exceedingly well conducted. Our prayer meetings are well attended, and a pure spirit of devotion characterizes them. The chapel is a neat building, well finished and furnished. Our singing is very good. There are three more Protestant churches here, Scotch, German, and English; but ours, I apprehend, is the most prosperous. It has the largest congregation, the largest Sunday school, and, I believe, the most spirituality. With the city I am much pleased, although it lacks the life-like appearance of an American city. Possibly it does not appear to advantage owing to the protracted blockade."

HEATHENISM IN AMERICA.—"On the borders of this county," writes on Alabama corporteur, "the destitution of Bibles, religious books, and the means of grace, is truly appalling. In one neighborhood, of 31 families, 22 were found without a Bible. In another settlement of 16 families, only three Bibles could be discovered; one woman, with a large family, did not know that such a book existed! The valley in which these people live, is about 30 miles long, and is entirely destitute of places of religious worship and school-houses! In this region I supplied 200 families with Bibles, and the books and tracts of your Society."

PROTESTANT MISSIONS.—A tabular statement in the Foreign Missionary Chronicle for January, gives the whole number of foreign missionaries as follows:—North American Indians, 105; Africa, 239; Western Asia, 31; India, 324; Burmah, Siam, 33; China, 44; South Sea Islands, 110; West Indies, 324; Greenland, 30; the Jews, 57; total 1,345. Total assistant missionaries, 233; native assistants, 1,958; communicants, 174,426; scholars, 122,542.

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.—The whale-ship Abraham H. Howland, from the Sandwich Islands, arrived at New Bedford recently, having on board the following missionaries as passengers: Rev. R. C. Forbes, lady and 4 children; Mrs. and Miss Dibble and 3 children, and Master Emerson; all of the American Board of Missions.

THE ANGLO-SAXON.—The office of the Anglo-Saxon, a phonotypic newspaper published in New York, was recently robbed of its account books, list of Subscribers, &c. The proprietors request all Subscribers to inform them immediately to what number their subscriptions extend, that the paper may be sent accordingly.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

We find but little to report in the proceedings of Congress last week. The announcement of the death of Hon. James H. Black, member of the House of Representatives from South Carolina, was made on Tuesday, and his funeral was attended by both houses on Wednesday. The principal discussion in the Senate was upon the resolution offered by Mr. Allen, tendering the congratulations of Congress to the French people in view of the recent revolution. After much debate, the resolution was passed just before adjournment on Thursday evening. A similar resolution was under consideration in the House of Representatives. A message was received by the Senate, from the President, communicating a copy of the official dispatch received by the steamer Washington from the American Ambassador in France. The dispatch contained an announcement of the events of the revolution, the overthrow of the monarchy of Louis Philippe, and the establishment of the French Republic. The message of the President expressed his perfect approval of the conduct of the Ambassador in his prompt recognition of the Provisional Government, such a recognition being, in the judgment of the President, only what was due from the United States to the new member of the family of Republics.

ANTI-SECTARIANISM.—A church of colored people, in Troy, N. Y., of which Henry H. Garnet is pastor, has recently issued the following anti-sectarian manifesto. We hope they will not furnish another illustration of a very common opinion, that the bitterest sectarians are to be found among the denouncers of sectarianism:—

"The body of Christians formerly known as the 'Liberty-street Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y.,' unanimously passed the following resolutions on Sunday evening, March 5.

"Whereas, Sectarianism is at variance with the spirit and the letter of the Gospel—and is the foundation of all ecclesiastical oppression, and is a most prolific source of wars, and slavery, and many other oppressions that afflict the world—therefore, Resolved, That the members of Christ's body, heretofore denominated 'The Liberty-street Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y.,' do hereby solemnly repudiate all Sectarianism, sincerely regretting, before God and men, that we ever gave countenance to that destructive device of Satan.

"Resolved, That we shall hereafter be known as 'The Church in Liberty-street, Troy, N. Y.,' and that we shall acknowledge no other creed than the Bible, and no other Head than God and his son Jesus Christ.

"Resolved, That God has but one Church on the Earth, and that it is composed of all such as love Him, and keep His commandments; and that these, in their Church relations, are equal in rights and liberty.

"Signed by HENRY H. GARNET."

"FATE OF INFIDELITY."—Such is the title of a book, recently published in this city, from the pen of a converted infidel. In noticing it, the editor of the New York Tribune says:—

"But there is another leading feature of this volume which seems to us more legitimate and effective. It is that which traces the history of the individuals who once formed an Infidel Society in Orange County, and shows that nearly all of them came to deaths not merely of violence, but of imfamy and guilt. In like manner the lives and characters of those who have been conspicuous as advocates of infidelity, in the city and elsewhere, are traced, and the conclusion drawn—we think with no little justice—that Scepticism has not generally tended to render its votaries temperate, philanthropic, moral, or prosperous. We make some abatement from the writer's statements, and still it seems that he has made out a pretty strong case. There are corrupt men of all faiths or professions; but we never yet heard of a case in which a decided majority of a Christian Church perished miserably as thieves, burglars, debauchees and murderers. We remember a remark of Robert Owen, himself a sceptic and an honest, benevolent man, that he thought a majority of those calling themselves Infidels, were among the worst men he knew. This little volume affords much confirmation of that judgment, and some good hints for tracing the effect to its cause."

COINCIDENCES.—A London paper notes as remarkable a series of coincidences between the Parisian revolutions of 1830 and 1848. It was Sunday, July 25, 1830, that the Ministers of Charles X. resolved upon the fatal ordinances which brought on the outbreak; it was on Sunday, February 20, that the Cabinet of Louis Philippe resolved to forbid the Reform Banquet. It was on Monday, July 26, 1830, that the journalists of Paris began to excite the people; it was on Monday, the 21st of February, 1848, that the Opposition in the Chamber of Deputies protested against the resolution of the Ministers. On Tuesday, July 27, the Revolution of 1830 began—ending on Thursday the 29th; on Tuesday, February 22, the Revolution of 1848 began, and it also ended on Thursday, when Louis Philippe abdicated.

THE BONAPARTE FAMILY.—The only surviving brother of the late Emperor Napoleon, Jerome, is, we believe, now in France, having asked leave of Louis Philippe, some time since, to reside in the kingdom. He will be remembered as having married Miss Patterson of Baltimore, about 1803, and by that lady he left a son, now, we believe, living in Maryland. Jerome repudiated his wife, by direction of his brother, and afterwards married a German Princess.—He was for some time King of Westphalia.

Louis Napoleon, son of the late King of Holland, Louis Bonaparte, and Hortense, daughter of Josephine, lately escaped from prison in France, and has now returned there from England, on hearing of the Revolution.

The Editor of the London Universe says—"We have a strong impression, that Dr. Hampden's case has kindled a flame in England, which, by God's blessing, will never be extinguished."

General Intelligence.

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Washington arrived at New York on Friday last, in 17 days, bringing ten days later intelligence from Europe. Things do not look sunny in Europe, but still it is hoped that quiet will soon be restored.

France.

The news from France is of course first in importance. Commercial distress is the most prominent fact of all; at least it is the one on which the English journals dwell most. And indeed the state of the country in this respect is as deplorable as can well be described. The reckless, profligate expenditure of the government of Louis Philippe has in the present crisis brought the greatest embarrassment upon the whole country, and will seriously trouble the new administration. As appears from the report of Garnier Pages, Minister of Finance, the deficit for the year 1848 is estimated at 8,000,000f., independent of supplementary and extraordinary credits, which raise the total deficit created by the late government to 652,525,000f.

Some trouble had arisen among the National Guards, in consequence of a misunderstanding as to the manner of electing officers, but all had been put to rest again.

A dispatch from Berlin announces that the Emperor of Russia accepts the policy of non-intervention in the affairs of France, as long as France abstains from aggressions.

Count d'Appony, the Austrian Ambassador at Paris, has received orders from Vienna to remain in Paris, and to assure the Provisional Government that it was not the intention of Austria to interfere in the affairs of France.

The Moniteur publishes a decree of the Committee for the organization of labor, fixing the duration of the day's work in the departments at eleven hours.

Great excitement has been produced at Lyons, by the mayor of one of the quarters having gone, with a party of 20 men, and put his seals on the house of the Capucines, who for several years have done the duty of the expiatory chapel raised to the memory of the victims of the siege of Lyons, at the epoch of the Convention.

M. Emmanuel Arago, Commissary of the Provincial Government in Lyons, had issued a decree dissolving all religious congregations and corporations not authorized by law, and particularly the congregation of the Jesuits.

Austria.

At Vienna there has been much excitement and some bloodshed. A petition was got up by the Students of the University, in favor of the unlimited freedom of the press. When on their way in procession to present it to the Emperor, they were met by a body of soldiers, who fired upon them, killing twenty persons, and wounding nearly ten times that number. This was followed by several collisions between the soldiers and the people. The trouble was finally quieted by his Majesty's granting full liberty of the press, a more extensive representative Constitution, publicity of all proceedings in the courts of law, trial by jury, and the dismission of the Metternich Cabinet.

Prussia.

At Berlin, the people and the military came in collision on the 14th of March, the students taking part with the people, and leading them on. Ten were killed, and upwards of one hundred wounded. On the 16th the King granted the institution of a Burgher Guard, and granted the petition for the abolition of the censorship of the press. The latest advices bear date of the 17th. The disturbances had somewhat subsided; the troops remained firm to the King, who seemed disposed not to grant all the people demand.

Miscellaneous.

On the 8th the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha published a proclamation, in which he promises his subjects a constitution and abolishes the censorship.

A letter from Leipsic of the 9th relates, that deputations of six towns have presented petitions to the King of Saxony, demanding the liberty of the press and other reforms.

A peasant's war has broken out in Germany. The horizon is red in many parts from incendiary fires. The Castles of Niederstetten, Ochringen, two signorial residences of the Princes of Hohenlohe, have been burnt to the ground.—Also the Castle of Jaxthausen and the village attached to it, the Castle of Assumstadt, and the Castle of Schwaiggern.

In Ireland great excitement prevails in consequence of proposed demonstrations of sympathy with the French. Two British steamships, with ammunition and men, have been ordered to Ireland.

In England, the much-talked-of Income-Tax has passed, and so there will be no change of Ministers at present. The Queen gave birth to a Princess on the 18th of March.

Four Days Later.—The steamer Hibernia arrived at New York on Sunday night, bringing news four days later. There is nothing of special importance in relation to France. The Provisional Government was working hard to conquer the difficulties which surround it, and there was much to encourage them. The elections were to take place on the 9th of April.—Italian papers of the 18th ult. contain a formal proclamation of the new Roman Fundamental Constitution by His Holiness Pope Pius IX. The disturbances at Berlin continued for several days, and much blood was shed; but peace had been restored by the concessions of the King. There has been some disturbances in Bohemia and Hanover, although not very serious. The Emperor of Russia has commanded the immediate organization of all his military reserves. Many merchants and bankers, in different parts of Europe, have failed within a short time.

The following is the amount of duties paid at the Boston Custom House by the English steamers since the line commenced running:—Total amount paid in 1840, $2,928 99; 1841, $73,839 23; 1842, $120,974 67; 1843, $640,572 05; 1844, $916,198 30; 1845, $1,022,992 75; 1846, $1,054,731 75; 1847, $1,199,971 78; total, $5,032,209 52.

JOHN JACOB ASTOR'S WILL.

We have examined an abstract of this document, in which the community feel at least the interest of curiosity, on account of the vast amount of property it bequeathes. The principal document was executed July 4, 1836; but as Mr. Astor acquired new estates, or the circumstances of his devisees changed, or he changed his opinion of what was best, he made sundry codicils, at the following dates, viz: July 19, '38, Jan. 9, '39, Aug. 22, '39, Oct. 24, '39, March 3, '41, June 3, '41, Dec. 5, '42, and Dec. 22, '43. There are various reattestations of the principal will, up to Jan. 11, 1845.

The great features of the will and its codicils, are ample provision for all the relations of Mr. Astor and their children—his son, Wm. B. Astor, being the great residuary legatee.

There are no trusts created for the benefit of relatives; though in quite a number of cases only income, or a sum per annum, is to be paid to the present generation, with a reversion to their children, or other heirs, who succeed to unrestricted possession.

The only important bequest for the public benefit, is one of $400,000, by the codicil of Aug. 29, 1839, for erecting suitable buildings, and establishing a library in New York, for free general use. For this purpose he appropriates a plot of ground on the southerly side of Astor Place, 65 feet front by 125 deep, for the building; or, if the trustees of this bequest think it more expedient, a plot of like size on the east side of Astor Place. The building is not to cost over $75,000, and the land is estimated at $35,000. Then $120,000 are to be expended in books, maps, statuary, &c.; and the remainder to be placed at interest, to defray the expenses of management, purchase of books, or the establishment of Lectures, as the Trustees may think best. The Trustees are the Mayor of the City and the Chancellor of the State, ex officio, (and now named as a mark of respect) Messrs. Washington Irving, Wm. B. Astor, Daniel Lord, Jr., James G. King, Jos. G. Cogswell, Fitz Greene Halleck, Henry Brevoort, Jr., Samuel B. Ruggles, Samuel Ward, Jr., and Charles Bristed, who are to appoint their successors.—The Trustees are to have no pay; nor is any one of them to hold any office of emolument under the Board.

There is a bequest to the poor of Waldorf, by establishing an institution for the sick or disabled, or for the improvement of the young, $50,000.

The other public bequests are as follows; but most if not all of them, we believe, were paid in advance, during the life of the testator: The German Society, $20,000; Institution for the Blind, $5,000; Half Orphan Asylum, $5,000; Lying-in-Asylum, $2,000.

The personal estate of Mr. Astor is worth from seven to nine millions of dollars, and his real estate perhaps as much more, so that the aggregate is less than twenty millions, a sum quite out of our small comprehension; and we presume that with most men the idea of one million is just about as large an idea as that of any number of millions. [Journal of Com.

Horrible Discovery.—It will be recollected that a Dr. Goss, of Seneca County, very mysteriously disappeared some months since, and that the most thorough searches in that County and elsewhere proved entirely fruitless. There was great excitement at the time in reference to the matter, but the long time that has elapsed had in a measure dissipated this feeling, and all hope of discovering him had been given up.—We learn that a man was discovered in Geneva, a few days ago, having in his possession a note which it was known belonged to Dr. Goss at the time of his disappearance. He was immediately arrested, and is said to have made a full confession of the manner in which Dr. Goss was murdered. The substance of it is, that himself and Featherly, who is now in jail at Canandaigua for the brutal fight at Geneva some time since, murdered Dr. Goss, supposing him to be the collector at Waterloo; that they afterwards burned the body in a lime-kiln, and that some of the bones which were not entirely consumed, were buried; and these have been found in the spot indicated by the man who makes the confession. Thus the perpetrators of a most foul murder are suddenly and unexpectedly exposed at the moment when they supposed themselves most secure. [Rochester Dem., April 4.

Earthquake at Batavia.—Letters from Batavia, in the Island of Java, of Feb. 20, state that on the 16th, 17th, and 18th, shocks of earthquake were felt at Batavia, and in the regencies of Cheribon, Bonjoemak, Kaddock, Samarang, and Rambay. At Batavia, the towers of the church were a good deal shaken and that of the town hall had taken a strong leaning to the left, whilst a cross in cast iron, which surmounted it was overthrown. In the town of Cheribon all the buildings except the stores, the walls of which are of great thickness, were so much injured as to threaten destruction, and oblige the inhabitants to seek refuge in the plains of the environs. At Parimang the residence of the Governor was thrown down, and all that it contained destroyed. Forty houses in the Chinese quarter shared the same fate, and seventeen inhabitants were crushed to death under the ruins. A great number of sugar and indigo manufactures in the open fields were destroyed. Intelligence from all points of new disasters were reaching Batavia, and the greatest alarm prevailed in that capital.

One of the New York Volunteers writes from San Angel, near the City of Mexico, Jan. 13, as follows:—"We long for New York. As long as there was fighting to do, the excitement killed time, but since the capture of the capital time hangs heavy on our hands and the volunteers desire to go home. Our Regiment is now so weak that they will not be sent any farther into the country. Out of some 840 men which we numbered when we landed at Vera Cruz, we have not now more than about 180 fit for duty."

An anchor weighing 7,650 pounds was fished up some time since by Mr. Solomon Hull, of Hull, from Nantucket Roads, lower habor. It has since been ascertained that it belonged to H. B. M's. 74 gun ship, which put into that harbor during stress of weather in the last war, and when the wind shifted, being somewhat in a hurry to take her departure from ticklish ground, it was thought advisable to cut the cable instead of remaining to weigh anchor, leaving their bower as a prize to some Yankee fisherman.

SUMMARY.

The new Constitution of Illinois, just adopted by the people, cuts down the salary of the Governor from $2,000 to $1,500; Secretary and Treasurer of State from $1,000 to $500; and the pay of the Members of the Legislature from $3 per day to $2 per day for the first forty days, and $1 per day for the remainder of the session. Instead of annual sessions of the Legislature, the Legislature will meet, under the new Constitution, but once in two years.

The N. Y. Express says that Cassius M. Clay petitions Congress for $1,337, in consequence of losses sustained by him in being taken prisoner in Mexico. The enemy took his watch, which he puts down at $350; two suits of new clothes, at $120; and a dozen shirts, $50, besides bedding, pistols, &c.

A vessel will sail from Savannah on the 17th of April for Liberia. Eighty-nine emigrants, 49 of whom are from Georgia, and 40 from South Carolina, (30 being manumitted slaves) offer to embark. 120 from New Orleans, and 82 from Baltimore, have already this year been sent. Over 200 from Baltimore, Norfolk and Savannah are ready. They are to be sent free of expense, supported for six months after their arrival in Africa, and then lands will be given them to cultivate.

The American firm of Harrison, Winans & Eastwick, the well known contractors for the cars and locomotives on the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railway, have obtained the contract for the new iron bridge across the Neva. Mr. Winans, of this firm, is now in Baltimore on a visit, but will shortly return to Russia, to fulfil his contracts with that government.

The British steamer Pluto, and sloop Scout, in cruising against the pirates of the east coast of China, have destroyed six or eight junks, killing about one hundred pirates. Many escaped; and several of the junks made a desperate resistance. A large number of prisoners were taken.

Mr. Clay received a fee of $8,000 (not $10,000 as previously reported,) for his services on behalf of Houston and others, in the suit against the City Bank, wherein he gained a favorable decision a few days ago, in the Supreme Court of the United States. Out of this fee, it is understood that Mr. Clay will have to pay Hon. Reverdy Johnson, who was Associate Counsel in the case, a fee of $1,000 or $1,500.

The Heraldo, a Spanish paper, states that a man has arrived at Madrid, whose body bullets cannot enter. He proposed being publicly shot at by the soldiers of the garrison, and also by a machine of his own which lets off several muskets at the same time. He puts on a garment the tissue of which resists the entrance of any bullet.

Buffon, says the Journal de Rheims, gives the age of a raven as 200 years. The other day a gentleman captured one, round its neck was a silver plate, with an inscription in English:—"This raven, caught by Capt. Duncan of the Scotch Guards, in Garrison at Rheims, was set at liberty, Jan. 7, 1643."

An enterprising citizen of Charleston, S. C., has just received from Canton, from an embassy to that country, six varieties of the seed of the Tea plant, together with directions for its culture. The seed resembles in some measure the small sized ground artichoke.

The Cleveland Herald states that saleratus to the amount of 221 tons or 442,000 lbs., was shipped from that place by the canal last year. There are in Cleveland four manufactories of this article, all of which are doing a good business.

Mr. Ellett, the engineer and contractor of the Niagara Suspension Bridge, has stated that by the 1st of June next the work will be so far advanced that he will be able to cross on horseback.

A plain gold ring was found by workmen who were digging a culvert on Ferry wharf, Boston, a short time since, which had on it the following inscription: "J. Fitch, ob't. Oct. 26, 1739, Æ 27."

The Statue Committee at Washington, have adopted Mills' plan for a bronze equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson. It is to be made of the cannon captured by Gen. Jackson at New Fort Hamilton.

M. Boussingault states in the Annales de Chemie, that experiments have shown that cattle fatten better on fodder steeped in water than when given to them dry.

Twenty-six thousand lashes were inflicted in the British Navy last year. Forty-eight was the highest number inflicted at any one time.

The Flemington, N. J., Copper Company have, it is said, recently struck a rich vein of ore, yielding 58 per cent. of pure copper.

It requires a force of 115,000 lbs. to tear asunder a tempered steel rod the area of which is one inch.

Capt. J. Warwick, of Amherst Co, Va., who died a few days since, manumitted by his will all his servents, numbering between 70 and 80. He has made ample provision for their removal, outfit, and settlement, in one of the Western States.

The Worcester Journal says that Mr. Wright, of the Chronotype, promises to issue in a neat pamphlet form a compact history of the late Revolution in France, with all its important and memorable documents.

Mr. George J. Weaver, of Philadelphia, has just manufactured an immense rope for the inclined plane on the Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad. It weighs upwards of 25,000 pounds.

In Philadelphia, Mr. Joseph S. Richards, a vinegar manufacturer, was awakened by groans which appeared to proceed from his vat; he immediately jumped up, went into his factory and found that a negro had fallen into the vat. In his endeavors to get him out, Mr. Richards was suffocated with the gas. The negro and Richards both perished.

A bill embodying the Homestead Exemption principle passed the Michigan Senate, on the 20th ult., by 12 Yeas to 4 Nays, and on the 23d it passed the House without amendment by 33 Yeas to 19 Nays, after full discussion.

The Niagara River, at the village of Black Rock, fell, during Thursday night, three feet lower than it was ever known before, and during Friday rose again only about six inches. A letter from Niagara Falls, dated March 30, says, "never in the memory of the oldest inhabitants, was there so little water running over Niagara's awful precipice, as at this moment. Hundreds of people are now witnessing that which never has, and probably never may again be witnessed on the Niagara River."

Died in Washington city, on the 22d ult., Altamont, a colored man, in the 94th year of his age. He was proverbial for stern integrity and fidelity. When the revolution broke out, Altamont was given to Col. George Washington, by his nephew, and was with his young master in all the leading battles in the south, ending with the siege of Yorktown.

By the returns from southern Illinois, it is now rendered certain, say the Chicago papers, "that free negroes are prohibited from coming into that State," or, in other words, they have adopted the "black laws" of Ohio. The majority on the Constitution is from 30 to 40,000.—The two mill tax is adopted, which is of immense importance to the credit of Illinois.

The value of the exports from the Port of New York for the week ending March 31, was $484,055; specie $106,000—total $590,055.—The value of goods entered at the Custom House for the week ending March 31, amounted to $456,290.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 31, Mr. John C. Perry, aged 34 years. Bro. Perry, inheriting a feeble constitution, was a great sufferer during much of his life. In youth he hopefully gave his heart to God, and was baptized, although he did not connect himself with the church. During his last sickness, this neglect lay heavy on his mind. And it was not until he was admitted a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, that he found peace once more returning to his breast. Thus in his dying chamber he performed a duty, for the long neglect of which he felt a deep regret, saying, "He wished to die a member of a Christian church." This done, he resigned himself to the will of God, and yielded up his breath, a few days after, into the hands of his God, in the full belief of a blessed immortality. S. S. G.

In Westerly, R. I., March 31, 1848, Hannah Hiscox, wife of Clark Hiscox, aged 48 years. The subject of this notice professed religion some ten years since, and united with the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, where she remained an ornament to the cause until called to join the Church Triumphant. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

On the 24th ult., in the township of Stowcreek, Cumberland Co., N. J., Mrs. Julian Bonham. Sister Bonham was many years a member of the Church at Shiloh. At the time of her death she was the oldest person in the society. Supposed to be ninety-one.

In Burlington, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 30th of March, Orrimus Burdick, aged 11 years, son of Mr. Nathan M. Burdick.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., March 31st, Mr. Artemas Cheesbrough, aged 30 years.

At his raisdence in Alfred, N. Y., on the 26th ult., Mr. James C. Burdik, in the 77th year of his age. He was sick but a few days, but his confidence was strong in the Lord, not one doubt of acceptance crossing his mind.

REPUBLICATION OF
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

IMPORTANT WORK!
Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.
CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

COMMON THINGS.

The sunshine is a glorious thing,
That comes alike to all,
Lighting the peasant's lowly cot,
The noble's painted hall.

The moonlight is a gentle thing,
It through the window gleams
Upon the snowy pillow where
The happy infant dreams.

It shines upon the fisher's boat
Out on the lonely sea;
Or where the little lambkins lie
Beneath the old oak tree.

The dew-drops on the summer morn
Sparkle upon the grass;
The village children brush them off,
That through the meadows pass.

There are no gems in monarch's crowns
More beautiful than they;
And yet we scarcely notice them,
But tread them off in play.

Poor robin on the pear-tree sings,
Beside the cottage door;
The heath flower fills the air with sweets,
Upon the pathless moor.

There are as many lovely things,
As many pleasant tones,
For those who sit by cottage hearths
As those who sit on thrones.

MEXICO DESCRIBED BY CASSIUS M. CLAY.

Cassius M. Clay, in his reception speech at Lexington, Ky., gave the following graphic description of the country:—

"Mexico extends from about latitude 16 North to 42 deg., from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific; and was in extent, before the loss of Texas, about as large as the United States. It embraces all the climates of the world, and rises in temperature, from the tropical plains of Vera Cruz and Acapulco to the regions of perpetual snow. The Rocky Mountains which separate us from Oregon extend through all Mexico, and her whole surface is composed of table-lands and mountains, which rise in steps from the Gulf and the Rio Grande to the highest level, and then descend in regular gradation once more to the Pacific. She has no navigable streams, and the mountains and arid plains compose, I should imagine, seven-eighths of the whole territory. It is now three hundred years since the Spanish Conquest, and her population has long since reached that barrier where Nature imposes eternal obstacles to further progress, where the whole products of the earth are economically consumed by the people. No doubt, better modes of agriculture would increase her population, but at present, to use the language of Malthus, she has reached the point of subsistence. It is true that the remote provinces of California and New Mexico, and those bordering upon the Rio Grande, and subject to Indian invasions, contain some uncultivated lands; but the proposition as above stated applies to the mass of Mexico. For in the greater portion of the whole Republic, women and children may be seen picking up grains of corn in the highways, and the rinds of fruit thrown in the streets are immediately seized and consumed.

"As soon as you cross the Rio Grande, you feel yourselves in a foreign land. Mexico has no forests. It is true that along the streams and on mountain-tops there are trees, but you are struck with this great characteristic, that the land is bare of trees. The numerous varieties of the Cactus of all sizes, intermixed with the Palmetto, stunted or long grass, cover the whole land. You are among a people of a novel color, and a strange language. The very birds, and beasts, and dogs, seem different. The patridge, the lark, the crow, the black-bird, differ in size and plumage, and sing differently from ours. The buildings are of Moorish and Spanish style. The goat and the sheep feed together. The brick are of clay and straw, sun-dried. The women go with earthen vessels to the well, just as Rachel was sent of old in the time of the Patriarchs of Judea. The roofs of the houses are flat and places of recreation, and the people wear sandals as in the East, in olden times. Wheat, Indian Corn, and herds of cattle, sheep and goats, the banana and red-pepper, and garlic and onions, are the principal sources of subsistence. The products of the mines are the principal articles of foreign exchange, added to woods, tallow and cochineal. The extreme dryness of Mexico makes irrigation necessary in most parts of the country, and the scarcity of water and the habits of the people collect the inhabitants into cities or villages. The land itself is owned by a few large proprietors, not the least of whom are the priests. The great mass of the people are serfs, with but few more rights than American slaves. It is true that the children of serfs are not of necessity also serfs, but debt brings slavery, and the wages allowed by law almost always perpetuate it. Here then is the secret of the success of our arms. I conversed freely with the tenantry and soldiers in all Mexico, and where they are not filled with religious enthusiasm against us, they care not who rules them, American or Mexican masters. If all the Mexican soldiers were freeholders and freemen, not one of all the American army could escape from her borders. The soldiers are caught up in the haciendas and the streets of the towns, by force confined in some prison or convent, there drilled, clothed, armed, and then sent on to the regular army. Such men avow their resolution to desert, or run, on the first occasion. Of near one thousand soldiers sent from Toluca, to the aid of Santa Anna at Mexico, not one hundred stood the battle.

"The whole people do not exceed eight millions, and of these about two millions are white and mixed bloods, the remainder are native Indians: I never, in all Mexico, with the exception of foreigners in the Capital, saw a single white man at work. Wherever there is slavery, there is labor dishonorable—it is more creditable to rob than to work! Yet Mexico surpasses the Slave States of America in manufactures? As Rome was overrun by the Barbarians, so is Mexico by the Americans; the slaves will not fight, the masters are to few to defend the country. Bigotry in Religion has based the mind—the corruptions of the Church have destroyed the morals of the people; the oppressions of the masters have exhausted the lands. Mexico is decreasing in population and resources. Since her independence, her revenues are fallen off, her villages are decaying, her public works falling to ruin. She has lived by the sword, she must perish by the sword.—The time for her to die has come!—Yet, like South Carolina, she talks large. She whipped Spain, Spain whipped France, France whipped the world—and consequently, Mexico is the mistress of the world! Yet fifty thousand Americans conquer eight millions of souls! The clergy plunder the people, the army now begin to plunder the clergy, while independent robbers begin to plunder the Government, the clergy, and the people. Such is the fearful retribution of Nature's violated laws. Seeing Texas, that it was a lovely land, we coveted our neighbor's goods; seeing the weakness of Mexico, we took it by force."

A SLAVE AUCTION.

The following illustration of American Slavery is taken from the correspondence of the N. Y. Observer:—

"I had never seen a human being sold. As one of the necessary attendants of Slavery, I knew that it must be a common affair in any slaveholding city, and when it was mentioned to me that the market was near the Exchange Hotel, in Richmond, where I was staying, I determined at once to visit it. A small red flag at the door advertised the fact of a sale in progress, and a written description of the property pasted up, informed the public the particulars. I entered a large room with benches around the sides of it, on which thirty or forty men were seated, smoking and talking with the same indifference that you would observe at Tattersall's. In the centre of the room was a platform, some six feet square, and three in height, on which stood a white well-dressed auctioneer, and by the side of him a colored woman and a playful child three years old, holding up her fingers, and smiling at the company around. That was my first sight of a slave-market. 'Only three hundred and fifty dollars,' said the auctioneer, 'why it is giving away the property; only think of it.' But no one was disposed to bid more. The mother was sickly looking, and the buyers were afraid of the investment. One man stepped up to the stand and asked her how many children she had had; she told him 'six,' and he returned to his seat apparently satisfied, and made no offer to purchase. The auctioneer endeavored to rally the customers, and induce them to bid, but they would not take, and he told the woman to go down. I asked her where her other children were, she said she did not know, they had all been sold but this one—an innocent prattling thing, unconscious of a claim.

"Another one was brought out, a colored girl of eighteen, strong, well made, lively, and laughing as she stood up to be sold. A man stepped up, and taking her by the chin, told her to show her teeth, which she did. He then felt of her arms, her breasts, her sides, and with his foot brushed aside her frock, and made her hold it up a little, that he might see the development of her ankles; thus he pursued the examination of this female with as much minuteness and familiarity as he would a blood horse. Being pleased with the result of his investigations, he bought the girl for five hundred dollars. Several others were sitting there to be sold, but the demand seemed to be so small, and the sale so dull, that the auctioneer declined proceeding any farther that day, and I came away."

MAGNIFICENT WORKS.

The most magnificent works in Europe are the three principal roads over the Alps mountains. The Alps are a high chain of mountains between Switzerland and Italy, and there is no other direct way of reaching Italy from France, by land, than by crossing these mountains.

The first principal pass or road, is that over the ridge of the mountain named St. Bernard. The road passes between the two highest points of the mountain; the highest point of the road is about 8,000 feet above the sea. The French army under Bonaparte, crossed this mountain in 1800. This road is distinguished for its circuitous and winding route, as well as for the Bernardine monastery and hospital at its highest point, founded about 800 years ago. The monks entertain all strangers gratis for three days, and in foggy weather they send their servants and dogs to all parts of the mountains, to find and succor all such travelers as may have lost their way. This establishment has been of great service to the cause of humanity, and will atone for much of the injury done by monarchism.

The second pass or road is that called the Simplon road, because it passes over that particular part of the Alps called Mt. Simplon.—This road was projected and executed by Bonaparte during his reign in France, and more than his thousand victories or defeats, will contribute to immortalize his name. It was completed in 1805, at the joint expense of France and the then kingdom of Italy. The road is 30 miles long, and about 25 feet broad, and passes over 264 bridges, and through 6 tunnels, or galleries, that is, passages through the solid rock, one of which is about 1,300 feet long and 12 feet broad. This is one of the most stupendous works ever constructed by man. It cost a great sum of money and several years were required to complete it.

The third road passes over Mt. St. Gothard, and is about 12 feet wide, paved with substantial granite. In one place it passes over a deep chasm, at the bottom of which is a river, and is called the Devil's bridge; it is a single arch, having peaks of rocks for abutments, at so great an elevation above the bottom as to appear almost a superhuman work. There are numerous deep cuts, and a gallery 200 feet long, 12 feet wide, and 12 feet high. These among modern works, approach the nearest in stupendous conception and durable execution to the ancient works of Rome.

Protective Influence of Vaccination.—The great conclusions drawn by Dr. Retzins, of Stockholm, from his observations on small pox, and the effects of vaccination in Sweden, are these: "The protection afforded by vaccination from the close of the second year of life against the contagion of the various poisons, usually lasts unimpaired to the thirteenth year or so; after this period it begins to lose its effects, and gradually becomes more and more uncertain on to the twentieth or twenty-first of life.—For the next four or five years the predisposition to the small pox seems almost to have recovered its original integrity, and this state of liability continues unimpaired up to the age of forty years or so. At about this epoch of life it begins to approach nearer to the limit of its existence—which it reaches, in the majority of cases, about the fiftieth year—the period when the general revolutions of the human body commence to take place."

The practical inference to be drawn from these remarks, is the propriety of repeating vaccination in about thirteen years after its first performance. This advice is in accordance with the observations of the most experienced practitioners; it would be well if it were more generally acted upon.

EVENING HOURS FOR MECHANICS.

"What," says the North of Scotland Gazette, in an article in favor of the early closing of shops, "what have evening hours done for mechanics who have only ten hours toil? What in the moral, what in the religious, what in the scientific world? Hearken to these facts! One of the best editors the Westminster Review could ever boast, and one of the most brilliant writers of the passing hour, was a cooper in Aberdeen. One of the editors of a London daily journal was a baker in Elgin; perhaps the best reporter on the London Times was a weaver in Edinburg; the editor of the Witness was a stone mason. One of the ablest ministers in London was a blacksmith in Dundee; another was a watchmaker in Banff; the late Dr. Milne of China, was a herd boy in Rhynie; the Principal of the London Missionary Society's College at Hong-Kong was a saddler at Huntly; and one of the best missionaries that ever went to India was a tailor in Keith. The leading machinist on the London and Birmingham Railway, with £700 a year, was a mechanic in Glasgow; and perhaps the very richest ironfounder in England, was a working man in Moray. Sir James Clarke, her Majesty's physician, was a druggist in Banff. Joseph Hume was a sailor first, and then a laborer at the pestle and mortar in Montrose; Mr. Macgregor, the member for Glasgow, was a poor boy in Ross-shire; James Wilson, the member for Westbury, was a ploughman in Haddington; and Arthur Anderson, the member for Orkney, earned his bread by the sweat of his brow in the Ultima Thule."

AN ECLAIRCISSEMENT.

Poisson, is the French for fish, and Poison, a word resembling it to the eye, is the same in French and English. This explains an amusing mistake below.

Not long after the general peace, when all classes of English travelers, learned and unlearned, polished and unpolished, flocked to the continent in search of the classical and picturesque. One of these pilgrims met a companion sitting in a state of most woeful despair, and apparently near the last agonies, by the side of one of the mountain lakes of Switzerland.—With great anxiety he inquired the cause of his suffering. "Oh!" said the latter, "I was very hot and thirsty, and took a large draught of the clear water of the lake, and then set down on this stone to consult my guide-book. To my astonishment I found there that the water of this lake is very poisonous. Oh, I am a gone man—I drank so much there is no hope for me! I feel it running all over me; I have only a few minutes to live! Remember me to ———." "Let me see the guide-book," said his friend. Turning to the passage, he found "L'eau du lac est bien poissoneuse"—"The water of the lake abounds in fish." "Is that the meaning of it?" "Certainly." "I never was better," said the dying man, leaping up with a countenance radiant as the sun on a fine May morning. Then extending his arm in the true Longbow style, said, "There's muscle." He cut a series of capers over the grass that would have done honor to a Vestris. "What would have become of you," said his friend, "if I had not met you?" "I should have died of imperfect knowledge of the French language."

A Droll Definition of a Yankee.—As the Yankees are creating no little excitement in the Commercial, Political and Military world, I hope my definition of a real genuine male Yankee may not be considered a-miss.

A real genuine Yankee is full of animation, checked by moderation, guided by determination, and supported by education. He has veneration corrected by toleration, with a love of self-approbation and emulation; when reduced to a state of aggravation, can assume the most profound dissimulation for the purpose of retaliation, always combined, if possible, with speculation. A real live Yankee, just caught, will be found not deficient in the following qualities: He is self-denying, self-relying, always trying, and into everything prying. He is a lover of piety, propriety, notoriety and the temperance society. He is a dragging, gagging, bragging striving, thriving, swapping, jostling, bustling, wrestling, musical, quizzical, astronomical, poetical, philosophical, and comical sort of a character, whose manifest destiny is to spread civilization to the remotest corners of the earth, with an eye always on the look out for the main chance.

Improvement in Carriage Springs.—The Scientific American says that Mr. E. T. Sprout, of Springville, Pennsylvania, has invented a new improvement in the carriage, by connecting the spring and reach together—the spring forming part of the reach. They serve thus combined as braces to the hind axletree. The body loops are also a spring, and there is nothing but steel from the axletree and bolster to the body of the carriage. The motion of the carriage is thereby rendered very easy, and only about 50 pounds of common steel spring is needed for a one horse vehicle. By this improvement carriages can be made lighter, cheaper, more simple and more durable. The spring used is the half elliptic, and the benefit of the whole elliptic is gained by the motion of Mr. Sprout's improvement. Application has been made for a patent.

Shaving by the Acre.—An English paper gives the following amusing illustration of the old maxim, "many a little makes a mickle."—A gentleman in Devonshire having incurred a debt with his barber for twenty-one years' shaving, demurred to the charge, when the bill was sent in, £31 9s. 4d., or one penny a day.—The barber proposed to be paid by square measure, at the rate of £200 an acre. On measurement, the area of the gentleman's beard proved to be 129 square inches. This space traversed 7,670 times, was found to give 1,472,646 inches, and to produce a charge of £46 19s. 1d.

The Rich Man and the Day Laborer.—A merchant, who is as avaricious as opulent, has recently excited some public attention in London. He had obtained, at the cheapest possible rate, a poor day laborer to do some work in his house. The unfortunate man, fatigued with work, represented to the merchant's wife, that with so low wages he could not procure a glass of beer to quench his thirst. The compassionate woman gave him a tankard of ale, but the husband learned this circumstance on his return, and when he settled with the laborer, retained the value of the drink; the poor man exclaimed against it and raised so great an uproar that the police took him to prison. The next day when he was called before the Judge he explained the affair and was discharged on the payment of two shillings, but the merchant had another account to render to justice; he was condemned to pay fifty pounds sterling as fine for having sold beer without a license, and the poor laborer, as the informer of the offence, received a third of the sum. VARIETY.

A London paper tells a good story of an old gentleman, a widower, with a large family of daughters, who advertised in the Times for a wife under a fictitious signature, appointing a place of meeting. At the time and place appointed, a woman appeared thickly veiled. She entered with downcast eyes, which she did not venture to raise until the voice of her swain in respectful greeting fell upon her ear. She started, looked up, and the next moment uttered a shriek in a tone not unfamiliar to the gentleman's ear. He took the liberty of lifting her veil, and beheld—his eldest daughter! whom he had supposed safe at her boarding school at Hammersmith.

Blackstone, speaking of the right of a wife to dower, asserts that if land abide in the husband for a single moment the wife shall be endowed thereof; and he adds in a note that this doctrine was extended very far by a jury in Wales where the father and son were both hanged in one cart; but the son was supposed to have survived the father by appearing to struggle the longest, whereby he became seized of an estate by survivorship, in consequence of which seizing his widow obtained a verdict of her dower!

A black snake, which had discovered the nest of a wood-pecker, climbed up the tree, and putting his head into the hole, swallowed the wood-pecker. Alas! when he would have withdrawn, he found his throat so much distended by his supper that he could not get back, and so he died with his whole length exposed dangling from the wood-pecker's hole, an admonition to all who passed by, not to get into a scrape until they had contrived how they could get out of it.

Dr. Lillewalch, of Stockholm, having caused searches to be made in the marshes of Scania, has discovered the skeletons of men and animals in a remarkable state of preservation. Near them he also found arms, instruments for sport and fishing, and utensils of different descriptions, all of which are of stone, showing that the use of metals was unknown when they were made. They belong to those primitive people of whom traces remain in the traditions of the North, but whose race is now extinct.

To make New York milk, take two pounds of lime, two and a quarter pounds of chalk, one and three-quarter pounds starch, twenty quarts rain water, and to every quart of the solution add two table-spoonsful of the droppings from a cow, so as to give it the right color. Shake it about ten minutes, then settle it with a soft brickbat; then strain it through a pair of window shutters—and you will have the "pure Orange County milk."

Lost wealth may be restored by industry—the wreck of health regained by temperance—forgotten knowledge restored by study—alienated friendship smoothed into forgetfulness—even forfeited reputation won by penitence and virtue. But who ever again looked upon his vanquished hours—recalled his slighted years, stamped them with wisdom—or effaced from heaven's record the fearful blot of wasted life?

It is said by many able physicians, that fasting is a means of removing incipient diseases, and of giving to the body its usual healthy sensations. Howard, the well-known philanthropist, it is said, used to fast one day in each week. Dr. Franklin did the same for a time. Napoleon, when he felt his system unstrung, suspended his wonted meal, and took his exercise on horseback.

Capt. Walker, of the Texan Rangers, and Col. Wynkoop, of Pennsylvania, from some cause not mentioned, were hostile to each other in Mexico. After the death of the former, the latter exclaimed, as he gazed upon the lifeless corpse of his alienated fellow-soldier, "I would have given six years of my existence if I could have spoken to Capt. Walker, before he died!"

It is comparatively but a few years since pins took the place of wooden skewers and thorns in a lady's toilet. Now, one pin manufactory alone makes annually 2,070,168,000 pins! To count this number, supposing one individual could count 120 each minute for 12 hours each day, it would require 79 persons one year to complete the count!

Milton says, "Let Truth and Error encounter." It seems, however, to be the practice to regard Truth as a delicate and sickly child, who must be kept in the house, lest he should be demolished by the first blast of wind that he encounters in the open air.

The British Government have resolved upon sending out properly qualified schoolmasters and schoolmistresses to the colonies in different parts of the world, to conduct the public schools established there for the instruction of the natives.

Some years ago, the following notice was posted about the estate of Lord Camden:—"Notice to Sportsmen.—In consequence of the universal scarcity of game, Lord Camden does not intend to shoot himself, or any of his tenants until after the 25th instant."

We were much amused a few days since, with a little boy, upon whom his mother was inflicting personal chastisement. "Give me one or two more licks, mother; I don't think I can behave well yet."

A man ought to have nothing singular or affected in his habit, discourse, or manners. In our opinion, the modest air becomes a man better than that which they call the genteel air.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:
First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25
EXTRAS PER TERM.
Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

EXTRACTS FROM A MISSIONARY'S LETTER.

The following paragraphs are taken from a letter of Bro. Carpenter to Thomas B. Brown. Though not written for the press, they contain sufficient information of general interest to justify their publication:—

SHANGHAI, China, Nov. 14, 1847.

Your three letters dated Feb. 22, April 9, and June 17, have been received, the first on the 8th of August, the second on the 28th of the same month, and the last on the 10th inst. These all have been like cold water to a thirsty soul. And I will here bespeak a continuance of these favors, and with as much frequency as your time and health will permit. You will remember that Mrs. C. and myself are members of the church of which you are pastor. I mention this so that in addition to all that you would say as a member of the Board to us as agents of the Board, you may not neglect to say any thing that belongs to a pastor to say to the members of his flock. Be assured that your advice will be heeded. And during the time in which we are getting ready for our work there is less to call into vigorous activity the sympathies of our nature, than may be expected after we become able to hold forth the word of life. For now our business is a continual digging and delving at the language. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, our daily toil is far from being irksome. I think we can all say that there is a pleasure mingled with all our labor. It is something to have a well-defined object placed distinctly before one's mind, and that object one of commanding importance. Such an object we have now before us, and although for one I can find some, yea, great fault with myself every day, yet I can say for myself and my companions, that we are trying to do with our might what our hands find to do, and we feel an increasing animation in our work. I believed, before you told us, that our brethren at home must be praying for this enterprise. The overruling providence of God, in a marked manner, has seemed to favor us. And I can not think it is all for the sake of our unworthy selves, but for the sake of the perishing heathen, and through the prayers of those at home, who are more worthy than we are, and who will wear a brighter crown in heaven. Notwithstanding our sense of unworthiness, which occasionally almost deprives us of comfort, yet for the most part we enjoy great satisfaction in the thought that God is favoring our enterprise.

We are all enjoying a very good state of health. Sister W., concerning whose health you expressed some solicitude, is, at present, more healthy than I have ever known her to be before. We have seen no reason yet to regret that we pitched upon this place rather than Foo-Chow, nor do we regret our having located where we have within the city walls. On the contrary, I believe we have got by far the best location for us that was available. I have seen no other Chinese house as good as this that is rented for less than four hundred dollars. I have seen no other house here that would afford any thing like the advantages which this affords for a chapel. The Chinese finish off the lower rooms much better than they do the upper rooms. The room we design for a chapel is done off in fine style, and with the trifling expense of putting in seats and a desk we can have a tasty chapel. The court would need a small expense upon it. One hundred dollars would abundantly fit up the chapel and court. Do you ask when we would like to commence public worship? I will tell you. We do not go entirely by our own judgment, but are guided partly by what others have done, and partly by what we have already accomplished, and we think that if Providence favors us with good health we ought to be able to conduct regular services on the Sabbath as soon as two years from the time we left home. Perhaps you may deem me visionary, and possibly I am. But you will not understand me to say that we expect to become masters of the Chinese language so soon. We expect to study the language the remainder of our lives. But the spoken language can be learned sufficiently, we think, within the time specified, to enable each of us to prepare a short discourse once in two weeks, and by alternating thus keep up a weekly service. . . . . Our spirits are stirred within us while we see this whole city given to idolatry, and as soon as we can with prudence we wish to bear testimony in the most effectual way in behalf of the living and true God. As soon as we can, we intend to go from house to house, and, where we are favorably received, communicate the Gospel of Christ. This was one branch of apostolic operations. I have no doubt that we should find access to multitudes of families. Some weeks ago, one Sabbath, without any previous special preparation, I communicated to Too Quay, our cook, an outline of the history of the creation and the institution of the Sabbath, so that he understood it. I have since several times repeated the same, and find that he now can tell it himself. I also gave him a copy of the New Testament, which he reads considerably; but he needs some one to explain it to him. We shall do the best we can towards performing this duty. This will be a good exercise for a part of the Sabbath. He is a man about 40 years of age, with fair abilities, and we feel a growing attachment to him, as also he appears to towards us.

The wall of this city is about four miles in extent. Bro. W. and I frequently walk on it, and sometimes we go quite round. The wall consists of an outer and an inner wall of stone and brick, filled in between with earth. The outer wall I judge to be about twenty-five feet high, and the inner wall about eighteen feet high, and the thickness of the whole is about twenty feet. I think there are half as many houses without the wall as within. We frequently go out into the open country. The road is generally from two to three feet wide, with a single footpath. Every part, excepting where the tombs are, is in a high state of cultivation. Cotton, rice, beans, egg-plant, squashes, and a great variety of other vegetables, are raised. Even at this season of the year, the fields are loaded, in many places, with vegetables, as green and apparently as flourishing as in mid-summer. The tombs, where they are not concealed by the tall coarse grass, bear a striking resemblance to an old-fashioned Jersey wagon-top. But generally they are much smaller. A few mornings since, as Bro. W. and I were walking on the wall in the western part of the city, where there is a considerable space not built up, we saw a man adjusting some wearing apparel on a straw mat. Thinking it possible that he was performing some religious service, which would throw light upon the customs of the country, at a suitable distance we stood and watched the operation. First of all was some kind of a frame about a foot high, on which the mat was spread out; then was the mat, an old one, with some straw under and on it; then he placed an entire suit of wearing apparel in order and wound it up so that it resembled a person; and on the top of this he put some straw and a quantity of what we call ghost money, the Chinese call it "tsz den." Then he lighted his torch and set the pile on fire. As soon as the smoke began to ascend, we noticed a woman, with a child two or three years old, approaching. She came nearer, and after bowing herself to the earth several times, she covered her face with one hand and set up a pitable lamentation, which she continued two or three minutes, with the appearance of deep sorrow. Then a man, who stood at a little distance in the doorway of the house whence the woman came, called to her, and she returned. Then the man who had arranged the pile and set it on fire, got down on his knees and bowed his head several times to the earth; and even a little child, who from the commencement had stood looking on with as much gravity as a grown person could exhibit, moved from the head to the side of the pile, and bowed himself, waving his clenched hands in token of worship. Through the whole, they appeared not to notice us at all. This, I have learned, is a common ceremony gone through with for the dead. At a distance of five or six rods under a tree were several coffins. Some of them were naked, some had a straw covering, and some had a brick tomb built over them in the shape of a Jersey wagon-top. The coffins are made of thick plank, and ornamented at one end. When they build a tomb over them, they leave a small hole about the length and width of one brick, so that the ornamented end of the coffin can be seen.

In walking out into the country one is agreeably surprised to see the number of canals where the water ebbs and flows with the tide. These serve the purposes of irrigation of their rice fields and other fields, also of supplying them with water for washing, cooking, &c. It makes no difference to a Chinaman how turbid the water may be, nor how filthy the ditch whence he gets it; if he gets it at the flowing of the tide and settles it with a little alum, it is very nice to him. It is interesting to witness their economy in watering their rice fields. By a sort of water-wheel, exactly described by Davis, wherein simplicity and efficiency are combined; and by the aid of a heifer or bullock, at the flowing of the tide, they draw up a great quantity of water in an hour. Where the foot-path leads across these canals, they have stone bridges. Although the soil is so destitute of stones that it would be difficult to find one large enough to throw at a bird, yet they have many from ten to twelve or fourteen feet in length, stretched two or three side by side, across the stream. In case of a canal large enough for boats, they have three lengths of stones, the central ones level, and those on either side inclined. We see no wooden bridges any where.

Wood is scarce. But they have wood, and that of the best kind for furniture. In building, they use pine chiefly for frame-work and ceilings. All their boards are sawed by hand, and it is done in the streets. Many a street that is not more than eight or ten feet wide is encumbered with men sawing with a cross-cut saw; also with almost all kinds of handicraft. The only trees which I have noticed as resembling ours in America, are the pine, willow, ash, peach, and some that resemble our beach. The fuel generally used in cooking, is pine, done up in various sized bundles, from a foot and a half in length and six inches in diameter, to two feet and a half in length and twelve or fourteen inches in diameter. A dollar's worth of wood will last us for cooking about three weeks. But a Chinaman is great in economizing fuel. Every brand that is not needed is immediately smothered. The Chinese, so far as I can learn, use no fire in their dwellings for the purpose of warming them. It may be that the rich do. Foreigners use the native coal for warming their houses. This at present is about seventy-five cents a picul, (about 100 lbs.)

SONNET.

BY ANNE C. LYNCH.

O Thou, who once on earth, beneath the weight
Of our mortality didst live and move,
The incarnation of profoundest love:
Who on the cross that love didst consummate,
Whose deep and ample fullness could embrace
The poorest, meanest of our fallen race,
How shall we e'er that boundless debt repay?
By long, loud prayers, in gorgeous temples said?
By rich oblations on thine altars laid?
Ah no! not thus thou didst appoint the way;
When thou wast bowed our human wo beneath,
Then as a legacy didst thou bequeath
Earth's sorrowing children to our ministry;
And as we do to them we do to Thee.

From the Columbian Magazine.

A SCENE IN COURT—ELIZABETH BUNYAN.

There was one subject which the wife of Bunyan had not yet touched, in the hope that a sense of justice would lead the court to grant her request, without minutely spreading before them the painful necessities of that little family over which, in the midst of all her affliction, she never failed to extend the shield of a mother's love. Hitherto she had withheld the mention of this, in the expectation that her simple arguments would prevail with men whose business it was to do justly, as well as to love mercy. But that expectation failing, she again addressed the court, while the sadness of her countenance too truly reflected the sorrow of her heart.

"Can I need to assure you, my lord, that my husband desireth to live peaceably with all men, and to follow his calling that he may maintain his family? Moreover, I have four small children, that cannot help themselves, one of which is blind, so we have nothing to live upon but the charity of good people."

Such was the state of poor Bunyan's family, while the court of Charles II. was reveling in vice, luxury, and all manner of debauchery. And there sat his ministers to pronounce judgment against men for exercising that freedom which is derived by charter directly from God himself, and to abridge which is to invade the prerogative of God.

Justice Hale indeed seemed touched with pity at the mention of her children, and exclaimed, "Alas, poor woman!"

Twisdon, however, the network of whose heart seems to have been constructed of steel, and to have been as destitute of sensibility as a stratified rock, accused Mrs. Bunyan of using poverty as a cloak, and declared that she was better maintained by her husband's running up and down, preaching, than by following his calling for a living.

"What is his calling?" asked Sir Matthew.

"A tinker, my lord," was the answer of some one present.

"Yes," added Elizabeth, "and because he is a tinker, and a poor man, therefore he is despised, and cannot have justice. But there is one tribunal, whereof the Judge will not regard the persons of men, but judge righteous judgment. We shall all meet there!"

Meanwhile, Sir Matthew Hale, who had naturally a warm and tender heart, had been suppressing its rising emotions, for though he sat as a judge, he felt as a husband and a father; and brushing away an unbidden tear, and addressing the petitioner in a tone of kindness, said: "Seeing it is so, that they have taken what thy husband spake for a conviction, I recommend thou apply thyself to the king, or sue out his pardon, or get a writ of error." And the judge looked intently on the object of his address.

"A writ of error, my lord!" exclaimed Chester, who was offended with the whole strain of kindly advice given by Hale, and especially with the last clause of it—"A writ of error to the behoof of such a fellow as this? He will preach, and do what he lists."

"He preacheth nothing but the word of God," rejoined Elizabeth, with much emphasis, encouraged as she was by the Chief Justice.

"He preach the word of God!" angrily cried Twisdon, with a violence of gesture as if he would have struck the defenceless woman before him; "he runneth up and down, a busy-body in other men's matters, a wolf in sheep's clothing, a disturber of the peace, and a reprobate."

"No, my lord, God hath owned the labors of my husband, and through him converted many souls from the error of their ways, who will be his joy and crown of rejoicing in the day when he shall make up his jewels." And she spoke as if animated with a sweet confidence in the truth of what she said, and as if, under the consciousness of that inspiring truth, she could bow with resignation even to the rudeness of a Chester or a Twisdon.

"God own John Bunyan, do you say, woman!" clamored Twisdon; "his is a doctrine of the devil!" And he uttered it with a hearty malice and spitefulness which Satan himself might have envied.

"My lord," replied Elizabeth, with a tranquil firmness that contrasted strongly with the violence of her judicial browbeater, "when the righteous Judge shall appear to uncover the secrets of men's hearts, and to judge, not according to appearances, but with righteous judgment, it will then be seen that his doctrine is not of the devil, but the doctrine of truth and righteousness." And such a double emphasis did she place on the word righteous, as to satisfy all that there was a striking contrast drawn in her own mind, between the transactions of the present and the future.

"Send her away, send her away," reiterated Twisdon to the Chief Justice. "Wist ye not that this woman ought not farther to trouble us with her presence and pertinaciousness?"

"It grieveth me, woman," said Sir Matthew, whose thoughts seemed absorbed in the condition of the unfriended female before him, "that I can do thee no good. Thou must do one of those three things aforesaid, to wit, either apply thyself to the king, or sue out the pardon of thy husband, or else get a writ of error; but a writ of error will be thy best resort. Many are they who have thus been holpen out of their trouble."

Under this final decision of the Court, the devoted wife of Bunyan retired, thankful to God that he had lifted from her soul a weight of fear with which she had entered that chamber, and inspired a poor, weak woman with unwonted courage to bear her testimony before the great ones of the earth, yet filled with sorrow, not merely for her unavailing efforts to obtain the enlargement of her husband, but for the prospective doom of those who had lent themselves as the instruments of oppression and cruelty against an innocent man. "I could not but break forth into tears," said she, in simple and artless language, "not so much because they were hard hearted against me and my husband, but to think what a sad account such poor creatures will have to give at the coming of the Lord, when they shall there answer for whatsoever things they have done in the body, whether they be good or bad."

GEMS FROM McCHEYNE.

SUFFERING.

There is a great want about all Christians who have not suffered. Some flowers must be broken or bruised before they emit any fragrance. All the wounds of Christ sent out sweetness—all the sorrows of Christians do the same. Commend to me a bruised brother, a broken reed—one like the Son of Man. To me there is something sacred and sweet in all suffering; it is so much akin to the Man of Sorrows.

HUMILITY.

Remember, Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone. Looking at our own shining face is the bane of spiritual life and of the ministry. Oh, for the closest communion with God, till soul and body—head, face, and heart, shine with divine brilliancy; but, oh, for a holy ignorance of our shining!

BEREAVEMENTS.

Oh, God, how thou breakest into families! Must not the disease be dangerous, when a tender-hearted surgeon cuts deep into the flesh? How much more when God is the operator, who afflicteth not from his heart, nor grieveth the children of men.

SPIRITUAL SENTIMENTALISM.

Is it possible for a person to be conceited of his miseries? May there not be a deep leaven of pride in telling how desolate and how unfeeling we are? in brooding over our unearthly pains? in our being excluded from the unsympathetic world? in our being the invalids of Christ's hospital?

CHRIST'S INTERCESSION.

I ought to study Christ as an Intercessor. He prayed most for Peter, who was to be most tempted. I am on his breast-plate. If I could hear Christ praying for me in the next room, I would not fear a million of enemies. Yet the distance makes no difference—he is praying for me.

A WORD TO MINISTERS.

Do write to me when you have a moment, and stir me up. You know a word to a minister is worth three or four thousand souls sometimes. * * * * * Go on, dear brother; but an inch of time remains, and then eternal ages roll on forever—but an inch on which we can stand and preach the way of salvation to a perishing world.

CONDITION OF HINDU FEMALES.

Another obstacle to the progress of the Gospel is the great ignorance of the mass of the people. They are not allowed even to hear the sacred books read, or to learn to read any others. And the most discouraging feature in their ignorance is their contentment in their present state. They have no idea of aspiring to anything higher. They were born to be ignorant, as their fathers were, and they must not surpass their ancestors in wisdom. This is peculiarly the condition of women in India. Brahmins say they are bad enough without learning, and with it they would be too bad. It is only the vilest class of females who learn to read and write, that they may more readily carry on intrigues with men. These are, therefore, considered among the more virtuous women, disreputable acquisitions.

The Hindus will not admit that their women, as such, can ever be saved. They must, after a number of births, be born as men before they can enter heaven. They are not allowed to sit with their husbands or brothers, or to eat with them, or in their presence, in this life. How, then, could they be permitted to share heaven with them? Such being the degraded state of by far the majority of the people, it is hard to reach them by argument, or to arouse them to a just sense of the dignity and responsibilities of man. The priests are, however, generally men of education and intelligence. This is the secret of their influence over the people. The destiny of the young Hindu, even as soon as he is born, is in a good degree fixed by the Brahmin. He consults his astrological books, and finds out his (dismat) fate, and names him accordingly. If he is to be wealthy, the priest gives him a name indicating riches. So if fortunate or unfortunate; and if he is to be very poor, he calls him Kouri—a shell currency, the sixtieth part of a cent—and the poor fellow does not think of aspiring to more of this world's goods than that. But he has this consolation, he is so poor that the Devil does not think him worth having. It is the Brahmin who induces the widow to immolate herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband; the mother to cast her infant to the crocodiles in the sacred river; the pilgrim to wander for years among the shrines of the gods, and to torture himself in various ways. The power of the Brahmins, however, is on the wane. [J. M. Jameison.

CONVERSION OF DR. CHALMERS.

Though a minister, he was ignorant of essential Christianity, There was in nature much that pleased his taste, and he knew very well the quickened step and the glistening eye of the eager collector, as he pounces on some rare crystal or some quaint and novel flower. But as yet no Bible text had made his bosom flutter, and he had not hidden in his heart sayings which he had detected with delight and treasured up like pearls. And though his nature was genial and benevolent—though he had his chosen friends, and longed to elevate his parishioners to a higher level of intelligence, and domestic comfort, and virtuous enjoyment—he had not discovered any being possessed of such paramount claims and overwhelming attractions as to make it end enough to live and labor for his sake. But that discovery he made while writing for an Encyclopædia an article on Christianity.

The death of a relation is said to have saddened his mind into more than usual thoughtfulness, and whilst engaged in the researches which his task demanded, the scheme of God was manifested to his astonished understanding, and the Son of God was revealed to his admiring and adoring affections.

The Godhead embodied in the person and exemplified in the life of the Saviour, the remarkable arrangement for the removal and annihilation of sin, a gratuitous pardon as the germ of piety and the secret of spiritual peace—these truths flung a brightness over his field of view, and accumulated in wonder and endearment round the Redeemer's person. And ignorant of their peculiar phraseology, almost ignorant of their history, by the direct door of the Bible itself he landed on the theology of the Reformers and the Puritans; and ere even he was aware, his quickened and concentrated faculties were intent on reviving and ennobling the old evangelism. A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

Few men have become truly eminent and useful, who have not been largely indebted, for their success, under God, to the influence of a mother's wise counsel, early imparted and repeated with that degree of unremitting faithfulness, which springs from a mother's inextinguishable love for the child whom she hath borne. No one can say how much of the real greatness of the eminent statesman who has just gone down to his grave, mourned by a whole nation, is to be traced to the early influence of a mother's counsel and a mother's prayer. We take the following statement from an exchange paper. When Mr. Adams was in Europe in 1778, then a mere lad, his mother, in a letter to him, says: "Great learning and superior abilities, should you ever possess them, will be of little value and of small estimation, unless virtue, honor, integrity, and truth, are cherished by you. Adhere to the rules and principles early instilled in your mind, and remember that you are responsible to your God. Dear as you are to me, I had much rather you would find a grave in the ocean which you have crossed, than to see you an immoral, graceless child." [Christian Witness.

LOVE TO THE SAVIOUR.—A poor Scottish widow one day came to her parish minister to be examined for admission to the Lord's supper. He questioned her respecting the orthodoxy and spirituality of her views, and being dissatisfied with her statements, dismissed her from the communion on that occasion; but requested that she would wait on him before the next, when probably her examination might prove more satisfactory. He saw that the aged female wept as she retired; and the big tear that trickled down her furrowed cheek revealed a depth of feeling which her conversation had not made manifest. Her pastor called her back and asked her why she wept. Her reply was eloquent, because from the heart; sublime, because it was simple: "Sir, I cannot speak a word for Christ," said she, "but I could die for Christ, so truly do I love him."

PLAIN SAXON FOR THE PULPIT.—As the Rev. Samuel Kilpin was preaching on a certain occasion, he spoke of "the Deity." A sailor, who was listening, immediately started from his seat, his elbows fully spread, and exclaimed aloud, "Deity—who, who is He? Is he our God Almighty?" The attendants were about to turn him out; the minister stood reproved, and requested him to resume his seat, with the remark, "Yes, my friend, I did mean the Almighty God." The sailor rejoined, "I thought so; but I was not quite sure—I never heard that name before." The humbled minister replied, "You had a right to inquire; I was to blame; whilst delivering God's message of mercy and justice to immortal souls, I ought not to have given my divine Master a name which prevented the message from being understood."

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

A popular objection to ministerial education, is that it fosters pride among ministers, and makes them put on airs inconsistent with their calling. If this objection were founded in truth, it would deserve the serious consideration of those who believe that the cultivation of the intellect, at the expense of the heart, is by no means desirable. But we do not think the objection is founded in truth. On the contrary, we believe that a thorough education is the most effectual means of curbing pride and promoting humility among both ministers and laymen. The Apostle Paul seems to have entertained a similar opinion, when he opposed the appointment of a novice to the office of bishop, lest he should be puffed up with pride and fall into the snare of the devil. If the Apostle believed and wrote thus under the influence of inspiration, it is certainly safe for us to follow his advice.

The great object of a thorough education is to put a man in complete possession of his powers, and so enable him to think and act freely for himself. To accomplish this, it is necessary to make him acquainted with his own ignorance and defects, and the high point to which it is possible for men to attain. Fields of thought and inquiry are laid open before him, of the existence of which he had formerly no idea or only very faint conceptions. He is introduced, through their writings, to the most distinguished men who have gone before him, and spends days and months in familiarizing himself with their choicest instructions. As he contemplates the powers of mind which they have displayed, and the extent to which their researches have been carried, he is often filled with astonishment and admiration. This process, instead of lifting him up with pride, is calculated to give him a just view of the vast height before him, and of his own humble attainments and comparative insignificance. Sir Isaac Newton is said to have remarked in the latter part of his life, that the more he became acquainted with the works of God, the more he saw to investigate, and the less he esteemed his own attainments. The same will be true to a considerable extent with all who tread in his footsteps. Indeed so invariable is this rule, that when an individual manifests a very great degree of pride in the attainments which he has made, he may safely be set down as having many things yet to learn.

In order to note the comparative influence of ignorance and education to promote pride in a minister, let us consider an example such as may frequently be met with. Here is a church, perhaps in some obscure part of the country, the members of which have never enjoyed the advantages of a thorough education. Among them there grows up a young man of piety and zeal, who possesses a strong mind and a good faculty of telling others what he knows. His brethren, beliveing him called to the ministry, give him a license to preach. The question immediately arises in his own mind, and the minds of others, whether he shall enter at once upon ministerial labor, or shall first take a few years to secure the benefits of a liberal education. It is decided to call him at once to ordination, and he acquiesces in the decision. His lot is cast among uneducated men, who look up to him with respect on account of his superior natural talents. He finds that he can preach quite acceptably without much knowledge of Scripture or any thing else. His brethren seem to be satisfied with him, and he is therefore satisfied with himself. He compares himself with those around him, and congratulates himself on his superiority. How long do you think it will be before that man will expect and claim preëminence in the church, and make a serious disturbance if it is not awarded him? His ignorance will not secure him against pride, as you will very soon learn if you attempt to oppose his views and movements. But what would have been the effect, if he had been placed in some institution of learning, and for a time subjected to severe discipline? He would have been brought into contact with his superiors in knowledge, if not in talents; and the influence of daily intercourse with them would probably have made him so dissatisfied with his attainments that he would have spared no pains to increase them. Even if he had remained in the institution only long enough to produce this effect, his subsequent course would have been perhaps quite different, and vastly more useful.

We will close this article with a single paragraph from a letter of Rev. Wm. Dean, Baptist Missionary at Hong Kong, China, from which it will be seen that what has been said of the importance of education to the minister at home, is equally applicable to a minister who would labor successfully in a foreign field:—

"If any one doubts the position that missions require the agency of educated men, they are invited to look into the field now occupied, and compare the results of the educated with those of the uneducated missionaries. The first thing to be done by the missionary on reaching the heathen is to learn their language. Here the learned man, other things being equal, will perform the task in much less time than the unlearned, who has had little or no experience in the study of languages. In the second place, if knowledge is power, the man of education will use the knowledge more efficiently in persuading men to turn to God, than the ignorant man. In the third place, the educated man, by his mental discipline, and enlightened mind, in forming his plans of usefulness, will be more likely to take a sober consistent view of things, while the uneducated are more visionary in their plans, and likely to spend their strength for naught. In the fourth place, an uneducated minister is likely to bring the enterprise into disrepute among the heathen, and involve himself in difficulty and discord with his associates. Were you to go through the mission field and select those who are the most self-willed, the most domineering, the most vain-glorious, the most eccentric, and the most successful in sowing the seeds of discord among brethren, you would as a general thing find them the least educated. If there is a position in the world which requires a thorough, varied, and finished education, it is that of a missionary to the heathen, for, in addition to the before-mentioned considerations, he has to do with all sorts of men, from the highest to the lowest, and therefore needs a thorough mental training, and a good stock of general information, in order to fit him for every exigency. The cause of Christ among the heathen is already suffering seriously by the visionary projects and inefficient efforts of uneducated men, sustained at the expense of the church, who, while they are doing some good, are also doing much harm. The heathen require picked men—not a pick of the poorest, but —a pick of the best."

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN FRANCE.

All eyes are now turned toward France, and the question is anxiously asked, What will be the influence of the Revolution upon religious liberty? Our conviction is strong, that its influence will be favorable. It is pretty generally agreed, we believe, that an important object of the former government was to establish and propagate Romanism. To its fostering care must be attributed the late revival of Catholicism in France. Its ships have repeatedly borne Catholic priests to heathen shores, and forced them on the people under the cover of guns. Protestants have in numerous instances been subjected to persecution by officers of government, who were but the tools of Catholic Bishops. But these things are now at an end. The dynasty which patronized and encouraged them has fallen. Herein the friends of religious liberty may rejoice. But then the question arises whether any guaranties are afforded that the new government will pursue a more liberal course. We think there are. One of the last acts of M. Crimieux, a trusted leader of the reform party in the dissolved Chamber, and now a member of the Government, is said to have been to vindicate the claim to liberty of worship of the persecuted Baptists of Soissons. This fact alone is a sort of guaranty. And there are others, among which is noted a programme of the wishes of the people who established the new government, wherein is maintained "absolute freedom of religion; absolute independence of conscience; and the church to be independent of the state." This shows in part what the Revolution was for; and if the leaders are true to their principles, we can not doubt that the influence of the Revolution will be most favorable to religious liberty.

THE VAUDOIS.

The valleys of Piedmont are noted for having often been the retreat and abode of true Christianity, when it was driven by persecution from nearly every other part of Europe. A hater of the Voudois, who wrote long ago, in giving an account of them, says that "poor as they are, they are content, and live separate from the rest of mankind. One thing is astonishing, that persons externally so savage and rude, should have so much moral cultivation. They can all read and write. They understand French, so far as is needful for the understanding of the Bible, and the singing of psalms. You can scarce find a boy among them who cannot give you an intelligible account of the faith which they profess; in this, indeed, they resemble their brethren of the other valleys; they pay tribute with a good conscience, and the obligation of this duty is peculiarly noted in the confession of their faith. If, by reason of the civil wars, they are prevented from doing this, they carefully set apart the sum, and at the first opportunity pay it to the king's taxgatherers."

Such was their character of old. They have not probably depreciated to any great extent since. Their present number is estimated at twenty thousand. We rejoice to learn from a correspondent of the New York Evangelist, that Charles Albert, the reigning King of Sardinia, treats them with much more lenity than most of his predecessors. At Turin, his capital, he has permitted the opening of a chapel, the pulpit of which is occupied by a Vaudois pastor. He has granted also their petition for a separate hospital, where their sick may be free from the annoyance of the proselyting priesthood, and with this the liberty to make collections for the same —a liberty which has resulted in their obtaining funds enough for two hospitals. He has further allowed their young men to pass into Germany to receive a theological education, and thence return to their valleys; and approbated the exertions of the English philanthropist, Col. Beckwith, in establishing a college for them at Tour, and founding numerous schools. In a visit to the valleys, in 1844, he gave them, moreover, a signal proof of his confidence. The occasion was that of consecrating a Romish church and convent at La Tour, to be occupied by the holy fathers of the military order of Saints Maurice and Lazarus, of which order the Prince was Grand Master. The planting of such an establishment at the very centre of influence in the Vaudois country, naturally enough alarmed the poor people, so often the victims of Papal vengeance. The Prince, however, soothed their anxieties as to the intentions of Government, by declining the military escort provided for his journey, and casting himself upon his Vaudois subjects, saying, "I have no need of a guard in the midst of the Vaudois." These received him with great enthusiasm; and he, in return, caused their military to pass in review before him, and saluted each of their standards. At the same time he received with distinguished attention a deputation from their "Table." Finally, in commemoration of this visit, the Prince caused a beautiful fountain to be erected at the entrance of La Tour, with this inscription: "The King, Charles Albert, to the people who received him with so much affection."

Notwithstanding these expressions of royal favor, they still remain under some restrictions. They are not permitted to acquire movable property out of the limits of their valleys; and as the population is already too large for the resources of the valleys, those who would acquire property are compelled to emigrate from the kingdom. They may not receive academical titles, and consequently neither the offices nor employments for which such titles are pre-requisite. They may not practice the liberal professions out of their country; nor teach, nor hold their worship, nor even reside out of it, except in certain cases specified.

Exulting in Freedom.—A letter from a pastor in one of the valleys of Piedmont, published in an English journal, contains the following specimon of the grateful enthusiasm of the long persecuted Waldenses, on receiving the news of the recent grant of toleration by the King of Sardinia. He says; "Glory to God, and gratitude to King Charles Albert. Our complete emancipation, civil and political, was signed yesterday by his Majesty, the King of Sardinia."

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF BRO. CARPENTER.

One suggestion here relative to the future. By and by our mission will need a recruit of men. Some of us who are here will die, perhaps before we shall be able to do much. But if we should live long, there is room for more laborers. I would suggest the propriety of fixing upon our future missionaries in season and with deliberation. If first-rate men can be found, it will cost no more to send them here and support them here, than it would to send and sustain indifferent ones. I am thoroughly convinced that a man of the right stamp will do more in this field than half a dozen men with moderate qualifications. And is the enterprise not of sufficient importance to call forth the energies of some of our best young men? I suppose all this is useless talk; for I know very well your views on this point. I write to show you that I agree with you most heartily. Were I to describe such a man as I would be glad to welcome here, it should be one possessed of natural good sense, (a great qualification,) a good memory, and a well-balanced mind, learning, and piety. If the candidate or candidates should be selected a year or two before sailing, he could shape his studies with special reference to the missionary work, also his outfit could be obtained with less expense, and I think a passage could be secured from New York to Shanghai about as cheap as from New York to Canton.

NOTES OF A TOUR IN PENNSYLVANIA.

March 12, 1848.—Called on the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Ulysses, Potter Co. Here our brethren were mourning over the desolations of Christ's Kingdom among them. I tried to preach in that neighborhood and those adjoining nearly every evening until the 24th. Our congregations were full, and a deep religious feeling was manifest on the part of members of all Christian denominations in that vicinity. A goodly number of backsliders were reclaimed, and sinners seemed much troubled on account of their sins. Some very earnest inquiries were made relative to the Sabbath. Surely here is one of the most inviting fields for missionary labor.

March 29th.—Reached the navigable waters of the Allegany River. The principal subject of talk at this season of the year, was about going down the river, as the waters were high and the roads impassable. Out of curiosity I stepped on board of a raft, (piloted by an Indian,) and went down the river with the multitude. I had often heard that this was the place to see and hear the wickedness of the wicked. I now believe it. Should I say, that in one day and a half, while on the river, I heard more profane swearing than I ever heard before in my life, I should only repeat what others have said who are much older than myself.

March 30.—A very pleasant day among many of the raftsmen, until near its close, when it was reported that one of those awful disasters had occured which are by them more feared than all others, viz., a stave on a mill-dam. By this means a young man named Gardy was struck by an oar-stem and thrown into the eddy. Twice he rose to the surface, and uttered such cries for help as none but a drowning man could utter. A skiff was immediately thrown off for his assistance, but owing to the quick water it was impossible to reach him, and he sunk where he will not probably be found until low water. It was also reported that in the evening a man was instantly killed by a blow from one of the clasing oars in Warren Eddy.

Facts about Prisoners.—Charles Spear, one of the Secretaries of the Prisoner's Friend Society, says that the number of prisoners now confined in the United States, is about 30,000, of whom about 5000 are in State prison. The number discharged yearly from all the prisons averages about 20,000, of whom some 2000 are convicts discharged from State prisons. There are 12,000 woman in prison. In most of the States women may be sent to State prison; but in Massachusetts they can only be sent to jails and houses of correction. A large number of the prisoners are young, and some of them quite small boys. The State of Massachusetts employs an agent to look after discharged prisoners, and authorizes him to expend a certain amount of money in each case to aid the man in obtaining employment. Some provision of a similar character ought to be made in every State, so that the discharged convicts may not have occasion to say, as one has said, that to find all friendship cold, all natural affection withered, all avenues to proper employment closed, all means or hopes of recovering his former position destroyed, makes a worse prison outside than within the walls.

The London Mission at Shanghai.—The London Missionary Society has two chapels at Shanghai. At the chapel within the city walls, four services are held on every Sunday, one being in English, and three in Chinese. The other chapel is connected with the hospital, and is located on the mission ground out of the city, where one service is held in Chinese on Sunday evening, and also a daily service for the patients. Thus a great amount of labor in the way of preaching is performed each week. But this is not all; they have a printing press, which is driven by a bullock instead of steam; and at each service, however numerously attended, they present every hearer with something in the form of a tract, this being often the chapter which forms the basis of the discourse. There are also other services, and a school for boys. Notwithstanding so many learn and read the word, there is no particular interest manifest as yet, and but few if any conversions have taken place.

Translation of the Chinese New Testament.—A letter from Mr. Carpenter, under date of Nov. 26th, informs us that the Committee appointed to revise the present Chinese translation of the New Testament, after spending several months in a discussion respecting the proper Chinese word to express the name of God, had concluded to postpone until the first of January any further attempts to become agreed. In the mean time each party was left at liberty to publish what might seem good to it on the subject. It is thought that the difficult question will have to be decided by the body of Protestant missionaries in China. The Bible Societies, we believe, require that the translation be the work of the whole body, or meet with their approval, before its publication will be undertaken.

Baptist Missionaries in Burnah.—The New York Recorder says that the letters from Burmah by the last overland mail, give a melancholy account of the health of several missionaries. A letter from the Rev. Mr. Haswell, dated Dec. 23, says that the Rev. Mr. Stevens had been very ill of fever, but was convalescent. Mr. and Mrs. Wade left for America, via England, Dec. 20th. Mr. Howard was suffering much from the liver complaint, and was urged strongly by his physicians to leave for America, both on his own and his wife's account. Mrs. Stilson also was very feeble, and they were afraid they should lose her. Mr. Haswell also communicates the melancholy fact that his eyes are so diseased that he can read or write only for a short time, and his wife is so feeble that the physicians and her friends advise her to return to this country. He asks, "What will become of the mission, and who will come to take the place of the dead and the dying? Do the friends in America pray for us?"

Departure of Missionaries.—The American Missionary Association have just sent two Missionaries to Kaw Mendi, West Africa. Rev. Geo. Thompson, and Mr. A. J. Carter, both of them at some time members of the Mission Institute, Quincy, Illinois, sailed from the city in the bark Adorio, on the 8th inst. They take with them a printing press and materials for publishing books and tracts at the mission.

This mission has been under the immediate care of Rev. W. Raymond, whose death was noticed some time since. At the time of his death there were about one hundred scholars at the Mission School, some of whom have made good proficiency in reading and other studies. The Committee of the Association intend to strengthen tne mission still farther, and to prosecute with vigor the enterprise so happily commenced.

Baptist Missionary Union.—Several weeks ago we mentioned the fact that the Baptist Missionary Union would need to receive $24,000 in the months of February and March, to enable it to meet its engagements for the year which then closed, and that there were fears that so large a sum could not be raised. We are glad to learn, however, that these fears were groundless. The receipts in donations and legacies during the month of March alone were $27,064 39; and for the two months of February and March more than $30,000.

The French Monarchy and the Condemned Baptists.—A foreign correspondeut of the N. Y. Recorder says it is a very remarkable fact that the persecution of our Baptist brethren in the department of L'Aisne led to the overthrow of the French monarchy. They did not, indeed, attempt to avenge themselves, nor did the Parisians design to avenge them, yet their condemnation occasioned the downfall of the government. You are aware, probably, that the law which was brought into operation against them was not originally intended to restrict religious meetings, but meetings for political purposes. This law had not been acted upon, I believe, for many years, and it was considered doubtful whether a prosecution under it could be sustained. But when the Supreme Court at Paris had confirmed the decision of the Court of Amiens, and pronounced the meetings of the Baptists illegal, I am informed that Guizot said, "This is the law for me." This decision led him to the determination to prohibit the great Reform Dinner, the prohibition of which was the immediate occasion of his fall and that of his master. This, at least, is certain, that it was the same law which had been applied, at the instigation of a Romish Bishop, to put down the Baptists, which the government attempted to enforce against those political opponents who have proved too strong for them.

A Self-supporting Colporteur.—We have once or twice referred to the case of a Baptist Deacon who left a comfortable home in Western New York to labor as a colporteur in the Far West. Here is a farther account of his labors, given by a clergyman in Iowa:—

"Dea. Daniel Gorham, as he informed me, arrived in Wisconsin Nov. 18, 1847, and received his first package of books in January following. Since that time he has sold in Wisconsin between eight and nine hundred dollars worth, including Bibles and Testaments. He has also given away in the meantime from seventy to eighty thousand pages of tracts. Recently he has spent some four weeks in Iowa, during a part of which period he sold in the two counties of Jones and Delaware—among the newest in the State—about seventy dollars worth of his well-selected religious volumes. Since leaving Perry, N. Y., in the fall of 1847, he has traveled between five and six thousand miles—and all this in his own carriage, without salary, selling all books at their market Philadelphia prices, or under—drawing from his own private resources to meet unavoidable expenses incurred in this work of toil, expense, and privation. Has the East any more such men? If so, we have abundant opportunity for the widest and most efficient exercise of their Christian philanthropy and benevolence."

A New Mission Proposed.—The Quarterly Paper of the Foreign Evangelical Society proposes a mission to Ireland, and speaks in the following strain of the prospects before it:—

"What a field does Ireland present, at this moment, for Christian effort, wisely directed! and from whom would such an effort proceed more appropriately, or with greater prospect of success, than from American Christians? We are glad to find that An American Mission to Ireland begins to be looked upon by well-informed and reflecting men among us, as not altogether so Utopian an affair as some ignorant people—who know nothing of the relative importance of countries and the influence which they exert upon us—are ready to pronounce it to be. We are quite sure that this matter will at no distant day, be viewed in its true light, and its vast importance rightly appreciated."

Hospital for the Insane in Illinois.—The Legislature of Illinois are about to establish a Hospital for the Insane, in the vicinity of Chicago. The site selected for the edifice comprises twenty acres of land, situated two miles north of the city, and half a mile from the lake shore. The edifice will be an elegant and commodious structure, built of stone, in the Norman Gothic style of architecture, and in its interior arrangements adapted to the peculiar wants of the Insane. When completed, it will be sufficiently capacious to accommodate 130 patients. A part of this permanent edifice is expected to be in readiness for the reception of patients early this spring.

A Difficult Case.—The Quakers of Virginia seem to be placed in a peculiar relation to the laws of Virginia, The Yearly Meeting of Baltimore, to which they belong, has charged all its members to educate the free colored peopeople. The laws of Virginia forbid it; and the Friends have addressed a memorial to the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, asking liberty to pursue the advice of their Yearly Meeting. If liberty is not given, it is difficult to say what course the Friends will take.

Baptisms among the Cherokees.—A letter from Rev. Evan Jones to Rev. I. M. Allen, dated March 2, gives the cheering information, that since the 11th of April, last year, one hundred and twenty-one persons in the Cherokee nation have been baptized on a profession of their faith in the Redeemer. There are now many serious inquirers at most of the preaching places.

Halls of the Montezumas; or Mexico in Ancient and Modern Times; containing a concise history of the ancient and modern Races, Antiquities, and especially its splendid Palaces and Halls of State, also its Geography, Governernment, Institutions, Mines, Minerals, and Churches, together with the conquest by Cortes, and a sketch of the late war with the United States, including the Treaty of Peace, &c. &c. Such is the title of a work of 136 pages just issued by J. C. Burdick, 162 Nassau street. Its character is sufficiently indicated by its title.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Senate.

On Monday, April 10, Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, presented sundry abolition petitions, which were, on motion, laid on the table. The same gentleman also presented a memorial, numerously signed, praying Congress to legislate in favor of the doctrines of the Wilmot Proviso, which he moved be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which he advocated by some remarks. He also presented a memorial in favor of the United States, prohibiting the establishment of a monarchy and slavery on this continent, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A Message was received from the President, communicating to the Senate (in obedience to a call previously made upon him) the number of troops sent to Mexico—the number of killed and wounded, with the number that had died of disease, which was duly received and ordered to be printed.

On Tuesday, April 11, Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, presented the petition of John S. Skinner praying that Congress would make an appropriation for the establishment of an institution for giving suitable instruction in minerology, engineering, road-making, and in agriculture. After some remarks, this petition was received, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee of Agriculture.

The bill providing for the repair of the dam at the mouth of the Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river, was passed. The bill conferring judicial powers on American Consuls resident in China and Turkey was made the special order of the day for the 19th inst.

House of Representatives.

The joint resolutions from the Senate, congratulating the French people on the success of the late revolution, were passed. Mr. Horace Mann appeared, was qualified, and took his seat as successor of John Quincy Adams.

Liberal Bequests.—The will of Elizabeth Huxham, of Philadelphia, which was recently probated, contains the following liberal bequests:—

$2,500 to the Trustees of the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, commonly called the Old School, located at Princeton, N. J., to be applied to the foundation of a scholarship in that institution.

To the Trustees of the Board of Education of the said Presbyterian Church in the United States the sum of $500, to be applied by said Board to the education of pious and indigent youth for the gospel ministry.

To the Trustees of the Board of Missions of the General Assembly of the said Presbyterian Church $500, for the uses and under the direction of said Board of Missions according to the provisions of their charter.

To the Treasurer of the said Presbyterian Church Board of Publication in the United States, $1,000, to be applied by the said Board for the Publication of Religious Tracts and Books.

To the Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions of the said Presbyterian Church, $500, to be applied for the Foreign Missionary operations of said Church.

Newspapers in Colleges.—The learned professor of history and philosophy in the South Carolina College, Dr. Francis Lieber, is in the habit of delivering regular newspaper lectures. Every fortnight the students assemble for this purpose, and are expected to be well acquainted with the chief events, both foreign and domestic, that may have transpired during the preceding two weeks, in the political, literary, and scientific worlds. They are first examined according to a plan which systematically embraces all countries, and are not only required to know the events, but are directed to use books of reference, so as to give a fair account of their developments. After this, the Professor takes up one of the chief subjects and lectures upon it, avoiding, with great skill, the dangers of party politics. In his political ethics he imposes the duty of reading carefully the newspapers of the day, and teaches the most profitable method of doing so. Thus he trains up the young men under his instruction, to be enlightened and practical statesmen. [Journal of Commerce.

Small Compensation.—In the Circuit Court sitting in Ulster county last week, Dewitt Clinton Winchell obtained a verdict for $25 damages against Jared J. Chambers and Elizabeth his wife, in an action for breach of promise on the part of the lady, made by her to the plaintiff prior to her marriage with the defendant Chambers. It was proved on trial that the plaintiff had paid his addresses to Elizabeth for five or six years, and his visits were continued until within a few days of her marriage—that she had repeatedly declared she was engaged to be married to plaintiff—that they rode out together, and kept company with each other. It was farther shown that Chambers had said he knew of the engagement, as Elizabeth had told him all about it—that he was determined to defeat Winchell, if he could—that it might cost him one, two, three, four or five hundred dollars, but if it did, it should go as free as water.

A Fatal Carouse.—A Paris paper says, in the devastation and burning of the chateau of Neuilly, some bandits rushed into the apartments, whilst others went to the cellars. The latter there found wine of all descriptions, and a cask of rum, which they broke open. Some instants after, they were all drunk, and then a terrific battle took place between them, their weapons being bottles. At length they fell to the ground overcome by intoxication or by wounds. Meanwhile the men who went into the apartments, ravaged and pillaged them completely, after which they set them on fire, and the whole building was soon in flames. A short time after, the men in the cellars were either burned to death or suffocated. On Sunday, from one hundred to one hundred and twenty dead bodies were dug out.

SUMMARY.

A letter from Camargo, dated 13th of March, says: "I have just returned from a most melancholy scene. Seven soldiers were sentenced to death for desertion. Three were first brought out, kneeled on their coffins, and were shot. The other four were then brought forward, kneeled, bandages tied on their eyes, the words, 'Ready! present!'—and—glorious news it was—the poor fellows were reprieved! They all stood it like majors. One of them fainted when the bandage was taken from his eyes."

The office of the Westfield (Mass.) Standard was entered a few nights since by means of a false key, and all the standing matter knocked into pi. Six cases of type, being nearly all the type in the office that was not standing, were poured in a pile upon the floor. Not content with this amount of mischief, the rascal or rascals put the subscription list, account books, &c., into the stove and burnt them up. No clue to the author of the outrage has been found.

Notice has been issued by the Post Office authorities, that during the ensuing summer, mails will be transmitted between Liverpool and North America once a week by the British contract mail packets, which will leave Liverpool for Boston and New York, alternately, on every Saturday, and will be dispatched from Boston and New York alternately, on their return voyages, every Wednesday.

On Friday, the 7th inst., Mr. J. T. Lee, Judge of the Court of Probate in Madison, Conn., received a severe wound in his breast from the kick of a horse. The horse had become enraged by the blow of a whip, and kicked with such violence as to break two of Mr. Lee's ribs, and force him through the air to the distance of more than six feet. It is hoped the blow will not prove fatal.

We learn from the Centreville (Md.) Times, that on Sunday night, April 2, a large boat containing eighteen negroes, who proved to be runaways from the Western States, landed at Kent Island, where the latter were subsequently apprehended, carried to Centreville, and lodged in the county jail. It appears they are from Anne Arundel and Calvert Counties, and supposed when they struck Kent Island, that they had reached Delaware.

A fearful conspiracy was discovered at St. Domingo on the 5th of February. The Minister of the Interior, General Puello, had false keys made of the arsenal and fort, and had won over to him most of the military. They were to have murdered the President and hoisted the Haytien flag. He and his brother have been shot, with two others, and there are several more to be tried.

The old State House bell, which rung out in merry peals when the Declaration of Independence was announced, and which was accidentally cracked about three years ago in an attempt to ring it, is to be deposited in the Hall of Independence in Philadelphia. It will be placed upon a suitable pedestal, under a glass case, and will remain a permanent fixture of the venerated room.

A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator says that his late sown wheat on corn ground was much "winter killed," that is, thrown out by frost, which he chiefly remedied by using a heavy roller pressing the half-killed roots with the ground which caused them to vegetate. Such wheat yielded about twenty bushels per acre.

The strength of ropes and cords depends on the fineness of the strands. Damp cordage is stronger than dry. Silk cords have three times the strength of those of flax of the same diameter; and a remarkable increase of strength is obtained by gluing the threads together. A hempen cord, the threads of which are glued, is stronger than the best wrought iron.

A celebrated rock in Ireland, known as the rock of Cashel, recently fell to the ground, after defying the storms that have beat upon it since the deluge. An ancient prophecy was connected with this rock, the substance of which was, that a great revolution would occur in England the same year the rock should fall.

A melancholy accident happened on the South Carolina Railroad near Charleston, by the explosion of a boiler of a locomotiove, by which accident the following persons were killed: George Artip, Henry Cammer, and a fireman—who are all married men.

The Albany Spectator says: "The work of grace and mercy is advancing with mighty power among the flock of Rev. E. P. Stimpson, in East Greenbush, Rensselaer Co., and there is hope that between fifty and sixty have passed from death unto life."

Papers from England say that the total number of slaves captured from 1810 to 1846, and for which the sum of £1,061,801 has been paid as bounty to captors out of the public purse, amounts to 116,862, all of whom were landed alive.

The use of horse flesh as human food is increasing rapidly in Berlin; during the month of January 147 horses were killed for the purpose, producing about 61,000 lbs. of meat. The horses were old, worn out animals.

In giving Indian names to new Territories, it may be well to ascertain their meaning. The translation of the name of the new Territory of Minesota, it is said, means skunk! and consequently her population will be called skunks.

Judge Morse, of the Supreme Court, recently decided that Aaron Bradly, a man of color, who had appeared as counsel in a case before adjudicated in another Court, whereon a motion to set aside judgment was now made, was incompetent to act as counsel on account of his complexion!

Some of the journals in this country think that the French are not fitted for self-government. The fact that three of the highest places in the gift of the Republic are occupied by editors, would seem to show that the people know enough to appoint good men to office, at any rate.

In the spring of 1830, Charles X. took the Dey of Algiers prisoner, and in July of the same year he was himself sent to Holyrood to die. In January, 1848, Louis Philippe took the Dey's successor, Abd-el-Kader, prisoner, and in February King Louis was sent into exile.

A letter from Paris says that the procession at the funeral of the people killed in the Revolution, was the greatest procession the world ever saw:—"First, came 100,000 soldiers; then followed the people, men and women, old and young, to the number of 500,000. The distance from the Madeline Church to the Column of July is three miles; the Boulevards, on an average, are two hundred feet in width; and this distance was filled with one solid mass of human beings, together with every avenue leading into them. Such a pageant I never before saw, and never expect to see again."

The Delaware Gazette says, We notice that many political exiles from France are leaving this and many other countries for their native land. Among them is Mr. Bonaford, now and for some years past, a resident of Hancock, in this county. Mr. Bonaford was in our village a few days since for the purpose of making arrangements to leave for France during the present week. We understand that Mr. B. was in prison eleven months with four members of the present municipal government, and at the time of his escape to this country, was hotly pursued by the emissaries of the king.

The committees of the New York Legislature jointly state, that the 'aggregate cost of constructing all the canals in this State thus far is about $31,000,000. The amount of tolls collected on all the canals in 1847, was $3,605,380. Deducting all charges against them for superintendence and ordinary repairs and the collection of tolls, and the result is, that they are paying more than nine and three-tenths per cent per annum on the capital invested in their construction.'

Rev. Daniel Parrish, of the Methodist church, Newark, N. J., while attending a conference at Little Falls, took a long walk in a boot borrowed to supply the place of a leaky one, suffered much from its being too tight, and was seized with rheumatism in the leg, followed by mortification, amputation at the knee joint, and death. The papers report that the medical treatment throughout was judicious.

In the Common Pleas at Keene, N. H., young Mr. Farr has obtained a verdict for $1000 damages against Mr. Ladd and wife, for breach of promise of marriage. In the fall of 1845 the lady, then Miss Mary Wales, was engaged to the plaintiff, a Bellows Falls clerk; in July, 1846, she became acquainted with her husband, a New York merchant, and married him three months afterwards.

There are no newspapers in Syria or Persia, and in Egypt, the Barbary States, and other countries including 40,000,000, speaking the Arabic language, there is but one newspaper in the native tongue, and but three or four in the French or English, showing that there is nothing in Mahomedism favorable to general improvement.

The wires for the telegraph to Philadelphia, have been stretched across the Hudson. They are raised two hundred feet above the water. They are carried across a few miles above New York.

McNulty, the chap who has fled from New York with $40,000 of his employer's funds, is said to have had a salary of $5000 a year, with privileges worth $2000 more. He was penurious, yet had probably been engaged in some wild speculation or in gambling.

Col. John J. Johnson of Warren Co. Va. was found guilty of murder in the second degree at Font Royall, in that County, on the 1st inst. and sentenced to 7 years and 6 months imprisonment in the Penitentiary. Col. J. was a candidate for the Legislature two years ago.

The newspapers report a recent law-suit at Northampton, the parties being Rev. George Waters vs. Deacon Increase Gilbert, on an action for slander, charging that Gilbert had represented that Waters had altered the church records in relation to his salary, and made them read $500 instead of 150. After the examination of a great many witnesses, and a heated trial, the jury gave a verdict against Waters.

M. Verdee, a wealthy landed proprietor, who has lately died at Paris at the age of eighty-nine, has lately left, by will, the sum of 1,500,000fs, for founding an asylum for aged persons in reduced circumstances, especially for professional men, such as physicians, lawyers, professors, literary persons, and savants.

Of 106,000 emigrants, says the Liverpool Mercury, who lately crossed the Atlantic for America, 6000 perished during their voyage, 4100 on their arrival, 5200 were sent to the hospital, and of those who settled in the towns 1900 died.

The number of students attending the Mecical Colleges in Philadelphia, during the winter session just closed was 1207. It is said that they bring about half a million dollars annually to that city.

The number of persons wounded at Paris in the three days of February, and received at the hospitals, amounted to 638, of whom 621 were men and 17 women. Of that number 253 still remain in the hospitals.

Lately, a Roman Catholic Priest, a strict tetotaler, refused, it is said, to read the burial service of his church over the body of a parishioner who had died of delirium tremens, on the ground that he had committed suicide.

Rev. E. T. Taylor, so universally known as "Father Taylor," has suffered an attack of paralysis, and is lying in a condition which awakens the deep solicitude of his friends.

The clause in the new constitution of Illinois giving negroes the right of suffrage has been adopted by the people, by a vote of 9,313 to 751.

The House of Representatives have purchased of Mr. King, the Boston sculptor, his bust of J. Q. Adams. It is to be placed in the Speaker's room directly over the spot were the venerable old man breathed his last.

A Homeopathic College is about to be established in Philadelphia, the Legislature having passed at its last session, a bill chartering one. A meeting to make the preliminary arrangements is to be held on the 27th inst.

Mr. James Erwin, grandson of Henry Clay, shot himself at St. Charles, New Orleans, on the morning of the 3d inst. No cause is assigned for the rash act. He was perfectly dead when discovered.

At Mount Prospect, N. J., on the night of the 11th inst., a fire broke out in a frame building after the family had retired, which consumed the building with the family of the tenant, a Mr. Stur, who alone escaped. Mr. S. was alarmed by a colored man, who threw stones against the building for the purpose of waking him, when he jumped from the second story to the ground, after requesting his wife to follow him; but from some reason she was unable to do so, and remained in with her three children, the eldest being 17 years of age, and they all perished in the flames together!

A telegraphic dispatch, dated at St. Louis, April 12, says that the steamer Charter Oak, on the previous evening, was totally destroyed by fire, and the first Engineer and four others perished in the flames. Upward of 800 tons of valuable freight were likewise destroyed, upon which there is an insurance of $30,000 in this city and Cincinnati. The Charter Oak had also on board 180 tons of hemp consigned to the several houses in New Orleans, upon which there is no insurance.

The Providence Journal gives the number of deaths in that city for March last, at eighty-seven, none of whom were over eighty years of age. Consumption appears to have been the chief destroyer, though nine are set down as having died of unknown diseases.

Letters from Cuba state that there has not been a drop of rain on the north side of that Island for four months. The Sugar Cane Crop was coming on badly, and the young rattoons for the next crop were looking very sickly.

The Germans of this City have subscribed $2,000 in behalf of the revolutionary movements in Germany, and to aid the widows and orphans of those who have fallen in the recent struggles.

The Courrier des Etats Unis says a letter has been received by the Washington from a person who is very intimate with Louis Philippe, which states that the ex-king has come to the determination to fix his future residence in the United States with his family.

Louis Philippe is said to have recently invested about a million of dollars in New York, and it is said that he has rather more than ten millions of dollars in England. So he will probably not have to resort to school keeping this year.

Miss Caroline E. Field, a young lady of Westfield, Mass., about 25 years of age, committed suicide at the house of her intended husband's father in Southampton, on Monday, the 3d inst. Jealousy was probably the cause of the fatal act.

Lloyd's List contains the following, under date of Jersey, March 16: "The Chinese Junk Keying, Capt. Kellett, from Boston for London, was boarded off the coast of France, and brought in here to-day, with loss of boats, sails, &c., and one man overboard."

Ex-Governor King, of Bath, Maine, as we learn from the Bath Times, received a severe injury in the head on Monday, by a fall in the street occasioned by a sudden vertigo, to which he has been subject for some time.

The ancient dwelling house in Deerfield, now about one hundred and sixty years old, which was assailed but not destroyed by the French and Indians in 1704, and still bears the marks of their ferocity, is, it is said, about to be demolished by its present owner.

There was a fire at Little Falls, N. Y., last week, by which considerable property was destroyed.

Pittsburgh, Pa., was the scene of several extensive fires on the 12th inst.

A slight shock of an earthqurke was felt in Zanesville, Ohio, and the region round about, on the 6th inst.

The average number of deaths in the City of New York, is 50 per day.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact a whole English Library fused down into one cheap book.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

GENTLE CHIDINGS.

BY EMMA S. M., OF BRISTOL, OLD ENGLAND.

Soft as snow upon the ground
Should our chidings fall around;
Kindly, gently should we speak;
Human nature is but weak—
Frail as flowers that frosts destroy,
And the winter-winds alloy;
But the soft snow cherishing,
Saveth such from perishing.

Howsoever bright and fair
Summer's sunny pinions are,
They will surely pass away;
Then will come the brighter day.
Winter days are many here;
Bright young hearts grow old and sere;
Hearts that erst with hope were throbbing,
Harsh words take not long in chilling.

Many, strong and full of life,
Sink beneath the cold world's strife.
Is it wonder? Any wrong
Quick is told by every tongue;
But a few, with fingers bright,
Point to noble acts, and right.
Forgotten oft the balmy spring,
Marked with scorn its withering.

Why not prop the weak flower up?
Fill with dew the drooping cup?
And what frost hath rent in twain,
Cover o'er with snow again.
Not neglect when rough winds blow—
Flowers would die if treated so.
Gently chide—while chiding, cherish;
Human hearts, like flowers, may perish.

ANOTHER REVOLUTIONARY HERO GONE.

Departed this life in Febuary last, at his residence in Albermarle county, Virginia, Richard Harrison, Senr., in the ninety-first year of his age; which melancholy intelligence, through some unaccountable delay, did not reach his friends in this region, until within a day or two past.

During the Revolutionary war Richard Harrison entered the Patriot Army, for the Southern Campaign, and was actively engaged in many of the battles fought in Virginia and South Carolina. Uniting to uncommon coolness, the most inflexible bravery and indomitable energy, he was distinguished for his readiness to perform any service for his country, however perilous. In the heat of the raging battle at Yorktown, he was stationed on the breastwork to give the cry, "A SHOT," whenever the enemy were about to fire a volley from their artillery batteries, that our little army might shield themselves, behind their imperfect embankments, from raking destruction. While in this exposed position, an emergency occurred which rendered it absolutely necessary for some one to descend without the intrenchment on the side immediately exposed to the enemy, where the balls were flying thickest and fastest; but such was his intrepidity, that he repaired in an instant to the spot, accomplished his errand, and returned to his post again unhurt, amid a redoubled shower of deadly missiles hurled by the enraged hosts.

This brave Patriot Hero has left behind him, his companion in life, now in her eighty-sixth year, (with whom he lived in holy wedlock sixty-four years,) and several children, one of whom, Elder John C. Harrison, until recently, was, for many years, the Pastor of the Baptist Church in this borough. He was a kind husband and an indulgent father, and ever sustained among all who knew him the highest character for stern integrity and unwavering veracity.

Thus are the veteran Patriots and Heroes of the war of Independence passing away, in rapid succession, from the stage of earthly existence. A little while longer and that noble race, that honored band, will become extinct, and their places here shall know them no more forever; but while a spark of true republicanism shall warm the breasts of their descendants, their virtues, their trials and their glorious achievements, will ever be cherished with emotions of liveliest gratitude, and their memories shall continue to command the homage of profound and exalted veneration throughout all the ages of time.

Passing away are fearful words to individuals and to nations—words of solemn, momentous import. As the loved and revered are removed, one by one, from the endeared fireside, we are called not only to walk through the bitter waters of poignant affliction, but our dwellings become sad and desolate in the absence of those who were a light to the eye and a guide to our feet. As the ruthless Destroyer makes his inexorable inroad in the midst of the family circle, the surviving kindred, by an instinctive impulse, spontaneously cluster together, to mingle their unaffected sympathies, and cling still closer at every repeated stroke of the insatiate Archer, to stay each other's hands under these rending bereavements, and comfort one another with renewed evidences of abiding affection and increasing devotion for each other's weal. And what is natural and befitting to the domestic circle, is, likewise, to no inconsiderable extent, becoming to fraternal compeers of the Republican Household, when one of the veteran Pillars is taken from the ranks of the tried and faithful. Cemented by a community of interest, and deriving all our peculiar blessings as a nation from one common source, the undaunted patriotism of our Revolutionary Sires, who have bequeathed the richest, the choicest heritage of earth to all their descendants, we are brought into perfect fraternity by the blood-bought Union, which guarantees Liberty and Equality to all its members. Liberty, Equality and Fraternity, recently reiterated by La Belle France, constitute the soul of every well and securely founded Republic; and the LAST in this instance may be justly deemed the FIRST; for without Fraternity—a perfect, reciprocal fraternity—the former cannot be appreciated, nor respected. If, then, we are true republicans, we are brethren of one great political family, bound together by the strongest ties of humanity, and are often, as in this instance, called upon to mourn the loss of an elder brother—a noble pioneer of human rights, one of a noble band rapidly passing away forever. Soon, very soon, we shall have no more of these honored, elder brothers to deplore their loss, and our house will be left desolate in the absence of those master-spirits, to whom we have been in the habit of looking up for counsel in our experiment of self-government, and whose presence was a never-failing fountain of wisdom, from whence we continually drew fresh supplies of the pure, unadulterated principles of true republicanism. But few of that bold and magnanimous race remain. Yet a few of the decayed fragments of the Revolution linger among us, bearing in their bodies, the scars of Bunker Hill, the stripes of the Jersey Prison Ship, the chilblains of Morristown and Valley Forge, and the gore of Monmouth, Brandywine and Yorktown. We are blessed in beholding the remnant of that glorious retinue—thrice blessed in the privilege of commingling with those toil-worn pilgrims, still hovering round the shrine of Independence, their valor raised, and keeping holy vigils at the portals of the Temple of Freedom. Each one of them is a hero of a romance—each pregnant with the tales of the "times that tried men's souls." History will emblazon their names, and Poetry embalm their chivalrous deeds. But these few are passing away; and we are admonished, to cherish and succor them, now, with filial, with grateful, with unremitting manifestations of affection and veneration. The lamented John Quincy Adams, on one occasion, in reference to these honored worthies, made the following beautiful and classical allusion:—"Like the Sibylline Leaves they become more valued as they are reduced in numbers." Their number is, now, few, very few—their generation has nigh come to an end; and should we suffer one of them to pine in neglect or sink beneath the load of accumulated years, without exercising the kindest sympathy in their welfare, and cherishing the evening of their days by a fervent gushing devotion to solace their latter end, it will, indeed, be a stain on the lustre of our national character—a stain on the age in which we live. Our mission, at this period, is, emphatically, to prove that Republics are grateful. No nation of the earth has ever had a charge committed to their affectionate regard and filial gratitude, like that which the freemen of this land have entrusted to them at this moment; and no people ever had a race so calculated to elicit generous solicitude and consecrated devotedness. Let us ever be true to ourselves, as well as true and faithful to the sacred charge; which demands but kind words and kind offices to soothe the decline of an expiring race; in honoring whom we shall honor ourselves the more.

SHOEMAKERS.

Many a man has risen from a shoemaker's bench, to stations of trust and honor. While mending the sole, they have improved the mind, and thus worked their way by degrees to seats of usefulness, to be distinguished by the rare qualities of their talents. Among others who worked at this trade, we may mention:

Anthony Turver, of Andover, England, who died in 1777, aged 75 years. While he was an apprentice, he gave his attention to learning, and became such a proficient in the learned languages, that in 1764 he completed a translation of the whole Bible in two volumes, folio—the fruit of 30 years' labor.

Thomas Holcroft, a talented dramatic writer, who died in 1809, was originally a shoemaker, as was his father before him. He published in two volumes quarto, his travels, in Germany and France.

Gifford, founder of the London Quarterly Review, was a shoemaker. He was a profound scholar and an elegant writer.

Robert Bloomfield, the author of that beautiful poem, 'The Farmer's Boy,' was a son of a tailor, and himself a shoemaker. He published several poems—among others of merit, might be mentioned, 'Wild Flowers,' and the 'Banks of the Wye.' He died in 1823, aged 57.

Benedict Baudonin, a learned man of the sixteenth century, was a shoemaker. He wrote a treatise on the shoemaking of the ancients, which he traced to Adam himself.

Hans Sachs, a distinguished German poet, was a shoemaker.

John G. Whittier, our own New England poet, served an apprenticeship at shoemaking.

Roger Sherman, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was a shoemaker, and rose by the force of his genius to a seat in Congress.

Joseph Pendrell, who died a few years since at Gray's Buildings, Manchester Square, London, was a shoemaker by trade. He was a profound scientific scholar, and left a valuable library.

David Pareus, the celebrated Professor of Theology at Heidelberg, Germany, spent a portion of his early life on a shoemaker's bench.

Linnæus, the distinguished botanist, was once an apprentice to a shoemaker in London. [D. C. Colesworth.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

A native of Geneva, in Switzerland, Mr. Gallatin emigrated to the United States in 1780, and served as a volunteer in the remaining years of the Revolutionary War. In 1783 he was a teacher in Harvard University. Afterwards a citizen of Pennsylvania, he assisted in revising the Constitution of that State in 1786, and served as a member of the Legislature in 1790. In 1794 he was chosen a Senator of the United States, and continued in Congress, in one house or the other, until the election of Mr. Jefferson to the Presidency, when, at the close of the last century, he became Secretary of the Treasury, which office he held during the entire eight years of Mr. Jefferson's administration. He was retained in Mr. Madison's cabinet until his appointment as one of the commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain. The names of John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay, affixed to the same treaty, remain with his to adorn the list of our living statesmen.

When Mr. Monroe became President, Mr. Gallatin was sent as Minister to France, where he remained some seven years. By Mr. Adams he was then transferred to the Court of St. James, and after his period of service there as ambassador of the United States, he retired from public life in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

Born in 1761, Mr. Gallatin is now eighty-seven years old. Venerable alike for age and for public services performed, he stands a distinguished representative of the statesmen of the early days of the Republic. He lives in history while still taking an active part in questions of national policy. The same mind which gave its earnest thoughts and sympathies in the cause of freedom, when a nation was struggling for birth, now contemplates with unabated interest the growth of that nation expanded into an empire; the eyes which beheld Hercules in the cradle now look upon him in his stalwart proportions, already exceeding the common stature and strength of mortals.

A CHILD'S BREAKFAST.

Conversing with a clergyman, whose post of duty is in St. George's-in-the-East, (the worst parish in London,) and whose petition for their help appeared in the Record a few days since, he mentioned the following circumstance, as illustrative of the character of the population amongst whom he was laboring: He happened one day, very recently, to be in a little shop in his district, in the early part of the morning. A little child, a poor, wan, half-starved thing, came in with a little mug, and asked for a farthing's worth of dried peas, with which she was duly supplied. He asked the shopkeeper what the child wanted with those peas? "Why, sir," said the man, "they are for her breakfast." "What do you mean?" the clergyman asked. "Why, sir, that child's parents are probably at the public house, or they may be gone out to work. And they find that the cheapest sort of a breakfast or substitute for a breakfast, which they can give that child, is just a farthing's worth of peas. Those peas she will take home, and put a little water over them. They will then be set by the fire, if there is any, or by a neighbor's fire, and, after a while, they will soften and swell, and thus she will get a sort of breakfast; and in all probability, that is all the food she will have till the parents return home in the afternoon. But so far is this from being a singular case, it is becoming quite a practice with parents who go out to work, or to beg, or to idle. I often sell to such children, in this one shop, as many as forty of these farthing's worth of peas, in the course of a single morning. That is, I have forty little customers, like that girl, in the course of an hour or two!"

FRUIT TREES.

Pruning.—Now is the time to commence in good earnest, to prune trees and vines. Give a good form to the trees—prune too little rather than too much—avoid large wounds if possible—cover them with composition. Peach trees tend to make long branches. Shorten them. Grape vines should be pruned early. Moderate bleeding, however, does not injure them.

Grafting.—Cut your grafts from thrifty shoots of young bearing trees; use grafting wax of about one part, by weight, of beeswax, two of tallow, and one of rosin. It is our impression that a very thin gutta percha is deserving of trial. It is accompanied with a paste to make it adhere. It would keep out water and air.

Budded Trees should now be cut down to the bud if it has taken.

Transplanting.—Get your ground well prepared; ample holes dug, and rich earth, or compost of earth and well rotted manure, all ready.

Caterpillars.—Examine your trees and cut off the limbs containing deposits of eggs.

Buy the best trees.—Every person owning land, should every year buy a few of the choicest fruits or have them grown ready to hand.

Wash for trees.—A weak solution of potash, or lye of wood ashes, applied to the trunks and branches of trees, destroys insects and gives a smooth bark. A mixture of lime and cow manure makes a good wash.

WASHINGTON LIBRARY.—We learn from creditable authority, that the Washington library has been recently purchased by Henry Stephens, Jr. Esq. of Vermont, who has for the last two or three years been rambling among the famous old libraries of Europe. The collection contains, we hear, about ten thousand volumes and pamphlets, nearly five hundred of which have the autographs of Washington on the title pages, and many others have the autographs and presentation notes of authors. We doubt not the collection is rich in the military and agricultural books which once belonged to the "Sage of Mount Vernon," and that there must also be in it very many tracts relating to the American Revolution, as well as to the ratification and adoption of the Federal Constitution.

We are not informed what disposition Mr. Stephens intends to make of these sacred relics of the Father of his country, but we are sure that no one knows better how to appreciate their value than himself. Understanding that he will not, on any condition, allow the library to be broken up and separated, we presume that he intends it for some European library—perhaps the British Museum, which he has enthusiastically aided in obtaining the most perfect collection of American history and literature in the world. [Boston Atlas.

GRASS SEED.—One of the most successful and economical modes of securing timothy seed, and which is practiced by some farmers to great advantage, is to reap the tops of the grass while yet standing in the meadow, to be afterwards thrashed and cleaned, and then the rest of the grass is mowed and manufactured into hay. The seed thus costs only the labor of cutting and thrashing, the remainder affords the usual crop of hay. Mixing manure with the soil is of the greatest consequence, and it is especially so, when applied in the latter part of the summer for the Wheat crop. Wheat will not bear an abundant supply of unmixed manure, buried in large masses and lumps beneath the soil. When manure, therefore, is spread, it should be harrowed at least half a dozen times well, with the surface soil, before the plow turns it under. It thus becomes thoroughly broken, the soil is made mellow, and the whole is well intermixed. So important is this operation, that one-half, or even one-third the manure will sometimes be equally efficacious where this practice is adopted.

LEGISLATIVE FOLLY.—Among the Ohio Black Laws is one rejecting the testimony of a colored witness in a suit where a white man is a party. The following is said to be the history of its origin as an Ohio statute, though it long before formed part of the inverted justice of the slave States: Before the enactment of this law, on a certain night, the Land Office at Cincinnati was broken into and robbed. The robber was seen emerging at a window by a negro. The white robber was indicted and found guilty, upon the testimony of the black man. A motion was made for a new trial and granted.—The case, upon some pretext, was continued at the next term, and then the lawyer who defended the accused, came to Columbus, and through his influence, procured the passage of the present law, and thus enabled the guilty to escape justice. Well may it be said of this law, if this is a true history, that "it was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity."

TO MAKE GOOD CHEESE.—The Stilton cheese is made by putting the night's cream without any portion of the skimmed milk, to the milk of the following morning; but those who wish to make it very fine add a still greater quantity of cream, and of course the richness of the cheese depends on the amount which is used. Butter is also said to be sometimes mixed with it. The rennet is then added without any coloring; and when the curd has come it is taken out without being broken, and put whole into a sieve or drainer, where it is pressed with weights until completely cleared of whey; when dry, it is put with a clean cloth, into a hooped chessant (or mould) and placed under the press, the outer coat being first salted; when sufficiently firm to be removed from this mould the cheese is placed upon a dry board, and tightly bound in a cloth, which is changed daily, in order to avoid all danger of cracks in the skin, until this is found to be tolerably well crusted; after which it is no longer used, and the cheese requires no other care than being frequently turned upside down and occasionally brushed.

THE FARMER AND THE ARTIST.—"Of what use is all your studying and your books?" said an honest farmer to an ingenious artist. "They don't make the corn grow nor produce vegetables for market. My Sam does more good with his plow in one month, than you can do with your books and papers in one year."

"What plow does you son use?" said the artist quietly.

"Why, he uses ——'s plow, to be sure. He can do nothing with any other. By using this plow we save half the labor, and raise three times as much as we did with the old wooden concern."

The artist turned over one of his sheets, and showed the farmer the drawing of his much-praised plow, saying with a smile, "I am the inventor of your favorite plow, and my name is ——."

The astonished farmer shook the artist heartily by the hand, and invited him to call at the farm-house, and make it his home as long as he liked.

OCCUPATIONS OF ENGLISH WOMEN.—In the census returns presented to Parliament, we find rather curious matter relating to the occupation of ladies. We find fifteen entered as 'authors,' and one as a 'professor of the belles letters.' Of actresses, three hundred and fifty-seven above twenty. Eighty-nine actresses are stated to be under twenty. Of curiosity dealers, the total return is forty-six, only six being of the fair sex. This disproportion, however, is amply redeemed by the statement that there are five hundred and eighty-four females connected with the post office. Four ladies are engaged as bayonet manufactures, and eighty-six shoe horses. Of botanists, we have in all sixty-five, two of them being ladies. The Scotch, too, profess to have thirteen female drovers following their cattle to the Southron's markets. Eighty females are entered as watch makers. Under the head 'newspaper editors, proprietors and reporters,' we find one hundred and twenty; only four, however, are mentioned as females above twenty.

THE DRESS OF CHILDREN.—It is unfortunately the fashion of many ladies of the present time to let their children be exposed with bare necks, arms, and legs, until the skin becomes mottled by a stagnant venous circulation (blueness of skin.) In such circumstances, tubercles (early consumption,) the seeds of so much malady, and the source of so many heart-pangs, are I am pursuaded, frequently developed, so that this cold surface is equally the source of present misery to the little child and of sorrow to the parent. Of this treatment scrofula and consumption, in their various forms are the frequent result. In children, especially, the skin should be excited by rubbing, sponging, &c., and protected by a just and general clothing, light in summer, warm in winter.

VARIETY.

The Journal of Commerce says, that persons using stoves for warming apartments, will find that a small piece of common rosin, dipped in the water which is placed in a vessel on the stove, will add a peculiar property to the atmosphere of the room, which will give great relief to persons troubled with a cough, who breathe the atmosphere of the apartment. The heat of the water is sufficient to throw off the aroma of the rosin, and gives the same relief as is afforded by a combustion of the rosin. It is preferable to combustion, because the evaporation is more durable. The same rosin may be used for weeks.

Almost the first thing the farmer should attend to, as soon as the weather becomes sufficiently warm to permit the opening of his cellar doors and windows, is the careful removal of everything calculated to engender noxious and unwholesome gases. Let everything be removed or cleansed, and the walls coated with white-wash, and the bottom strewed with caustic lime. Rotten potatoes, cabbage stumps, beets, carrots, &c., should be cleared out before the weather becomes warm.

In the time of Henry VIII., we find directions "to examine every night, the straw of the king's bed, that no daggers might be concealed therein." A writer in 1577, mentions three things in England, "marvelously altered for the worse; the multitude of chimneys lately erected; the increase of lodgings; and the exchange of tureen platters into pewter, and wooden spoons into silver and tin."

Mr. Wesley, in a letter to one of his preachers, says: "Scream no more at the peril of your soul. God now warns you by me, whom he has set over you. Speak as earnestly as you can, but do not scream. Speak with all your heart, but with a moderate voice."

Formerly, women were prohibited from marrying until they had spun a set of bed-furniture; and, till their wedding, were consequently called spinsters, which continues to this day in all legal proceedings.

The Kurrachee Advertiser says that one of the principal objections of the natives of Scinde to the introduction of vaccination is, that by submitting to the process the patients became inoculated with Christianity.

The oil of the lamp in the temple burnt away in giving light; so should we.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	"	"	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third	"	"	April 5,	"	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties ot their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement ot the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER OF MR. CARPENTER.

SHANGHAI, China, Nov. 20, 1847.

Before this will reach you, you will doubtless have heard of the wreck of two French ships-of-war on the coast of Corea. Among the 640 persons wrecked, was one whom I have since seen here, a Catholic missionary, who has been trying three years to find his way into the interior of Corea, without success. Mr. Calder, an English merchant who has this day set sail for his native land, who assisted these unfortunate Frenchmen to ships to get away from Corea, told me that one of those ships had visited Japan, and proceeded to Jeddo. The officer, who was Mr. Calder's informant, told him that the first day the mandarins came on board they conducted themselves quite haughtily, even rather crowding upon the officers. When they left, they promised to repeat their visit next day. In the meantime the officers instructed the marines with arms in hand to preserve order. Next day came the visitors again, and began to conduct as formerly, but immediately found themselves obliged to treat the foreigners as equals. The mission was a failure. It may have been the same as that to which you alluded in one of your letters. A year ago the English contemplated a mission or embassy to Japan, but have abandoned it for the present, and have turned their attention to Corea. * * *

When I commenced this letter, I intended to speak of what occurred the night before. On the 13th inst., at about twelve o'clock at night, we were waked out of our sleep by a shaking of our beds and of the house. For a moment we were puzzled to make out the cause. There was a cracking of the joints of the house as if two or three heavy men were jumping to and fro, and we felt our beds distinctly rocking under us. We very soon concluded it could be nothing else than a slight earthquake. It was sufficient to set the neighboring dogs to barking. It continued not half a minute after we noticed it. Few things offer a more convincing proof of the helplessness of mortals and the instability of all earthly things, than this shaking of the solid ground under our feet. * * *

Nov. 22.—I have often been amused, while walking the streets, to witness the deference shown to me, as to all foreigners. Most of the Chinese walk slow. When an individual ahead of me perceives me approaching, that individual, whether man or woman, will often turn out and give me the better chance to pass. This is not often seen, I believe, in Broadway. I used to hear that the Chinese ladies did not appear in the streets. But if the small foot and peculiar step be the signal of a lady, many of them may be seen in the street every day. The majority, however, who are seen in the street have not small feet. Their manner of dress is very becoming. The head dress is rather tasty. Already both men and women begin to carry their arms out from their bodies in token of cold weather. Their sleeves are long enough to come over the hand and serve as a muff; many walk in this way, their hands brought together as though they were actually wearing a muff.

* * * * *

The Chinese cattle have a curious appearance. Their horns are much nearer straight, and set upon the head of the animal in a curious way. They have very heavy fore quarters, and a large bunch on the neck. They plough with a single animal, either bullock or heifer. I can fully appreciate what Samson said to the Philistines. Every one of these animals has a ring or cord in the nose, by which it is fastened at night to a small stake driven into the ground. * * * * *

Nov. 25.—Eight Chinese ladies called to see us to-day. They live near us. They behaved themselves with much decorum. This is not the first call we have had from the ladies. Several of the native men, who are teachers of the language, have called. From what we are able to learn, we think we shall find no difficulty in gaining the ears of multitudes. The difficulties are the darkness of their minds, the indifference of their hearts, and our want of ability effectually to reason with them. But it is interesting to see that they are polite and accessible. O that the Lord God would give us the tongue of the learned, that we may know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary; that these words of the Son of God may be ours, "He wakeneth morning by morning; he wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned." Isa. 50: 4. Nothing can exceed the beauty and excellency of these words. If Jesus of Nazareth as a perfect man increased in knowledge through the divine teaching, and in answer to prayer, so that he could say, "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned," what an illustrious example is this for all the ministers of the cross. I feel myself greatly rebuked by this example, as well as encouraged. And when I see how weary these poor heathen are under the burden of their sins, my heart is inflamed with an earnest desire that I may know how to speak a word to them in season. My dear brother, the weight of this business of late has been rolling in upon my soul as it has never done before. Every day I feel urged up to attempt more than I have accomplished in any preceding day in the work of preparation. I feel that it would be in vain, yea, it would be mockery to ask God to bless me in this work, without at the same time using vigorously the necessary means. And yet I am fully persuaded that not half so much can be accomplished in any other way as by the effectual and fervent prayer of faith. Nothing can so effectually quell the clamors of the old man, and shield the soul from every hurtful influence from without. Nothing can so impress the mind with the value of souls ready to perish, and thus keep the solemn object of our mission distinctly before us, as intercourse with God. We are greatly encouraged by what we observe in the Recorder, and also in your letters, showing that this mission is in the hearts of God's people in our beloved native land. Before you informed us of it, we were persuaded that fervent prayers were offered to God for the success of our undertaking. I hope that prayer will continue to be offered unceasingly by the church for this object, for nothing, absolutely nothing, effectual, can be done without it. If that Spirit that in the beginning moved upon the face of the waters, and "out of darkness called up light," shall move upon the face of these "many waters," then, and not otherwise, will these multitudes of idol-worshipers be turned from darkness to light.

DR. CHALMERS IN THE PULPIT.

We remember well our first hearing Dr. Chalmers. We were in a moorland district in Tweeddale, rejoicing in the country, after nine months of the High School. We heard that the famous preacher was to be at a neighboring parish church, and off we set, a cartful of irrepressible youngsters. "Calm was all nature as a resting wheel." The crows, instead of making wing, were impudent and sat still; the cart-horses were standing, knowing the day, at the field-gates, gossiping and gazing, idle and happy; the moor was stretching away in the pale sun-light—vast, dim, melancholy, like a sea; everywhere were to be seen the gathering people, "sprinklings of blithe company;" the country-side seemed moving to some one centre. As we entered the kirk we saw a notorious character, a drover, who had much of the brutal look of what he worked in, with the knowing eye of a man of the city, a sort of big Peter Bell—

> "He had a hardness in his eye,
> He had a hardness in his cheek."

He was our terror, and we not only wondered, but we were afraid when we saw him going in. The kirk was full as it could hold. How different in looks to a brisk town congregation! There was a fine leisureliness and vague stare; all the dignity and vacancy of animals; eyebrows raised, and mouths open, as is the habit of those who speak little, and look much, and at far off objects. The minister comes in, homely in his dress and gait, but having a great look about him, like a mountain among hills. The High School boys thought him like a "big one of ourselves," he looking vaguely around upon his audience, as if he saw in it one great object, not many. We shall never forget his smile! its general benignity:—how he let the light of his countenance fall on us. He read a few verses quietly; then prayed briefly, solemnly, with his eyes wide open all the time, but not seeing. Then he gave out his text; we forget it, but its subject was, "Death reigns." He stated slowly, calmly, the simple meaning of the words; what death was, and how and why it reigned; then suddenly he started, and looked like a man who had seen some great sight, and was breathless to declare it; he told us how death reigned—every where, at all times, in all places; how we all knew it, how we would yet know more of it. The drover, who had sat down in the table-seat opposite, was gazing up in a state of stupid excitement; he seemed restless, but never kept his eyes from the speaker. The tide set in—everything added to its power, deep called to deep, imagery and illustration poured in; and every now and then the theme,—the simple, terrible statement, was repeated in some lucid interval. After overwhelming us with proofs of the reign of Death, and transferring to us his intense urgency and emotion; and after shrieking, as if in despair, these words, "Death is a tremendous necessity,"—he suddenly looked beyond us, as if into some distant region, and cried out, "Behold a mightier!—who is this? He cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, glorious in his apparel, speaking in righteousness, traveling towards men in the greatness of his strength, mighty to save." Then, in a few plain sentences, he stated the truth as to sin entering, and death by sin, and death passing upon all. Then he took fire once more, and enforced with redoubled energy and richness, the freeness, the simplicity, the security of the great method of justification. How astonished and impressed we all were! He was in the full thunder—the whole man in an agony of earnestness. The drover was weeping like a child, the tears running down his ruddy, coarse cheeks—his face opened out and smoothed like an infant's; his whole body stirred with emotion. We all had insensibly been drawn out of our seats, and were converging towards the wonderful speaker. And when he sat down, after warning each of us to remember who it was, and what it was, that followed death on his pale horse, and how alone we could escape—we all sunk back into our seats. How beautiful to our eyes did the thunderer look—exhausted—but sweet and pure! How he poured out his soul before his God, in giving thanks for sending the Abolisher of Death! Then a short psalm, and all was ended.

ODE FOR THE FRIENDS OF PEACE.

BY REV. ELNATHAN DAVIS.

Not with the flashing steel—
Not with the cannon's peal,
Or stir of drum,
But in the bonds of love;
Our white flag floats above,
Her emblem is the dove,
'Tis thus we come.

The laws of Christian light,
These are our weapons bright,
Our mighty shield;
Christ is our leader high,
And the broad plains which lie
Beneath the blessed sky,
Our battle-field.

What is that 'great intent,'
To which the heart is bent,
Our host among?
It is that Hate may die,
That War's red curse may fly,
And War's high praise for aye,
No more be sung.

That all the Poor may rest,
Beneath their own vines blessed,
In glorious Peace;
That Death and Hell may yield,
And human hearts long steeled,
By Love's pure drops unsealed,
From warfare cease.

On then, in God's great name,
Let each pure spirit's flame
Burn bright and clear;
Stand firmly in your lot,
Cry ye aloud, 'Doubt not,'
Be every fear forgot,
Christ leads us here.

So shall Earth's distant lands
In happy, holy bands,
One brotherhood,
Together rise and sing,
And joyful offerings bring,
And Heaven's Eternal King
Pronounce it good.

A RACE FOR LIFE.

Prairie fires always run before the wind, with an advanced tongue or fork in two receding flanks, and in a high wind so rapidly do the dancing, curling, careering flames leap from point to point of the dry grass, that it is sometimes difficult for the swiftest horseman to escape. The sight, especially in the night, is always beautiful, and at times grand beyond description. But after a while we become familiarized to it, and look upon it without emotion, as all of us learn to do upon the glorious sun, the most splendid object in nature.

At the time I refer to, I had been two or three days' drive from the town of C——, with my horse and buggy, and was on my return home. All day I had noticed signs indicating fire on the prairie—masses of smoke in the distance, lying like white clouds upon the horizon, and a hazy atmosphere—but these gave me no trouble so long as they were far away; and, busy with my own thoughts, for hours I would pay no attention to them whatever. At length, after some period of abstraction, I observed with some apprehension that the conflagration was drawing nearer, and had actually worked around in my rear, until it had crossed the path by which I had traveled; that all behind me was fast becoming a smoking sea of fire, and for the first time the thought of danger, that I might be overtaken or possibly surrounded, occurred to me.

My horse was a powerful one, but not very fleet, nor yet fresh; but without the loss of a moment I applied the whip, and quitting my direct route bore to the left, because that placed me more squarely before my enemy.

Soon the tongue of fire, the advance guard of my foe, became distinctly visible on my right, at about two miles distance, as near as I could judge, stretching on with a speed that was really frightful. I knew the struggle was to be with that, and pushing my horse to the utmost, kept my eye fixed upon it, like the wily racer, intent on measuring the power of his antagonist before the final effort. For a few minutes the result was in doubt, but not long. Sinews of flesh were no match for the wings of the wind which bore on that fleet and terrific column of fire, and I became satisfied that it was outstripping me, and almost with a feeling of indifference; for I thought for a moment that my last hope was gone, and was bracing my heart and nerves for the final event of life.

It was now twilight, and as the day departed, and the shadows of night fell around, the cordon of fire seemed to magnify its splendors and its terrors, and like a vast serpent, to extend itself behind and on both sides, and to be closing up its folds to encircle me.

I was no stranger on that part of the prairie; its general localities, though one portion is very much like another, were familiar to me; and in recalling them to mind, I recollected a little rugged mound or hill, some twenty or thirty feet in height, and was satisfied that I was no great distance from it. With my hopes revived a little, I taxed my sight to the utmost on every swell of ground that I passed, and at length detected the faint outline of the eminence in advance. But the fire was making for it, too, and the subtle leaping tongue on my right, now quite ahead of me, already seemed almost between us, and prepared with a single leap to cross my path and secure its victim. Still, with my almost exhausted horse, I pressed on, with an energy and despair so mighty as almost of themselves to wreck the powers of life. I have not recovered from the effects of that mental struggle to this day—but, as you have already no doubt concluded, the mound saved me. In the race for life, I was obliged, as it were, to place myself, side by side, with that giant and awful sword of flame, and for the last half mile, the contest was doubtful, hopeless, dreadful. But God nerved my horse with an unnatural strength, as it seemed to me, and guarded his footsteps so that every effort told; and at last I dashed on the bare side of the mound, where there was no fit substance for the devouring element to follow, and was safe.

The flames swept by with a dull heavy roar, and a hot, sweltering, suffocating breath, burning with an intensity and grandeur which realized to the imagination my ideas of the final catastrophe of nature, encircled and passed the little eminence on which I stood, and stretched off in two long lines as far as the eye could reach. I fell upon my knees; and since that terrible night, I trust I have been a more thoughtful and thankful man.

ANECDOTES OF FRIENDSHIP.

The very ingenius and amiable Bishop Berkley, of Cloyne, in Ireland, was so entirely contented with his income in that diocese, that when offered by the Earl of Chesterfield (then Lord Lieutenant) a bishoprick much more beneficial than he possessed, he declined it with these words: "I love my neighbors, and they love me; why then should I begin in my old days to form new connections, and tear myself from those friends whose kindness is to me the greatest happiness I enjoy?" He acted in this instance like the celebrated Plutarch, who, being asked why he resided in his native city, so obscure and so little, "I stay," said he, "lest it should grow less."

Lord Stanhope was at Eaton school with one of the Scots noblemen who were condemned after the rebellion in 1815. While the privy council were deliberating upon the signing of the warrant for the execution of this unfortunate nobleman, Lord Stanhope requested the life of his old school fellow (whom he had never seen since he was at school.) His request was refused till he threatened to give up his place if the council did not comply with it. This menace produced him the life of his associate in early life, to whom he afterwards sent a handsome sum of money. Connections and friendships are sometimes formed in schools, which are never forgotten through life.

A lady of quality being on a visit to Dr. Watts, at Stoke Newington, the doctor thus accosted her: "Madam, your ladyship is come to see me on a very remarkable day!" "Why is this day so remarkable?" replied the countess. "This very day thirty years ago," replied the doctor, "I came hither to the house of my good friend, Sir Thomas Abner, intending to spend but one single week under this friendly roof, and I have extended my visit to the length of exactly thirty years." Lady Abner, who was present, immediately said to the doctor, "Sir, what you term a long thirty years' visit, I consider as the shortest visit my family ever received."

ORAL MINISTRY IN CHINA.

The Rev. Mr. Pohlman assigns the following reasons why oral preaching is the best mode of spreading the gospel in China:—

1. The number of intelligent readers, compared with the whole population, is very small.

2. The mass of superstitions and traditions afloat among the people, calls for faithful preachers of the gospel.

3. The language of China is addressed more to the ear than to the eye. The colloquial dialects are almost numberless, and every one of the 30,000 characters in the Chinese must have a sound and signification attached to it in all these local dialects.

4. The inability of the Chinese to understand our books. We are strangers to their modes of thought, style of speaking and writing, and the whole idiom of their language.

5. The social character of the people favors this mode of instruction. The people of all classes love to talk, and much of their time is spent in social visits and pleasant converse.

6. The progress of the people in civilization. Many of the moral maxims of the Chinese would do honor to Christianity. Benevolent exertions are patronized by the majority of the people.

7. The mental imbecility of the mass of the people can be aroused only by verbal exhortations. On all spiritual subjects there is a torpidity of mind which is amazing. The chief question is, "What shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

8. Public preaching is not a novel thing in China. The greatest men in Chinese history have been preachers. Confucius traveled about to instruct and civilize the people.

9. The desire of many people to hear foreigners is another loud call for preaching missionaries.

10. Willingness of many to assemble for worship. There is, perhaps, no other missionary field where attentive audiences can so easily be obtained.

ANECDOTE OF CORNARO.

Cornaro, an Italian nobleman, in his youth, gave full scope to all his inclinations, and tasted every cup of pleasure within his reach. He found, however, when scarcely thirty years old, that he was on the verge of eternity; and this alarmed him. He bethought himself what was to be done. And finally resolved that life was preferable to rioting. He wisely embraced a uniformly temperate course of living, by which he gained at least three score years—for he survived a hundred—whereas it was morally certain, previously to his reformation, that he would never have seen forty.

At the age of ninety-five, he writes thus of himself: "All the faculties of my mind are in the highest perfection; my understanding clear and bright as ever; my judgment sound; my memory tenacious; my spirits good; and my voice, the first thing that fails others, still so strong and sonorous, that every morning and evening, with my dear grand-children around me, I can address my prayers to the Almighty's gracious throne, and chant the praises of his redeeming love."

POWER OF PRIESTCRAFT IN CHINA.

The following is from Smith's Consular Cities of China. It is instructive, as showing the condition of the pagan millions, with which that vast empire swarms:

In one of the temples on the hill of Nantai, I witnessed a curious specimen of the power of priestcraft, which still retains its hold on a portion of the people. In a little temple, consisting of two or three courts, dedicated to one of the Taouist deities, and intrusted to a few priests, I met a Chinese, who had come to obtain deliverance from domestic grief. The cause of his affliction was the sickness and expected death of his wife. The husband, dressed out in his finest clothes, and loaded with offerings, stood before a platform, in anxious expectation, while a priest went through a variety of evolutions, tossing and tumbling on the floor, to procure a good omen. With his head bound in a red handkerchief, or turban, and a quantity of burning paper in his hand, the priest vigorously danced, with impassioned gestures, while two attendants, beating a gong and a drum, kept time with his performance. At one time he prayed with softly-uttered tones; soon again he employed scolding accents to the deity whom he invoked. At one moment, he would endeavor to coax away the angry spirit; at another, he would terrify it away by whipping the air. After half an hour's frantic noise, and persevering somersets on the ground, he rose and placed a hair-pin on the head of the anxious husband, after binding the hair into the peculiar tuft of the Taou sect. Some more paper was burned outside the temple; the priest ceased from his flagellations; the husband bowed down several times before an idol which stood near; and, after paying the usual fees to the priest, returned, apparently satisfied, to the scene of his domestic affliction.

"THE CALLS ARE SO MANY."

How often do we hear this complaining language, from those who profess to be the followers of Him whose meat and drink it was to do the will of his Father.

Reader, are you one of these everlasting fault-finders? If the calls you receive are so many, suppose, in order to avoid them, that you make some. Turn agent for some society, and you shall see how much pleasanter it is to make calls than to receive them. We will excuse you from contributing, if you will solicit. "You can not bear begging. It is the most unpleasant thing in the world to apply to people for money." Very well, if you decline this branch or alternative, then do not complain of the other. If you will not turn out and make the calls, you must sit still and receive them. It is the easiest part—and you ought to be good-natured when you receive one of these calls—aye, and even grateful to the man who comes to you, that he affords you another opportunity of offering one of the sacrifices with which God is well pleased. O, I am weary of these calls, is your complaint. I am tired of giving. It is well that God is not weary of your calls upon him. How constantly you are calling upon God, saying, Give, give, give! O, your ingratitude! May God forgive you.

How humiliating the thought, that, instead of the mass of Christians contributing of their substance promptly, cheerfully, and liberally, for the promotion of the cause of God, agents must go forth and beg, like a wretched dependent on the world's cold charity, till some few dollars are, with reluctant hand, cast into the treasury of the Lord! [Crocker's Memoirs.

THE WORD SELAH.

The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew work SELAH, which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister, or some learned friend, what it means. And the minister or learned friend has most often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums and most of the Jewish commentators, give to the word the meaning of eternally, forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rythmical note. Herder regards it as indicating a change of tone. Matheson thinks it is a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence! Gesenius explains it to mean—"Let the instruments play and the singers stop." Wocher regards it as an equivalent to sursum corda—up, my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four pages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not, in the imperative, 'Hear, Jehovah! or awake, Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that he would remember and hear," &c. The word itself he regards as indicating a blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah itself he thinks an abridged expression, used for Higgaion Selah—Higgaion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets.

Eld. Knapp occasionally gets off a good thing, notwithstanding his bad ones. Recently speaking of the prevailing tendencies of some religionists to long prayers, he remarked that we could find no example for these in the Scriptures. The prayers of our Saviour were short and to the point. The prayer of the penitent publican was a happy specimen. When Peter was endeavoring to walk upon the waters to meet his Master, and was about sinking, had his supplication been as long as the introduction to one of our modern prayers, before he got half through, he would have been more than fifty feet under water!

THE NEWS FROM EUROPE.

The foreign news which we publish to-day is of an important and startling character. Such grand national movements as are now going forward, were probably never before witnessed. All Europe is shaken with a commotion which does not seem yet to have reached its height. No doubt there is considerable variety of motive prompting and influencing the movement, and various ends are proposed by the different parties in the great drama. Still there is a resemblance throughout the whole. A sense of governmental oppression, and a determination to change the existing order of things, every where manifests itself. In some cases the form of oppression which excites most opposition, is the censorship of the press; in others, it is the burdensome taxes; and in others still, it is the exercise of authority and the enjoyment of emolument by those who do not really belong to the people over whom they rule. Whatever may be the particular shape or form in which the disposition to oppress manifests itself, the uprising of the people is designed to check it. Hence the variety of these movements, all of which tend to overthrow usurpation and establish the authority and rights of the people.

Politicians are beginning to inquire anxiously, When will these things end, and what will be the results? Of course no one can pretend to answer such a question with any degree of definiteness or certainty. A speedy return of tranquility throughout Europe can not reasonably be expected. To break the power and throw off the authority of sovereigns, is the work of a day; but to establish new governments upon a firm and lasting basis requires time and deliberation. When to this consideration is added the strong probability that the powers which have been overthrown may yet rally and endeavor to obtain their former supremacy, it is easy to see that there is great difficulty in saying when tranquility will be restored. It may be not until the whole continent of Europe has been convulsed by war and drenched in blood. As to the results, it is equally difficult to predict. Some there are who entertain a hope, that the final result will be the establishment of one gigantic republican confederacy, extending from the Arctic to the Mediterranean, and from the Atlantic to the borders of Asia, "each separate member finding its distinctive element only in its language, and the relations of each to all the others, as well as to the rest of the world, being regulated in the most general way by a central Congress." But this hope, however pleasant to contemplate, can hardly be realized until the masses in Europe are much more enlightened that at present.

To Christians, not less than to politicians, these movements are deeply interesting. The question has been raised by some, whether the times spoken of in prophecy for the casting down of thrones and the sitting of the Ancient of Days may not be at hand. But whether such is or is not the case, there is evidently a loud call for watchfulness and activity on the part of Christians. We are glad to see that the Religious Tract Society of Paris is awake to the subject. They have recently made an earnest and eloquent appeal to American Christians, asking for fraternal concurrence with them in their efforts to evangelize the French Republic. They state that their resources are cut off by the financial crisis through which the nation is now passing, and never, at any former period, was it so necessary to spread the truth. "Error is sown with full hands; it is also necessary with full hands to scatter the divine seed. Henceforth," they remark, "there will be no more shackles to our Christian activity. The laws restricting full religious liberty have been removed with all the rest. The career is opened and we shall find no limit to the most ardent zeal." The American Tract Society, to whom these appeals from Protestant Christians of the French Republic are addressed, will gladly respond, whenever a generous American public shall authorize new and enlarged remittances to their brethren in Paris. The Bible, with evangelical books and tracts, is imperatively needed now in France; and, as the Appeal to American Christians justly remarks, "If extreme liberty is granted, if it is not sanctified and moderated by the liberty which Christ has promised us, we know, more than any other people, what ravages it can bring on society." These French Christians feelingly add, "While the people are intoxicated with praises, and are spoken to only of their rights, we must speak to them of their duties. While they are becoming sensible of their earthly privileges only, we must reveal to them those immortal privileges which the gospel secures." France must depend upon the conservative character of Christianity to sustain the Republic. Will not Americans, in this emergency, give them succor and support?

An Extraordinary Meeting.—The "Dayspring" publishes a letter from a missionary at Constantinople, dated January 4th, 1848, of which the following is a paragraph:—

"Yesterday was the great Monthly Concert—the first Monday of the year, and a glorious day it was at Constantinople. Think of a great union prayer meeting, consisting of Armenians, Jews, Americans, English, Scotch, Germans, Catholics and Greeks; and all sitting down together at the table of the Lord—Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Baptists, Methodists, Baptized Jews, and Protestant Armenians. The elements were distributed by a Jew, a German, and the two deacons of the Protestant Armenians. Prayers were offered in three languages—Turkish, English, and Armenian. Remarks and exhortations were made in four languages—German, English, Armenian, and Turkish. And hymns were sung to the same tune, and at the same moment, in three different languages—Armenian, German, and English. The first tune was Old Hundred, the same that will be sung in the Millennium; and the second was Martyn. There was no confusion, no discord. No one was out of time or out of tune. The harmony was perfect; while each, with the spirit and the understanding, and with the greatest power and might, was singing in his own tongue, wherein he was born, or with which he was familiar, 'the high praises of our God.' The effect was overpowering. It was 'the voice of a great multitude,' redeemed out of many nations, kindreds and tongues; and it rose on high, like 'the sound of many waters.' Our chapel was crowded with communicants—and our hearts were filled with emotions too big for utterance."

CASTE AMONG THE SONS OF TEMPERANCE.

In a recent number of the Albany Patriot, we find a long letter from Geo. W. Clarke, the distinguished anti-slavery vocalist, in which he brings to light an important fact relative to the Sons of Temperance. It appears that in 1844 Mr. Clarke was invited to talk and sing on the subject of temperance at a division of the "Sons" in the city of New York; and being anxious to promote the good cause, he accepted the invitation. In consideration of his services, he was first elected an honorary member, and afterwards a regular benefit member, thus giving him a good opportunity to become acquainted with the character and influence of the organization. But his impressions seem not to have been at all favorable; and he has therefore made a public declaration of his unwillingness to coöperate with them. One reason for this course is his conviction that the Order is "founded upon the unchristian principle of caste—of prejudice against color—and will not admit colored persons." As this position has often been denied, he takes considerable trouble to establish it by extracts from reports and letters. He shows that Samuel R. Ward, a well-known and highly-respected colored minister, and editor of an anti-slavery paper, united with a lodge of the Sons of Temperance in Cortlandville, N. Y. When information of the fact reached the "Grand Worthy Patriarch" in New York, he immediately suspended the deputy of that district, and sent a special deputy to inquire into the matter, who took from the division its books, papers, documents, &c, and, as one of his reasons for doing so, says they "had actually initiated a colored man!"—an act strictly prohibited by a resolution of the "Grand Division." In view of these facts, Mr. Clarke concludes his article by saying:—

"I was aware that the colored people of this country had been silly enough to send to England for a charter to organize themselves into 'Odd-Fellows'—having been refused a charter by their countrymen in the United States. But I was not aware, that, after having excluded colored persons from the privilege of membership in the subordinate divisions, the 'Grand Division' had actually denied them the right of organizing divisions among themselves! Slaveholders, oppressors of men, unjust and cruel, are received with open arms. But a man with 'sable brow,' however talented, just, and pure in life, is rejected! Verily, one looks in vain for a semblance of Christianity here. Alas, for the poor colored man! He is excluded from the State—he is excluded from steamboat cabins and dining tables—he is excluded from the schools and colleges—he is excluded from the churches, unless he submits to the degradation of the infamous 'negro pew.' He may, however, if he can, build his own church—his own school; but the 'Sons,' professedly a benevolent institution, yield to the wicked prejudice against color, and descend a step lower, not only refusing him the 'negro pew' in their temperance church, but denying him the poor privilege of having one by himself! 'O tempora, O mores!'"

MISSIONS IN CHINA.

The New England Puritan has a summary of the information communicated at the monthly concert for missions held in Boston on the first Monday evening in April. What follows is all that relates to China:—

The annual report from the Mission in Canton, states that the difficulty which has hitherto existed in obtaining houses, is now much less, and it is hoped that the unwillingness shown by the natives to have foreigners reside among them, will before long be entirely overcome. The Hospital has received in all over 25,000 persons; and within the past year about 3,000. The gospel is regularly preached at the Hospital. During the first eight months, the average attendance was from 75 to 100; at present the number is not so large, but more select than formerly; and instead of the casual, transient attendance, the greater part of the audience come steadily, and some from a considerable distance. There is also preaching in private houses, sustained by the several missionaries. Large numbers of books, pamphlets, tracts, &c., have been distributed during the year, in the shops and streets of the city, and in almost every instance they have been well received. Owing to circumstances, the intercourse between the missionaries and the people is less free and unrestrained at Canton, than in the more northern ports.

The journal of Mr. Johnson, of Fuchau, has also been received. This is a large place, numbering about 600,000 people, with whom there exists no obstacle to missionary labor—and Mr. J. states that there is here more religious liberty than in a large part of the Christian world. He speaks also of the dialect of the place, which he says is by no means so difficult to acquire as has been represented.

STRANGE DOINGS AT WASHINGTON.

The Capital of the United States has been the scene of some rather curious transactions within a week or two past. First came the great meeting and torch-light procession to rejoice over the French Revolution, by which slavery was abolished, and the press declared free. This was followed by an unsuccessful attempt of some seventy or eighty slaves to secure their freedom by taking passage on board a vessel from Washington which was expected to land them in Philadelphia. Then came a great mob, some 3,000 strong, threatening to destroy the office of the National Era, on account of a groundless suspicion that that paper was an indirect cause of the attempt on the part of the slaves to run away. For three nights that senseless mob collected before the unprotected printing office, listened to flaming speeches and lectures on law and order, hurled some stones and brickbats, and adjourned regularly to a certain hour the following evening. We believe no material damage has yet been done to the National Era establishment. But there is reason to believe that great damage has been done to the interests of slavery, and great good to the cause of freedom, by the discussion which has been provoked.

Protestant Books in Italy.—An English traveler in Tuscany writes to a London paper, that a translation from the French, of a series of religious addresses, chiefly from the pen of Mrs. Vinet, widow of the late distinguished preacher, had just received the sanction of the public censor at Florence. This work he thinks is calculated to awaken the attention of the sceptic and the thoughtless, and regrets that he has not the means to put numerous copies in circulation among a people beginning to inquire after the truth. He says, "Protestant travelers in that beautiful land would do great good if they should each expend only a few shillings in the distribution of religious books."

An Example to be Imitated.—On Sunday morning, 16th inst., Missionary Addresses of stirring interest was made to Dr. Skinner's congregation in Mercer-st., New York, by Rev. Mr. Calhoun, from Syria, and Dr. Anderson, Secretary of the American Board, after which, it is stated, a collection was taken up to the amount of about ten thousand dollars, which is expected to be much increased by some absent members of the congregation. This course, if generally imitated by the churches, would soon effectually meet the appalling fact, stated by Dr. Anderson, that in sustaining 500 missionary laborers they had been compelled to incur a debt of $60,000

Scarcity of Religious Books in Iowa.—A German colporteur in Iowa gives the following account of the state of things in that Territory: "I have found my countrymen widely scattered, but yet I sold them a good many books. Their means of grace and sources of knowledge are very small; not only Romanists, but Protestants—Americans as well as Germans—with whom I met, had no Bibles, Testaments, or any other religious books, except occasionally an old hymn book, until I supplied them. Many of these people have lived in this spiritual wilderness already over ten years."

◆

Bibles and Republics.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Journal of Commerce calls attention to the fact that "France is groaning for the Bible," and needs a large supply in order to insure her settling down as an orderly Republic. He says that the first American Congress passed a resolution for purchasing or obtaining a large number of Bibles, some thirty thousand, for circulation among the people—an example which he thinks deserving of the consideration and imitation of the new French Government.

Bequests.—The late Samuel Harvey, of Germantown, Pennsylvania, has made the following legacies: $1,000 to the Chartered Fund of the Methodist Episcopal Church; $1,000 to the Bible Society of Philadelphia; $1,000 to the Magdalen Society of Philadelphia; $1,000 to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church within the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference.

Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine for April comes to us in advance of the English edition. It opens with a long article, said to be by Alison, on the "Fall of the Throne of the Barricades." This is followed by "A German Ditty," "Two Sonnets," "My Route into Canada," "The Conquest of Naples," "Traveling in Taffyland," "Life and Times of Lord Hardwicke," "How we got possession of the Tuilleries," "The Caxtons—a Family Picture."

The Parlor Magazine commences its Fifth Volume with the May number. It appears in an entire new dress, and is really one of the neatest periodicals of the kind published. This magazine, as many of our readers already know, was commenced with the view of furnishing a periodical literature free from the trash so generally diffused in similar channels. It is only necessary to say, that the effort has succeeded. It is issued monthly, containing thirty-two super-royal pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, with a splendid steel engraving and colored flower in each number, with occasional wood-cuts and music, making a beautiful volume of over 400 pages. Price $2, in advance; 3 copies for $5. E. E. Miles, 135 Nassau-st., N. Y.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate, Mr. Allen presented a resolution from the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in favor of adopting Whitney's plan of a railroad to the Pacific, which was ordered printed. Mr. Douglass, of Ill., from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill providing for the organization of the Territory of Minesota; also one for the organization of Nebraska. These, together with the Oregon bill, were made the special order of the day for Wednesday, April 26. Mr. John M. Niles, of Ct., submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of coining quarter dimes, and to discontinue the coining of of cents, which was adopted.

But the principal discussions last week, in both Houses, related to the subject of slavery and the mob in Washington. It was brought up in the Senate by Mr. Hale, of N. H., who asked leave to introduce a bill in relation to riots and unlawful assemblages in the District of Columbia, and made a few brief and general remarks upon the subject of the bill. He was followed by Bagby of Alabama, Benton of Mo., Calhoun of S. C., Wescott of Fla., all of whom discussed the slavery question with considerable warmth. The exciting debate was continued by Messrs. Mangum, Calhoun, Douglas, Foote, Jefferson Davis, Hannegan, John Davis, Butler, and Cameron. The subject was under consideration when the Senate adjourned over till Monday.

In the House of Representatives, on Tuesday, Mr. Giddings of Ohio, moved to suspend the rules, in order that he might offer a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire why the seventy men, women, and children, were cast into prison this morning for attempting to escape from the bondage in which they were held, and who were found in the schooner Pearl down the Potomac River. Objections were made, and the motion lost amid great laughter. On Thursday, Mr. Palfrey of Mass., wished to offer a resolution setting forth the whole proceedings of the recent mob raised in consequence of the capture and imprisonment of the runaway slaves, and proposed to raise a Select Committee to report what action the House should take to secure its members from personal threats and attacks. This led to a heated discussion, which continued through that day. On the following day, after some sparring, Mr. Palfrey was permitted to read a statement from Mr. Giddings, detailing threats to lynch him, and when he had concluded Mr. Wick, of Indiana, obtained the floor, and the House adjourned till Monday.

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM EUROPE.

The Steamship Sarah Sands arrived at New York on the 21st inst., bringing foreign news to the 3d. The intelligence is highly important, and shows that the revolutionary movement has not yet reached its height. It is impossible to prepare a connected and systematic account of things, but what follows will give the reader a tolerably good idea.

England, Ireland, and Scotland.

England is beginning to feel the effects of the revolution on the continent. Much discontent is manifested among the people, and men of coolness and judgment are not without fears of an outbreak. The great body of Chartists were to present a petition to the House of Commons on the 10th of April, calling for "The Charter." At a recent large meeting of Chartists in London, it was stated that when their petition was presented from two to three hundred thousand Chartists would walk to the House of Commons. One speaker said it was all a mockery and a farce to petition at all, as they very well knew that the Government would never grant the People's Charter, and therefore just one hour ought to be appointed for the House of Commons to consider their petition. If they said "No," then 100,000 persons would form a compact body, understand each other by signs, unite in a procession, and upset the Government!

In Ireland, the evidences of disaffection are multiplying. A large portion of the working classes in Dublin are arming themselves with rifles, muskets, and pikes, to be ready for any emergency. Clubs are formed to practice firing, and large numbers regularly congregate for drills. Some of the leading newspapers boldly recommend a resort to the utmost extremities if necessary. Meanwhile the Government is taking every precaution against an outbreak, and furnishing arms and ammunition to loyal subjects.

Scotland is comparatively quiet. Still, in consequence of the recent disturbances in Edinburg and Glasgow, the companies stationed at Leith and Glasgow are to be strengthened.

France.

The Provisional Government has postponed the elections for the General Assembly to Sunday the 23d of April, and the meeting of that body to the 4th of May.

Many of the Poles residing in Paris have determined to visit their own country and assist in overthrowing its present rulers and establishing its independence. On the 26th of March, about three thousand Poles waited on the Provisional Government at the Hotel de Ville, to express their sympathy.

A very numerous deputation of the Italian Association went on the 27th to Hotel de Ville. M. Mazzini, the President, read an address, expressing their sympathy for the Provisional Government, and announcing that the association had been definitely constituted.

The Provisional Government has issued orders for the immediate formation of a camp of between thirty and thirty-five thousand men between Vienne and Grenoble. The measure is said to be adopted in consequence of the news from Italy. Another corps of observation is to be stationed at Nancy.

One of the most striking effects of the late political catastrophe is exhibited in journalism. Not only is the circulation of all the established journals enormously increased, that of La Presse alone having risen from 36,000 to nearly 80,000, but a swarm of smaller journals have come into existence. A sort of spurious race of newspapers distributed by hawkers in all quarters of Paris, and sold usually for one sou, the profit being two-fifths of a sou, has begun.

A decree of the Government modifies the law of libel, and enacts that henceforward no officer of the Government can prosecute a journalist for criticising his public conduct.

The disturbances in Lyons still continue. On the 25th, 2,000 workmen attacked the military stores of Perrache, and plundered them of several thousand carbines.

On Wednesday, M. Cremieux received a deputation of the Colonists of Algeria, who demanded that a decree should immediately pronounce the incorporation of that country with France. The Provisional Government has issued a decree authorizing Algeria to return Deputies to the National Assembly.

Napoleon Bonaparte, son of Prince Jerome, has offered himself as a candidate for the representation of Corsica.

The Jesuits have been expelled from Avignon.

Prussia.

The revolution which has been effected in Berlin, is said to have restored to the citizens the right to assemble and speak freely, of which they have so long been deprived. Farther particulars are given relative to the encounter of the people and military at Berlin, which show that there was sharp fighting, and many lives lost.

The magnificent residence of the Prince de Croy, in Westphalia, and several other noble mansions, have been totally destroyed by bands of peasantry. The hot-houses alone of the Prince de Croy cost 50,000 thalers.

Denmark.

There has been a successful movement among the people of Schleswig and Holstein. At a large demonstration meeting, they adopted an address to the King, stating that his Ministers had not the confidence of the people. They were accordingly dismissed by the King soon after receiving the address. Before this result was announced, however, some depredations had been committed.

Bavaria.

King Louis abdicated in favor of his son Maximilian on the 20th of March. The retiring sovereign was born on the 25th of August, 1786, and is now in his 62d year. He succeeded his father on the 13th of October, 1825, and has therefore reigned rather more than 22 years. The new monarch, King Maximilian, entered his office with a proclamation full of good promises, which was well received.

Austria.

The Emperor of Austria has issued a proclamation granting complete amnesty for all political criminals confined in the different prisons and fortresses. It had not been fully complied with at last accounts, and there was consequently considerable uneasiness.

Poland and Russia.

Dispatches had been received at Paris, stating that an insurrection had broken out in the southern provinces of Russia. It was also rumored, although the rumor was not generally credited, that Warsaw was in open revolution. The Emperor of Russia is concentrating a large body of troops on the frontier of Galicia, some leagues from Cracow. He has already 50,000 soldiers in Russian Poland. The danger of a collision between Germany and Russia is spoken of as imminent. All the political prisoners at Cracow, amounting to 400 students, priests, and nobles, were set free on the 17th of March, by Count Degun, who was accompanied to the prison by 15,000 men, assembled to insist upon their release.

Italy.

A movement began at Milan immediately on the reception of news of the outbreak and triumph at Vienna. On the 18th, the Emperor issued a proclamation abolishing the censorship, and convoking the States for July 3d. But these concessions were too late. The people attacked the Austrian soldiers on the 22d, and drove them from the citadel on the 23d, after killing many, and taking a large number of prisoners. The King of Sardinia issued on the same day, the 23d, and therefore without knowledge of the retirement of the Austrians, a proclamation, declaring war against Austria, and announcing his intention of aiding the Italian population of Lombardy.

Advices from Parma bring the confirmation of the revolution there. At the first news of the insurrection at Milan, the inhabitants filled the streets, and fell upon the Austrians; the latter had recourse to grape. The Grand Duke, however, alarmed at the situation of affairs, published a proclamation, in which he announced his wish to withdraw with his family, and named a regency, to which he transferred supreme power, with full liberty to adopt such measures and establish such laws as they might think fit under existing circumstances. A Provisional Government, composed of the most illustrious personages of the city, has been formed, among them Count San Vitale and Pellegrini.

The Florence journals announce that a revolution took place at Modena on the 20th. One hundred young men sallied forth, shouting in favor of the revolutions at Paris and Vienna. The Hungarians refused to act against the people. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, a soldier, who fired on the people, was stoned to death.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Acadia arrived at Boston on Sunday evening last, bringing Liverpool dates to the 8th inst. The following intelligence was sent to the New York papers by telegraph :—

In England and Ireland the greatest excitement exists. Lord John Russell has repeated in the House of Commons his previous declaration that the whole weight of the Government should be applied to the maintenance of order and to put down disaffection and rebellion.

The accounts from Ireland are more menacing than ever. The students in Trinity College are arming in defence of the Government, and the members of the Royal Dublin Society are following their example. Additional troops have arrived from England. The Repealers in the City are equally energetic, and are being warmly supported throughout the provinces.

The great demonstration of the Chartists, which was to come off in London on the 10th inst., has been forbidden by the English Government. All the arrangements for the procession were going on satisfactorily—the route laid down, the carriage for conveying the petition built, and the banners, insignia, &c. decided on, when Sir G. Gray, the Home Secretary, announced to Parliament on the 6th instant, the determination of Government, not to allow the assemblage or procession to take place. The Chartists have passed resolutions declaring that the meeting and procession shall take place despite the threats of the Government.

The general commotion on the continent has gone on increasing. The intelligence respecting the insurrection in Lombardy has been confirmed, with the farther important feature that the King of Sardinia, at the head of an army of 30,000 troops, crossed from the Piedmontese territory into Lombardy, issuing, as he passed the frontiers, a formal declaration of war against Austria, and marched direct to Milan. The Austrians, defeated at every point, fled as he approached, and having successfully been driven from Parma, Brescia, and Des Seuzano, have endeavored to establish themselves on the line of the Mincio.

It is said that a disposable force will be shortly at the command of Charles Albert of not less than 250,000. With such an army not only will all Lombardy be liberated, but Austria may be threatened, even at the gates of Vienna.

Savoy has declared itself a Republic.

In Switzerland a strict neutrality seems to be aimed at, and the levying troops is discountenanced by the Vorort. All the countries on the right bank of the Rhine have been violently convulsed.

At Baden, Wurtemberg, and Saxony, liberal Governments have been conceded to the people.

In Hanover the triumph of popular feeling has been complete.

In Prussia, after the bloody scenes which took place in Berlin, the King has put himself at the head of the German Confederation and promises extensive Constitutional reforms.

All Silesia, Breslau, and even Lithuania appears to be in an alarming state of convulsion. It is rumored that 50,000 Cossacks have suddenly appeared at Tilsit, and in the state of excitement in which the Emperor is at the moment, should the King of Prussia waver, the consequences may be serious. The Emperor himself is vigorous and decided. He is said to have ordered every man in Russian Poland between 18 and 35 to be removed into the interior of Russia.

Nicholas is concentrating a vast army in Southern Russia which we should deem sufficient to crush any attempt to erect a Republic in that division of the Empire.

Belgium and Holland are comparatively tranquil.

It is reported that the Turkish Government, under the influence of the Russian Ambassador, refuses to acknowledge the French Republic.

A violent emeute took place at Madrid on the evening of the 26th. The people and the soldiery fought in the streets from 7 in the evening until 3 or 4 in the morning, and a considerable number were slain on both sides. The cause was said to be a republican movement. Court-martials have been held on many of the prisoners, but no executions took place. Queen Christina is said to have fled.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.—A man residing in Boston, who has always maintained an unblemished character for sobriety and regular habits, the other day drew $500 from a bank, put the money in his pocket, took a cab and drove away. He was absent two or three days, when he returned, covered with mud and filth, but could give no account of where he had been, and the money which he took from the bank was gone. Within a day or two he has received a letter from a relative in Maine, acknowledging the receipt of $500, and inquiring what disposition is to be made of the money. The only plausible explanation of the affair is that while in an insane state of mind he sent the money to his uncle; and, as he was, soon after his return, attacked with brain fever, it may, perhaps, be supposed with some degree of plausibility that he was all the while under the effect of the fever, which had not then developed itself.

A WEALTHY COUNTY.—The Cincinnati Commercial publishes a table showing the names and worth, in part, of the rich men of that city and of Hamilton County, being the list of persons whose taxes for State and county purposes the past year have amounted to five hundred dollars and upward. The taxes of N. Longworth alone are $11,500 The total amount paid by 105 persons and firms $110,105, averaging upward of one hundred each. The same table has also added a few interesting particulars in regard to the aggregate amounts paid in several previous years, which includes the total receipts of the County Treasury, for direct taxes, licenses, &c. the year ending in June of each year.

In 1810, Rev. L. J. Wilson, Treasurer	$2,594 54
In 1820, D. Wade, Treasurer	12,972 77
In 1830, R. Fosdick, do	57,057 44
In 1840, S. Martin, do	222,222 53
In 1847, W. Holmes, do about	475,000 00

The receipts of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, during the year 1847, amounted to £84,068 7s. 3d. Of this sum £40,253 3s. 3d. belongs to the funds for new and special purposes.

SUMMARY.

Three young men of Fulton, above Cincinnati, lost their lives in a gale, while sailing on the river, by the capsizing of the boat. The boat was light and delicately built, and was ballasted with iron bloom, which were fastened down to the keel. When the boat capsized in the gust, it went immediately to the bottom, carried down by the weight of the iron which could not be displaced in consequence of the fastenings, taking with it two of the young men, who, doubtless became entangled in the rigging. The other came to surface, but perished before assistance ance could reach him. All three were drowned.

On the night of the 15th inst., a band of slaves attempted to escape from Washington in a Jersey schooner which was to take them to Philadelphia. But a steamer having been chartered and armed, pursuit was given, and they were overtaken near the mouth of the Potomac river, where they were captured without resistance. They were brought back to the wharf, when the whole party, captain, crew, and seventy-seven negroes, were lodged in jail.

At a meeting of the Great Western Steamship Company at Bristol, England, the expenses attending the recovery of the steamship Great Britain were stated to amount, after deducting the proceeds of materials, to £12,670 14s. 1d. The estimates for restoring her to the condition she was in previously to her stranding, amounted to £21,694 5s. The directors stated that, after a settlement had been come to with the underwriters at Liverpool and Glasgow, negotiations for her sale would have their best attentions.

The circumstances under which a child of Mr. Hopkins of Northampton was scalded to death, are stated in the Worcester Journal as follows: Previous to putting him to bed, the girl having charge of the nursery put a quantity of boiling water in the bathing tub, preparatory to the accustomed ablution of the children, and left the room without qualifying its temperature. The little naked boy, supposing the water ready for his use, jumped into the tub, and was immersed in the boiling water!

Clarence, a son of Hon. David Wilmot, aged about eleven years, came to his death on Monday evening last, says the Bradford Reporter, by eating of the wild parsnip. He was attending Mrs. Robbs' school at Athens, and in company with another lad, in the fields, ate of the root, which caused his death after much suffering, in about two hours. The other lad was not so badly poisened and is expected to survive.

On the 15th inst., John H. Smith, one of the Deputies of the Sheriff of Columbia Co., N. Y., was shot by two men while returning from an attempt to sell some property of Geo. I. Finkle on a judgment obtained against him a few weeks since, by Geo. Weeks, for damages done said Weeks by having his harness and farming implements destroyed last season. The Governor offered a large reward for the perpetrators of the act, and it is believed that they have been taken.

A Washington letter writer states that the Select Committee appointed by the House of Representatives, will report unanimously in favor of the railroad project of Mr. Whitney, and in favor of granting him whatever portion of the public domain may be necessary for the completion of the enterprise.

The Governor of New York has offered a reward of $1,000 for the apprehension of Miller and Wheeler, charged with having shot J. H. Smith, a deputy sheriff of Columbia County. Also, a like sum for the arrest of one John Mosher, of the same County, charged with the crimes of burglary, arson, and conspiracy.

The farmers of Northern Indiana have formed an association for the purpose of building warehouses to store their grain in, and vessels to ship it in. They are dissatisfied with the rates of the forwarders and shippers.

Dr. Ford, the chaplain of Newgate, told the narrator, that when a reprieve came for one man under sentence of death, he returned a Bible and Prayer-book which the doctor had given him, with his thanks, remarking that he had then "no farther use for them."

The Sun says that the under-ground abolition railway, for stealing slaves, is said to have been exceedingly busy for a few weeks past, as many as ten or fifteen runaways having passed through this city daily.

The London University College has received from an unknown source, the munificent donation of £5000. The only condition of the gift is that it be called "The Andrews Fund."

The Rev. James O'Sullivan, late a Parish Priest of the Diocese of Kerry, and John Fitzgerald, Esq., with several other respectable persons, renounced tho errors of popery on the 5th ult., in St. Thomas's Church, Dublin.

On Thursday evening, April 13, six prisoners made their escape from the Clinton prison. Though their flight was immediately known, and the most prompt measures were taken to secure their arrest, they eluded all efforts to recapture them. A reward of $50 is offered for each.

Russell Cady, and his mother, Nancy Cady, who have been confined nearly eighteen months in the prison of Chenango Co., N. Y., on a charge of murdering George Manwaring, Jr., in October, 1846, have been acquitted at a second trial, and released from imprisonment.

A letter has been received at Washington, dated Mexico, 4th inst., which states that the prospect of peace is very uncertain. The writer is an intelligent gentleman, who has hitherto been sanguine of peace, but now considers the ratification of the Treaty extremely doubtful.

The Buffalo Courier of the 19th, says that the water in the lake at that point was about fifteen inches lower than it had ever been known to be by a gentleman who had resided there for thirty years.

The steamer Niagara was wrecked on the 18th inst., near the mouth of the Genesee River, on her regular trip from Oswego to Rochester. She was valued at $60,000. No lives were lost.

Clapp's Pavilion, at Whitestown, N. Y., was burnt on the 19th inst., together with the out-houses.

The Hampshire Herald contains a letter from a patient of the water-cure Dr. Ruggles, who went through a course of five months' treatment, during which he was thought to be a certain victim. He says that his weight at the commencement of the treatment was 127 pounds, and that he was relieved of thirty-three pounds of bad flesh and morbid secretions, and now feels that he has been made over, even to his finger nails. He had been the prey of dyspepsia, liver-complaint, and erysipelas, for fourteen years, but is now sound and hearty.

Dr. Simpson, of Scotland, has computed that of 300 surgical operations performed with ether and chloroform, fewer proved fatal than is usual in the same cases without these agents. Of 1088 cases of amputation of the thigh, without an anæsthetic agent, 44 in 100 died; out of 135 cases, with ether or chloroform, 33 only died, or 24 in 100.

The agricultural stock of Great Britain is estimated at the value of £330,870,000, or about $1,600,000,000—consisting of horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs. The implements of husbandry and the labors bestowed on the agriculture of that country would increase the total value to £500,000,000, or about two thirds of the public debt.

The history of the later kings of France shows a remarkable succession of misfortunes: Louis XVI. guillotined. Louis XVII. died of want. Louis XVIII. twice exiled. Napoleon exiled. His son died in a foreign land. Charles X. dethroned. Henry V. proscribed. Louis Philippe put to flight. The Count of Paris rejected.

Large quantities of lumber have arrived at Pittsburg from the lumber regions up the Allegany. The shore of the Allegany is crowded with it almost as far as the eye can reach. If we continue to be distressed, says a Pittsburg paper, with the destruction of buildings by fire as we have been of late, lumber will be in good demand for some time to come.

The Concord (N. H.) Patriot of the 13th says: "The Grand Jury found thirty-nine indictments for violations of the License Laws, at the session of the court here. The whole amount of the fines adjudged by the court is just $950. The cost amounts to about $4 on each indictment."

The Mobile Tribune of the 8th inst. says that the British Charge d'Affaires at Washington has remonstrated in very strong terms, under instructions from his government, against the enforcement by the authorities of Mobile, of the laws of Alabama on the subject of the arrival of free persons of color in her ports. The cases of the British ships "Queen" and "Portland" are made the foundation of the complaint.

Simpson, in his Overland Journey Round the World, says: "During my visit, there was living on Woahoo, Sandwich Islands, a woman of twelve years of age, who had already presented to an English husband three thriving pledges of connubial love."

The Concord (N. H.) Freeman says that the vote on the question submitted by the Legislature, in respect to the expediency of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors except for mechanical and medicinal purposes, seems to indicate that a majority of the people approve such a law.

The West Harwich correspondent of the Yarmouth Register says that two sisters in that village a short time since, on the same day, each presented her liege lord a pair of fine, healthy twins, two boys and two girls. The interesting young strangers were doing well at the last accounts.

The printers of Rome have a way of manifesting joy peculiar to themselves. We notice from an English paper that on the day after intelligence of the new Sardinian, Tuscan, and Neapolitan constitutions was received, all the Roman newspapers were printed with red ink, as a sign of rejoicing.

Four girls were recently arrested in the village of Odell, Bedfordshire, Eng., for sticking a cat full of pins and then burning her alive. The cruel deed was performed as a charm, to ascertain the constancy of a lover of one of the girls.

The Trenton (N. J.) State Gazette, says, "More than 1,600 persons have been added to the Methodist Church, in New Jersey, during the protracted meetings of the present season—and probably many more which have not been reported."

A case was decided last week, in Fairfax County, Va., which has been in Chancery for twenty years. The decision was for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals! So the end is not yet.

The Sun avers that it is currently reported, and that great credence is given to the report, that John Jacob Astor has never been naturalized. It is said that upon examination of the books of the United States Court from 1784 to the present time his name does not appear. If such is the case, adds the Sun, his immense property must revert to the State, a sum which would amply provide for the liquidation of the State Debt and provide for the School Fund. NOTICE—BILLS.—Several weeks ago we gave notice of our desire to settle up all old accounts for the Recorder, so as to begin the fifth volume, in June next, with clean books. To encourage promptness, and to secure as complete a settlement as possible, we proposed to receive $2 per year on old accounts, if paid previous to the close of the present vol.; while all accounts remaining unsettled at the time, we gave notice, would be kept separate from future accounts, and charged at the rate of $2 50 per year, according to our published terms. Within a few weeks past we have sent bills to nearly all of our subscribers who owe us more than $1, reckoning to the close of the present volume. This will enable each one to understand exactly how his account stands, and to avail himself of our offer to receive the advance price, even on old accounts. If our bills are incorrect in any respect, we will cheerfully correct them on a representation of the case. If they are correct, we hope the money will be immediately forwarded, either through our agents or directly to us. You may send money by mail at our risk, provided you inform the postmaster what the letter contains, and retain a description of the bills.

NOTICE.

The Publishing Committee of the Sabbath Recorder request a full meeting of the subscribers to the Publishing Fund, at Plainfield, N. J., on the evening of fifth-day, May 25. The Committee are desirous of submitting, at this meeting, a report of their past labors, that such arrangements may be made for the future publication of the paper as may be deemed advisable. Those who can not attend personally, are requested to appoint a representative, who shall have discretion to act for them, as it will be important to have a full vote of all interested.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"
For all four of the Reviews,	8 00	"
For Blackwood's Magazine,	3 00	"
For Blackwood and three Reviews,	9 00	"
For Blackwood and the four Reviews,	10 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton —by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

THE MARSEILLAISE HYMN,

Was first sung by the Marseillaise confederates, in 1792, from whom it received its name. It was composed by M. Joseph Rougeu de L'Isle, while an officer in the engineer corps at Strasburg, early in the French Revolution, with a view of supplanting the vulgar songs then in vogue, relative to the struggle then in progress. He composed the song and music in one night. It was first called "L'Offrande a la Liberte," (an Offering to Liberty.) It became the national song of the French patriots and warriors, and was famous in Europe and America. The air is peculiarly exciting. It was suppressed, of course, under the Empire and the Bourbons—but the Revolution of 1830 called it up anew, and it has since become again the national song of the French patriots. The ex-King of the French, Louis Philippe, bestowed on its composer, who was about seventy years old at the time of the last Revolution, (having been born in 1760,) a pension of 1500 francs from his private purse. The following is an old but admirable translation of this splendid national lyric:

Ye sons of France, awake to glory,
Hark, hark, what myriads bid you rise;
Your children, wives, and grandsires hoary,
Behold their tears and hear their cries.
Shall hateful tyrants, mischief breeding,
With hireling hosts, a ruffian band,
Affright and desolate the land,
While Peace and Liberty lie bleeding?
(Chorus.)—To arms! to arms, ye brave!
Th' avenging sword unsheath!
March on, march on—all hearts resolved
On Liberty or Death!

Now, now the dangerous storm is rolling,
Which treach'rous kings confederate raise;
The dogs of war let loose are howling,
And, lo! our fields and cities blaze.
And shall we basely view the ruin,
While lawless force with guilty stride
Spreads desolation far and wide,
With crime and blood his hands embruing?
(Chorus.)—To arms, &c.

With luxury and pride surrounded,
The vile insatiate despots dare—
Their thirst of gold and power unbounded—
To mete and vend the light and air.
Like beasts of burden would they load us,
Like tyrants bid their slaves adore;
But man is man, and who is more?
Nor shall they longer lash and goad us.
(Chorus.)—To arms, &c.

O, Liberty! can man resign thee,
Once having felt the gen'rous flame!
Can dungeons, bolts and bars confine thee,
Or whips thy noble spirit tame?
Too long the world has wept, bewailing
That falsehood's dagger tyrants wield;
But Freedom is our sword and shield,
And all their arts are unavailing.
(Chorus.)—To arms, &c.

THE MUTINEERS.

BY REV. J. GREENLEAF.

Do you see that little speck on the map of the Pacific Ocean, at about twenty-five degrees South latitude, and one hundred degrees West longitude? It is Pitcairn's Island, a little spot of not more than fifteen miles in circumference, rising out of the sea, alone, in mid-ocean, and around its rocky shores the sea roared for centuries, with no human being there to hearken to the sound. Within sixty years past that little spot has been the scene of a most wonderful drama, or rather a romance in real life, which puts fiction in the shade, and illustrates in a remarkable manner, the overruling hand of Divine Providence in educing good from evil.

In the year 1787, the ship Bounty, under the command of Capt. Bligh, was sent to the Pacific by the British government for the purpose of carrying the bread-fruit tree from the Society Islands to the West Indies. Having procured a stock of plants, and transacted all the necessary business, the ship left Tahiti, April 4th, 1789, navigated by forty-five men. Some difficulties had occurred between Capt. Bligh and Fletcher Christian his mate, previously to this, but the infection now spread rapidly, and in about twenty days broke out in open mutiny; when the mutineers, headed by the mate, seized the ship, and putting the captain and eighteen men who adhered to him into an open boat, with a small stock of provisions, set them adrift. The mutineers, twenty-five persons in all, then directed their course to the Society Islands, where they cruised about for some months, abandoning themselves to all sorts of licentiousness. As might well be expected, quarrels arose among them; and at length, sixteen of the crew, taking their share of the property from the vessel, landed at Tahiti, with the avowed design of spending their lives on the Island; while the remainder decoyed on board thirty-five natives, men, women and boys, set sail in the Pacific and were supposed to be lost.

Captain Bligh and his little company suffered incredible hardships, being forty-two days in an open boat, with no more provisions than would have lasted the company for five days; but after rowing and sailing more than three thousand six hundred miles, with the loss of one man only, they arrived at the island of Timor, in the East Indies, from whence they obtained a passage home. On the return of Captain Bligh to England, the frigate Pandora was dispatched to the Society Islands, to arrest the mutineers, if they could be found. At Tahiti, they succeeded in arresting fourteen of those who landed there, two having been killed previously in a quarrel with the natives. On the passage home the Pandora was wrecked, and four of the mutineers were drowned. The remaining ten were put on trial in England; four were acquitted, one was discharged for some informality in the proceedings, and five were convicted. Two of these were afterwards pardoned, and three were executed. No further inquiries were made. Twenty years passed away, and the thing was almost forgotten.

About the year 1810, Captain Folger, in the ship Topaz, of Boston, was cruising in the Pacific for whales; and sailing a little out of the common track, made Pitcairn's Island. To his great astonishment, as he neared the shore, he perceived the appearance not only of inhabitants, but of a regular settlement. This information noised abroad; and not long after this, the English ship Briton, Sir Thomas Staines commander, in making a voyage from the Marquesas to Valparaiso, fell in, unexpectedly, with the same lone spot. It being night when he arrived in the offing, he "hove to," that he might ascertain by daylight whether the Island was inhabited. In the morning he was surprised to see the land laid out in regular plantations, the huts neatly built, and the whole appearance indicating industry and civilization. Presently he saw the natives bringing a canoe to the beach, which being launched, two stepped into it, and dashing through the surf, were soon along-side of the ship. If Captain Staines was surprised at the appearance of the Island, he was perfectly astonished on being hailed from the boat in good English. The natives, two young men, were taken on board, and the mystery was soon explained. They were Thursday October Christian, the son of Fletcher Christian, the leader of the mutineers, and George Young, the son of another leading man among them. Captain Staines landed, and found only a single survivor left of the crew of the Bounty, and from this man, named John Adams, learned the following history.

Fletcher Christian had some knowledge of Pitcairn's Island. He knew it to be a fertile spot, uninhabited, far remote from any others, and out of the general track of vessels passing through those seas. Thither he directed his course; and having made the Island, run the ship into a little bay—stripped it of everything valuable, and broke it up, the whole company resolving there to spend their days. They divided the Island among themselves, took the native women that they brought with them as their wives, and made slaves of the native men. Thus things went on for nearly two years, and these wicked men began to feel secure in their iniquity. But a day of awful reckoning was at hand, and the vengeance of Heaven did not slumber forever. The native men, being cruelly oppressed by these lawless seamen, rose upon them, and in one night massacred all but four, who contrived to escape their hands. Nor did the deeds of blood stop here. The native women had become attached to their English husbands, wicked as they were; and when they saw them fall by the hand of violence, they banded together, and watching an opportunity, rose upon the native men, and in one night murdered the whole. Of the four Englishmen who were left, two were exceedingly bad men. One had some knowledge of distilling, and by repeated experiments had succeeded in manufacturing an intoxicating liquor. This he used so freely that he shortly after became insane; and throwing himself from a cliff was dashed to pieces. The other was a monster in wickedness, threatening the lives of his companions, and became at length so dangerous to the whole community that the public safety demanded his execution—and they shot him.

The whole population of the Island was now about twenty-five souls, John Adams and George Young, their wives, eight other native women, with some ten or twelve children. Such was the state of things at Pitcairn's Island, at the close of the year 1793. John Adams and George Young looked on the scene of carnage and death before them, and their hearts sunk with anguish. Their wickedness stared them in the face—their sin had found them out—and they lifted up their hearts to God for pardon and cleansing. Nor did their penitence end in words. They saw a work before them—a mighty work indeed—but one which Divine Providence had most evidently placed in their path; and they hoped that by a life of usefulness, the sincerity of their repentance might be made evident.

Here were ten native women, untaught pagans, who knew nothing of the true God or of eternal life; and here, also, were children growing up—their own and their companions'—without any suitable instruction pertaining to this world or the world to come. They resolved to attempt this great work. They were both naturally of a sedate turn of mind, and Young had a tolerable education. With untiring assiduity they applied themselves to the instruction of their little colony, teaching them the arts of civilized life, as well as the truths of the gospel, and establishing the observance of the Sabbath and regular worship.

The death of George Young, in the year 1800, left Adams sole patriarch of the community. A blessing had evidently attended their labors; a large portion of the heathen women had hopefully become christians, and the children were growing up an intelligent and civilized race.

* * * * *

Adams died in March, 1829, at the age of sixty-nine years, leaving a colony of nearly seventy persons, including five widows of the original mutineers—many of the others young married people with rising families—a large portion of the whole being intelligent, sober, religious.

Pitcairn's Island is still, as ever, the little speck on the bosom of the great Pacific, and its waves dash in vain against the wall of adamant by which it is surrounded; but the roar of its waters is now heard by a christian community, who, though the offspring of vile men, yet, by the blessing of Heaven on the well-meant endeavors of two reformed mutineers, have been elevated in the scale of humanity far above many in positions of far greater privilege.

THE QUEEN AND THE PARROT.

The following morsel of gossip appears in a recent No. of the Bristol Mercury: "A noted bird fancier, living in the neighborhood of the Great Western terminus in Bristol, lately reared a parrot of uncommon beauty, and moreover of a disposition to talk. Poll was duly instructed, and, as will be seen in the sequel, in time more than repaid her tutor for the pains he had taken. Her teacher was so much pleased with Poll's progress, that he determined to present her at Court, and she was accordingly started upon the journey. Poll, upon her arrival, was somewhat abashed at the new scenes of splendor in which she found herself, and exhibited an unwonted uncouthness, aud would not speak to any one. At length, however, she was introduced to the Queen, who, struck with the beautiful plumage and fine symmetry of the newly arrived guest, entered with great condescension into conversation with her. Poll's shyness wore off, and before the Queen left her she said, 'If you don't send 20*l*. I'll go back.' The Queen inquired to whom she was indebted for this new acquisition to her aviary, ascertained the circumstances connected with the affair, and gave orders for the transmission of 20*l*. to the rearer of Poll, who accordingly was paid that sum a few days since at the West of England Bank in this city—an inducement to all teachers to impart profitable instruction to their pupils.'

Wonderful Instincts of Coral Insects.—Most of the coral reefs are built in the form of a cresent or the segment of a circle, with the back to the sea, as if the little architects were aware of the properties of the arch, and knew that it would resist the dashing of the waves better than a straight line. The back of the coral crescent is generally directed towards the quarter from which storms frequently come. The care taken to work perpendicularly in the early stages of their operations would also mark a surprising instinct in these diminutive creatures. Their wall of coral, for the most part built in situations where the winds are constant, having arrived at the surface, affords a shelter to leeward from which their infant colonies may be safely sent forth; to this their instinctive foresight, it seems to be owing, that the windward side of a coral reef exposed to the open sea, is generally, if not always, the highest part, rising almost perpendicularly, sometimes from the depth of 200 fathoms.

TALENT ALWAYS WORTH A PRICE.

No men are more justly entitled to fair prices, than truly qualified and competent teachers. And this, not barely because of the value of what they give in return, but because of the great outlay of time and money necessary to prepare for their profession. Some teachers have spent a dozen years in preparation, and have laid out many thousand dollars; a capital of time and money sufficient to have made them rich, in merchandize, or at any mechanical art. Few persons can estimate the value of things, where results are produced with ease, and in a moment. They must see the labor performed. Most can readily believe that a railroad, a canal, or a ship, is worth all the money asked for it; but they cannot understand why a painting or a statue should be held at many thousand dollars. Nor can they but be amazed that Paganini should expect twenty guineas for a single "tune" performed on the violin! A plain, but frank-hearted and sensible farmer, once called at the office of a celebrated Chief Justice in the South, and asked him a very important question, that could be answered in an instant, categorically—yes or no. "No," was promptly returned. The farmer was well satisfied. The decision was worth to him many thousand dollars. And now the client, about to retire, asked the lawyer the charge for the information. "Ten dollars," replied he. "Ten dollars!" ejaculated the astonished farmer, "ten dollars!! for saying, no?" "Do you see these rows of books, my friend?" rejoined the Chief Justice; "I have spent many years in reading them, and studying their contents, to answer No." "Right! right! responded the honest farmer, "right! I cheerfully pay the ten dollars. ["Teaching a Science."

CALL OF AMERICAN BIRDS.

If superstition takes alarm at our familiar and simple species, what then would be thought by the ignorant of a South American kind, large as the Wood Owl, which, in the lonely forests of Demerara, about midnight, breaks out, lamenting like one in deep distress, and in a tone more dismal even than the painful hexachord of the slothful Ai? The sounds, like the expiring sighs of some agonizing victim, begin with a high loud note, ha, ha, ha ha ha! ha! each tone falling lower and lower, till the last syllable is scarcely heard, pausing a minute or two between this reiterated tale of seeming sadness. Four other species of the Goat-sucker, according to Waterton, also inhabit this tropical wilderness, among which also is included the Whip-poor-Will. Figure to yourself the surprise and wonder of the stranger who takes up his solitary abode for the first night amidst those awful and interminable forests, when, at twilight, he begins to be assailed familiarly with a spectral equivocal bird, approaching within a few yards, and then accosting him with who-are-you, who-who-who-are-you? Another approaches and bids him, as if a slave under the lash, work-away, work-work-work-away! a third mournfully cries, willy-come-go! willy-willy-willy-come-go! and as you get among the highlands, our old acquaintance vociferates whip poor-will, whip-whip-whip-poor-will! It is, therefore, not surprising that such unearthly sounds should be considered in the light of supernatural forebodings issuing from spectres in the guise of birds.

File Cutting.—Files, though in common use, and apparently of easy manufacture, have until recently been made by hand. Three-fourths of the files made in the world are made in Sheffield, England. Germany makes a few, but of inferior workmanship and steel. France is dependent upon England for files. They have been made by chisel and mallet, used in the same way as by a sculptor. Machinery can accomplish the cutting, but left the edges too smooth to be of any more use than the worn-out English file. Machinery is now in operation at the Ballard Vale machine shop at Andover, which succeeds in giving the rough edge to the teeth, and will make a material reduction in the price of an article found to be indispensably requisite in the shop of every mechanic.

The piece of steel to be cut is placed in a socket, and then carried gradually under a sort of hammer chisel, which moves with a motion similar to that of a toggle joint reversed, and which not only cuts the teeth, but at the same time turns up the edges so as to make them rough, like the teeth of the best English files. The apparatus is very simple, and shows that Yankee ingenuity can overcome almost all obstacles.

Artificial Iceing.—An invention for generating ice by artificial means has just been discovered by Messrs. Lings & Keith, of London, the patentees of the ice-safe, &c. The ice is produced by means of a powder composed of salts, ammonia, and various chemical mixtures. This powder is placed in a simple apparatus, something in the shape of a churn, but smaller in size, and, being mixed with water, is kept in motion by a rotary process around the bottle of wine to be cooled. In a few minutes, at a very trifling expense, the wine is sufficiently cooled, and if kept a few minutes longer in the vessel would be actually frozen. A bottle of water may be frozen to a solid, by this prolonged motion, but, of course it is not requisite to reduce the temperature of wine below a certain degree of coolness.

Asparagus.—A correspondent of the Farmer and Mechanic raised asparagus very successfully as follows: "I selected a warm, sunny spot, and mixed in freely sand and coarse manure, saturating it with brine to the depth of two feet. On the top, I put three inches of fine loam and vegetable mold; planting my seeds after steeping them in warm water 24 hours, the seeds about 8 inches apart, and the rows one foot." Every autumn fine manure is mixed with the surface soil, and a coat of coarse manure protects the whole through the winter. Two quarts of salt on a bed 5 feet by 30, are sprinkled every spring, and water freely applied every evening in dry weather.

Consumption and Ventilation.—Sir Jacob Starks, physician to the Queen of England, enumerates as the exciting cause of consumption, "long confinement in close ill-ventilated rooms, whether nurseries, or school-rooms, or manufactories;" he also says, "if an infant, born in perfect health, and of the healthiest parents, be kept in close rooms, in which free ventilation and cleanliness are neglected, a few months will often suffice to induce tuberculous chachexia"—the beginning of consumption. Persons engaged in confined close rooms, or work-shops, are the chief sufferers from consumption; thus, of the 233 tailors who died in one district in London, in 1839, 133 died of diseases of the lungs, of whom ninety-two died of consumption. Of fifty-two milliners dying in the same year, thirty-three died of diseases of the lungs, of whom 28 died of consumption. Dr. Guy reports, that in a close printers' room, he found seventeen men at work, of whom three had spitting of blood, two had affections of the lungs, and five had constant and severe colds. After reading these sad facts, who can deny that the chief cause of consumption is the respiration of bad air?

A few Words for Children.—You were made to be kind, says Horace Mann, generous and magnanimous. If there is a boy in the school who has a club foot, don't let him know that you ever saw it. If there is a boy with ragged clothes, don't talk about rags when he is in hearing. If there is a lame boy, assign him some part of the game which does not require running. If there is a hungry one, give him a part of your dinner. If there is a dull one, help him to get his lesson. If there is a bright one, be not envious of him; for if one boy is proud of his talents, and another is envious of them, there are two great wrongs and no more talents than before. If a larger or stronger boy has injured you, and is sorry for it, forgive him and request the teacher not to punish him. All the school will show by their countenances how much better it is to have a great soul than a great fist.

Alexander Dumas.—The Boston Atlas has a sketch of this famous novelist from the pen of Mr. Poore. He says: Dumas is a mulatto, with thick lips, a frizzled woolly head, and all the peculiarities of the negro race. "There is only one country I wish to see," said Dumas last spring, as we were taking a cup of coffee together, one day, on the Boulevard. "And what country is that?" I asked. "America." "Come over, then, it is but a fornight's journey." "The distance is nothing, but the idea that I might be insulted on the account of my complexion, is a sufficient barrier to keep me away. Why, sir, I was on my way to St. Germain one day in the cars, and though my knowledge of English is imperfect, I distinctly understood a lady to say that in the United States I would be expelled from the cars."

How Spiders make Bridges.—Some of the most distinguished naturalists of the world believe that spiders have the art of crossing streams on bridges of their own making. Mr Spencer relates the following carious fact:—"Having placed a large, full-grown spider on a cane upright in the midst of a stream of water, he saw it descend the cane several times, and remount when it arrived at the surface of the water. Suddenly he lost sight of it wholly; but a few minutes afterwards, to his great astonishment, he perceived it quietly pursuing its own way on the other side of the stream. Having spun two threads along the cane, it had cut one of them, which, carried by the wind, had become attached to some object on the bank, and so served the spider as a bridge across the water.

A Good Temper in a Wife.—This is a very difficult thing to ascertain beforehand. Smiles are easily put on for the occasion; and besides, the frowns are, according to the lover's whim, interpreted into the contrary. By "good temper," we do not mean an easy temper, a serenity which nothing disturbs; for that is a mark of laziness. Sullenness, if you be not too blind to perceive it, is a temper to be avoided, by all means. A sullen man is bad enough; what then, must be a sullen woman, and that woman a wife; a constant intimate; a companion day and night? Only think of the delight of sitting at the same table, and occupying the same chamber for a week, without exchanging a work the whole while! Very bad to be scolding for that length of time; but this is far better than "the sulks."

VARIETY.

Among the various inventions which have recently been patented, is one termed a Traveler's Door Fastener, which is composed of two small metal plates formed into a wedge by the insertion of a piece of wood between them, while the under plate is fitted with two small spikes that catch the floor. The sharp end of the fastener is thrust under the door, and is more firmly fixed by every attempt to enter the room, while a cord carried to the bedside enables a person lying in bed to withdraw the wedge, and thus admit a visitor.

A root and stalk of celery, weighing fourteen pounds without the leaves, and measuring fourteen inches in circumference, was exhibited at a recent meeting of the Cincinnati Horticultural Society. It was exhibited to show the value of salt as a manure for this plant, the gentleman who raised the article having made the experiment of treating a portion of his plants in the ordinary way, and manuring a part of them with salt. The former were, of ordinary size and quality, the latter being both larger and of finer flavor, of which the specimen exhibited was an exemplification.

When the French Minister at Washington heard the revolutionary news from Paris, he immediately left Speaker Winthrop's table where he was dining, "went out and wept bitterly." The announcement had such an effect on the nerves of the little queen of Spain, that it was found necessary to bleed her; and the Count de Flahault, the French ambassador at the Court of Vienna, is reported to have fainted.

Whitfield's habits were singularly nice and cleanly, upon the principle that everything about a minister should be "spotless." He was known to say that he could not die easy if his gloves were out of place. He had the gentlemanly love of order, which required his table to be elegantly spread, even if only a loaf, or his favorite dish, a cow-heel, were to be seen upon it.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:
First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from	$3 00 to $5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

A TOUCHING STORY.

BY PROFESSOR WILSON.

The coffin was let down to the bottom of the grave, the planks were removed from the heaped up brink, the first rattling clods had struck their knell, the quick shoveling was over, and the long, broad, skillfully-cut pieces of turf were aptly joined together, and trimly laid by the beating spade, so that the newest mound in the church-yard was scarcely distinguished from those that were grown over by the undisturbed grass and daisies of a luxuriant spring. The burial was soon over, and the party, with one consenting motion, having uncovered their heads in decent reverence of the place and occasion, were beginning to separate, and about to leave the church-yard. Here some acquaintances from different parts of the parish, who had not had an opportunity of addressing each other in the house that belonged to the deceased, nor in the course of the hundred yards the little procession had to move, from his bed to his grave, were shaking hands quietly, but cheerfully, and inquiring after the welfare of each others' families. There a knot of neighbors were speaking without exaggeration of the respectable character which the deceased had borne, and mentioning one to another the little incidents of his life, some of them so remote as to be known only to the grey-headed persons of the group. While a few yards further removed from the spot, were standing together parties who discussed ordinary concerns, altogether unconnected with the funeral; such as the state of the markets, the promise of the season, or change of tenants; but still with a sobriety of manner and voice that was insensibly produced by the influence of the simple ceremony now closed, by the quiet graves around, and the shadow of the spire and grey walls of the house of God.

Two men yet stood together at the head of the grave, with severe and unimpassioned grief. They were brothers—the only sons of him who had been buried; and there was something in their situation that naturally kept the eyes of many directed upon them for a long time, and more intently than would have been the case, had there been nothing more observable than the common symptoms of common sorrow. But these two brothers, who were standing at the head of their father's grave, had for some years been totally estranged from each other, and the only words that had passed between them, during all that time, had been uttered within a few days past, during the necessary preparations for the old man's funeral.

No deep and deadly quarrel was between these brothers, and neither of them could distinctly tell the cause of this unnatural estrangement. Perhaps dim jealousies of their father's favor; selfish thoughts, that will sometimes force themselves into poor men's hearts, respecting temporal expectations; unaccommodating manners on both sides; taunting words that mean little when uttered, but which rankle and fester in remembrance; imaginary opposition of interest, that, duly considered, would have been one and the same—these and many other causes, slight when single, but strong when rising up in one baneful band, had gradually and fatally infected their hearts, till at last they who in youth had been seldom separate, and truly attached, now met at market, and, miserable to say, at church, with dark and averted faces, like different clansmen during a feud.

Surely, if any thing could have softened their hearts towards each other, it must have been to stand silently side by side, while earth, stones, and clods, were falling down upon their father's coffin. And doubtless their hearts were so softened; but pride, that destroyer of man's peace, prevented the holy affections of nature from being shown. And thus these two brothers stood there together, determined not to let each other know the mutual tenderness that in spite of them was gushing up in their hearts, and teaching them the unconfessed folly and wickedness of their causeless quarrel.

A headstone had been prepared, and a person came forward to plant it—a plain stone, with a sandglass, skull, and cross bones, chiseled not rudely, and a few words inscribed. The younger brother, regarding the operation with a troubled eye, said, loud enough to be heard by several of the bystanders—

"William, this is not kind in you—you should have told me this. I loved my father as well as you could have loved him. You were the elder, and, it may be, the favorite son; but I had a right in nature to have joined you in ordering this headstone, had I not?"

During these words, the stone was sinking into the earth, and many persons who were on their way from the grave returned. For a while, the elder brother said nothing, for he had a consciousness in his heart that he ought to have consulted his father's son, in designing this last mark of affection and respect to his memory; so the stone was planted in silence, and now stood erect, decent and simple, among the other unostentatious memorials of the humble dead.

The inscription merely gave the name and age of the deceased, and told that the stone had been erected by his "affectionate sons." The sight of these words seemed to soften the angry man, and he said, somewhat more mildly, "Yes, we are his affectionate sons; and, since my name is on the stone, I am satisfied, brother. We have not drawn together kindly of late years, and perhaps never may, but I acknowledge and respect your worth; and here, before our friends, and before the friends of our father, with my foot above his head, I express my willingness to be on other and better terms with you; and if we cannot command our hearts, let us at least bar out all unkindness."

The minister who attended the funeral, and had something intrusted to him to say publicly before he left the church-yard, now came forward, and asked the elder brother why he spoke not regarding this matter. He saw that there was something of a cold and sullen pride rising up in his heart; but not easily may any man hope to dismiss from the chamber of his heart even the vilest guest, if once cherished there. With a solemn and almost severe air, he looked upon the relenting man, and then, changing his countenance into serenity, said gently—

> Behold how good a thing it is,
> And how becoming well,
> Together, such as brethren are,
> In unity to dwell.

The time, the place, and this beautiful expression of a natural sentiment, quite overcame a heart in which many kind if not warm affections dwelt; and the man, thus appealed to, bowed down his head and wept.

"Give me your hand, brother;" and it was given, while a murmur of satisfaction arose from all present, and all hearts felt kindlier and more humanely towards each other.

As the brothers stood, fervently but composedly grasping each other's hands, in the little hollow that lay between the grave of their mother, long since dead, and their father, whose shroud was haply not yet still, from the fall of dust to dust, the minister stood beside them, with a pleasant countenance, and said—

"I must fulfil the promise I made to your father on his death bed. I must read to you a few words which his hand wrote at an hour when his tongue denied its office. I need not say that you did your duty to your old father, for did he not often beseech you, apart from one another, for your own sakes as Christians, for the sake of the mother who bore you, and Stephen, who died that you might be born, to be reconciled to one another? When the palsy struck him for the last time, you were both absent; nor was it your fault that you were not beside the old man when he died. As long as sense continued with him here, did he think of you two, and you alone. Tears were in his eyes—I saw them there—and on his cheek, too, when no breath came from his lips. But of this no more. He died with this paper in his hand, and he made me know that I was to read it to you over his grave. I now obey him:

"'MY SONS: If you will let my bones lie quiet in the grave, near the dust of your mother, depart not from my burial till, in the name of God and Christ, you promise to love one another as you used to do. Dear boys, receive my blessing.'"

Some turned their heads away to hide their tears that needed not to be hidden; and when the brothers had released each other from a long and sobbing embrace, many went up to them, and, in a single word or two, expressed their joy at this perfect reconcilement. The brothers themselves walked away from the church-yard, with the minister, to the Manse. On the following Sabbath they were seen sitting, with their families, in the same pew, and it was observed that they read out of the same Bible, when the minister gave out the text; and that they sang together, taking hold of the same psalm book. The psalm was sung, (given out at their request,) of which one verse had been repeated at their father's grave; a larger sum than usual was on that Sabbath found on the plate for the poor, for Love and Charity are sisters. And ever after, both during the peace and troubles of this life, the hearts of the brothers were as one, and in nothing were they divided.

MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

You must love the poor; you must also respect them; and in truth, respect is the very soul of the love which I have enjoined. Honor the poor man. Let not his poverty for a moment hide you from his participation of your own nature and of the divine image. Never let the man be lost in the beggar. If you have not power to penetrate to the spirit within him, and to reverence that divine principle more than all outward magnificence, you are unfit for your office. If there seem to you exaggeration, or a false sentimentality, in the language which pronounces the soul of one poor man worth more than the wealth of worlds, or than all material nature, then you want the spirit of your function, and cannot lay it aside too soon. Go to the poor, to awaken in them the consciousness of their relation to God, and of their immortality. Do not go as the representative of the richer classes, to keep them in order; but go in the name of Christians, to make them partakers of the highest distinctions and blessings in which any of us rejoice. Carry to them the Gospel, not for purposes of worldly policy, but as a life-giving truth, imparted by God to lift them above all worldly greatness, to subject them to a nobler law than that of the state—to make them citizens of heaven. Present religion to them in a generous form. Carry to them the very truths you would bear to the most prosperous and enlightened. Stir up the poor man to be active for his own improvement, and teach him that the power of improvement is communicated to him as liberally as to his prosperous neighbor. Because he is poor, do not think that he is put into your hands as a passive material, to be shaped at your pleasure. Remember that he is as free as yourselves, and can only be carried forward by a spring of improvement in his own soul. [Dr. Channing.

TALKING AFTER CHURCH.

"Well, Laura, give me a short sketch of the sermon. Where was the text?"

"Oh, I don't know—I have forgotten it. But would you believe it? Mrs. A. wore that horrid bonnet of hers. I couldn't keep my eyes off it, all meeting time. Miss P. had on a lovely pink one. Miss T. wore a new shawl that must have cost fifty dollars; I wonder her folks don't see the folly of extravagance. And there was Mrs. H. with her pelisse. It's astonishing what a want of taste some folks exhibit."

"Well, if you have forgotten the sermon, you have not the audience. But which preacher do you prefer, this one or Mr. A.?"

"Oh, Mr. A. He's so handsome and so graceful! What an eye, and what a set of teeth!"

THE LOVE OF LATER YEARS.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

They err who deem Love's brightest hour in blooming youth is known;
Its purest, tenderest, holiest power, in after life is shown,
When passions, chastened and subdued, to riper years are given,
And earth and earthly things are viewed in light that breaks from heaven.

It is not in the flush of youth, or days of cloudless mirth,
We feel the tenderness and truth of Love's devoted worth;
Life then is like a tranquil stream which flows in sunshine bright,
And objects mirrored in it seem to share its sparkling light.

'T is when the howling winds arise, and life is like the ocean,
Whose mountain billows brave the skies, lashed by the storm's commotion;
When lightning cleaves the murky cloud, and thunder-bolts astound us,
'T is then we feel our spirits bowed by loneliness around us.

Oh! then, as to the seaman's sight the beacon's twinkling ray
Surpasses far the lustre bright of summer's cloudless day,
E'en such, to tried and wounded hearts in manhood's darker years,
The gentle light true love imparts, 'mid sorrows, cares, and tears.

Its beams on minds of joy bereft, their fresh'ning brightness fling,
And show that life has somewhat left to which their hopes may cling;
It steals upon the sick at heart, the desolate in soul,
To bid their doubts and fears depart, and point a brighter goal

If such be Love's triumphant power, o'er spirits touched by time,
Oh! who shall doubt its loveliest hour of happiness sublime?
In youth, 't is like the meteor's gleam which dazzles and sweeps by;
In after life its splendors seem linked with eternity!

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

The Hanserd Kyolly's Society has recently sent forth a fine impression of the Pilgrim's Progress, accurately printed, from the first edition, with notices of all the subsequent additions and alterations made by the author. Mr. Offer, the editor, well observes, that "the greatest characteristic of original genius, is its spontaneous exertion,—the evidence of having written without labor and without the consciousness of doing anything remarkable, or the ambitious aim of doing a great work. The greatest efforts of genius flow as naturally as it is for common men to breathe. In this view, Bunyan's work comes nearer to the inspired poetry of the Hebrews in its character than any other human composition. He wrote from the impulse of his genius, sanctified and illuminated by a heavenly influence: as if, indeed, he had exerted no voluntary supervision over its exercise. Everything is as natural and unconstrained as if it had not been intended for public inspection. There has not been found any model with which it can even be compared. It is a beautiful transparency seen as the heavenly light shines through—the renewed spirit alone enjoys the picture in its perfection, with all its chaste, but glowing colors. It can be fully appreciated only by him who possessess that spiritual light without which the things of God and heaven cannot be discerned."

With what artless simplicity does Bunyan tell all this:—

* * * "I only thought to make
I knew not what; nor did I undertake
Thereby to please my neighbor: no, not I;
I did it my own self to gratify.
Neither did I but vacant seasons spend
In this my scribble; nor did I intend
But to divert myself in doing this,
From worser thoughts, which make me do amiss.
Thus I set pen to paper with delight,
And quickly had my thoughts in black and white;
For having now my method by the end,
Still, as I pull'd, it came; and so I penn'd
It down; until it came at last to be,
For length and breadth, the bigness that you see."

When thus finished, Mr. Bunyan showed it to a number of his friends, to obtain their opinion of its probable usefulness. No words can better give the result of the inquiry than his own.

"Some said, John, print it; others said, Not so;
Some said, it might do good; others said, No."

The former judged rightly, and John acted wisely in resolving to leave it as a legacy to the world. Posterity has sealed its verdict, and there is every probability of the work continuing to be read by the pilgrim travelers to the New Jerusalem until the blast of the archangel shall summon the living and the dead in Christ, to meet their Lord in the air.

Without referring to numerous editions published by booksellers, by private individuals, and by various religious and literary societies, we will confine the reader's attention to the operations of one Society established in London.

Among the languages into which the Committee of the London Tract Society have aided to print the Pilgrim's Progress, as stated in their report, are these:

	Languages.	For the people of
Europe.—	English	England, America, and other parts.
	Dutch	Holland and S. Africa.
	French	France and Switzerland.
	Spanish	Spain and S. America.
	Portuguese	Portugal, Madeira, and other islands.
	German	Germany.
	Esthonian	Esthonia, in Russia.
	Armenian	Armenia, in Turkey.
Asia.—	Burmese	Burmah.
	Singhalese	Ceylon.
	Oriya	Orissa.
	Hindostanee	East Indies.
	Bengalee	Bengal.
	Tamil	Madras.
	Marathi	Bombay.
	Cararese	Bombay.
	Gujaratti	Surat.
	Malay	Malacca, and other places in the East Indies.
	Arabic	Arabia.
South Seas.	Samoan	Samoan Islands.
	Tahitian	Tahiti.
Africa.—	Sichuana	South Africa.
	Malagasy	Madagascar.

Who can tell how much good the Pilgrim has done already in heathen lands? We might fill many pages with accounts of the blessing which has come on his labors of love. Let us look to China. "In our Chinese schools," says a missionary, "the little girls are taught to read in English," and the book which delights them, and for which they gladly leave their play that they may read it, is the Pilgrim's Progress."

"It was partly through reading that book," said a Hindoo, "that I began to feel that the Christian religion was the only truly religion, and that Christ was the only Saviour."

"I feel encouraged," writes a missionary in the east, "from the very civil reception the Pilgrim has already met with. Several respectable Mohammedans have read it, and have asked for more copies for their friends. One native sent me a pleasing letter, thanking me with all his heart. He states, that he read the book for three nights together, without stopping; that he never saw such a beautiful book, and he prays that the Holy Spirit may enlighten the hearts of the Malays to understand it."

A missionary in Ceylon sought the aid of a pundit, or native teacher, in translating the Pilgrim into the Singhalese language. The pundit, who had been a heathen priest, was a learned and clever man. As he sat writing out the tale, he was often so affected by it that he could scarcely proceed. The account of Christian leaving the City of Destruction very much pleased him. When he found that Christian got into the Slough of Despond, he really began to feel much pity for him; but on the pilgrim arriving at Mount Sinai, he looked very sad, and said to the missionary, "Sir, what man can be saved?" The missionary replied, "Let us go on a little farther." He then came to the place where Christian got in at the Wicket Gate, and lost his burden at the foot of the cross. The pundit was so overcome with delight, that he laughed, clapped his hands, shouted, and danced for joy, crying out, "Delightful! delightful! When the Pilgrim was printed, and bound in marble paper, with gilt edges, the children of Ceylon were seen carrying it to their homes as the best prize they could obtain in the missionary school.

If we look to other parts of the world, we shall still see the same kindly reception given to the Pilgrim's book. "The young converts in South Africa," writes a Christian teacher, "are much profited by it." If such books as this be printed," said a Russian, "who can any longer put off his repentance?"

But with mingled sadness and joy we turn to Madagascar. When the cruel queen of that Island drove the missionaries from their stations, this book, which had been printed by the Committee of the Religious Tract Society, was sent to comfort and instruct the native Christians, who were shut up in prison, or hid in the caves of the earth, or escaping for their lives through the dark forests of the country. And even when some of them were led forth to die as martyrs, they were firm, saying, "Now we are in the situation of Christian and Faithful, when they were led into Vanity Fair;" and others said, "When Christinn entered the Valley of the Shadow of Death he could say, Though it be a gloomy valley, yet it is the way to the Celestial City." [Religious Tract Society's Report.

LORD BROUGHAM ON LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.—As men will no longer suffer themselves to be led blindfolded in ignorance, so will they no more yield to the vile principle of judging and treating their fellow-creatures, not according to the intrinsic merit of their actions, but according to the accidental and involuntary coincidence of their opinions. The great truth has finally gone forth to the end of the earth, that man shall no more render account to man for his belief, over which he has no control. Henceforward, nothing shall prevail upon us to praise or to blame any for that which he can no more change than the hue of his skin, or the height of his stature. Henceforward, treating with entire respect those who conscientiously differ from ourselves, the only practical effect of the difference will be to make us enlighten the ignorance on one side or the other from which it springs by instructing them, if it be theirs—ourselves if it be our own; to the end, that the only kind of unanimity may be produced which is desirable among rational beings—the agreement proceeding from full conviction, after the freest discussion.

LUTHER BURNING THE POPE'S BULL.—When the intelligence arrived, that in some place the authorities had begun to execute the bull, and to burn Luther's books, the monk felt himself sufficiently strong to revenge this arbitrary act on the Pope's writings. On the 10th of December, 1520, the academic youth, summoned by a formal proclamation posted on a black board, assembled in unwonted numbers before the Elster Gate of Wittemberg; a pile of wood was collected, to which a master of acts of the University set fire; in the full feeling of the orthodoxy of his secession, the mighty Augustine, clad in his cowl, advanced to the fire, holding in his hand the Pope's bull and decretals; "Because thou hast vexed the Lord's saints," exclaimed he, "mayest thou be consumed in eternal fire!" and threw it into the flames. Never was rebellion more resolutely proclaimed. "Highly needful were it," said Luther, another day, "that the Pope (that is the papacy) with all his doctrines and abominations should be burnt."

[Ranke's History of the Reformation.

FAITHFUL CHRISTIAN.—On the day of his death, in his eightieth year, Elliott, "the apostle of the Indians," was found teaching the alphabet to an Indian child at his bed-side. "Why not rest from your labors now?" "Because," said the venerable man, "I have prayed to God to render me useful in my sphere; and he has heard my prayer; for now that I can no longer preach, he leaves me strength enough to teach this poor child his alphabet."

SIMPLE STORIES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

The Echo.

George did not know in the least what an echo was. One day when he was out in the fields shouting and singing, he was surprised to hear his words repeated, as if they came from some one in the neighboring wood. The little boy then called out, "Who are you?" and immediately he heard the same words repeated by some mysterious voice. George then called out again, as loud as he could, "You must be some foolish boy." "Foolish boy!" replied the voice from the wood. George now began to get angry, and said some very ill-natured things in reply, which were all faithfully repeated by the echo. George then began looking about for the little boy, who he thought was mocking him, in order to give him a beating; but all his search was in vain. So he ran home and told his mother how some naughty boy had hid himself in the wood, and mocked him by repeating his words. "My dear boy," she replied, "you are quite mistaken. It was only your own words which you heard, just as, when you look into a mirror or piece of water, you see your own face reflected back; and if you had spoken kindly, you would have received back kind words in reply. And so it is in the world, in our dealings with our fellow-creatures. Their conduct to us is in general an echo of ours to them; and if we behave civilly to them, they will do the same to us. But if we are rude and ill-mannered, we must expect to be treated in the same way."

The Cuckoo.

George and Michael, on a fine morning in May, were passing through a wood, and heard for the first time the song of the joyous cuckoo. "That bird forebodes good luck," said George; "I expect I shall have a pocket full of money at least!" "And why should the good luck be to you?" replied Michael, who was as weak minded as his companion; "I don 't know why the cuckoo should be so particularly fond of you. For my part, I rather think her favors will fall to my share." So, in place of enjoying the beauty of the morning, and listening with delight to the pleasing notes of the cuckoo, these foolish, bad-tempered boys began to quarrel and fight, until at last they parted, both well thrashed and bruised, and in the worst humor possible with each other. Next day our two combatants met at the doctor's; and, while he bandaged their wounds and bruises, they told him how the quarrel had arisen, and asked him for which of them he thought the cuckoo intended her favors. "Why, neither, to be sure," replied the doctor,—"fools that you are,—but for me; for has she not sent you to me with broken heads, and a long bill to pay, and thus put money in my purse?"

The Lily.

Louisa had a fine garden; and in one of its walks a lily bloomed in snow-white purity, whose brilliancy was still farther heightened by the green turf around it, in the midst of which it was planted. Louisa was an amiable girl, scarcely taller than the lily, and took great pleasure every morning to see the dew lying on its beautiful leaves in the bright rays of the sun; while, at the same time, she had been taught to raise her thoughts above in pious admiration and gratitude to the great Creator of the sun, the dew, and the lily. Her parents took part in her pure and devout joy, and said to themselves, "She is herself like the lily in purity and grace." But before the end of the year she died; and when the lily bloomed again, her mother thought of her daughter with grief, and shed bitter tears. The father then said, "When this beautiful lily was quite young, and grew in a corner of the garden, I took it up; and Louisa was sorry, and said I would hurt it. But when she saw me plant it in a more favorable spot, where it became the ornament of the garden, she was very glad, and thanked me for having removed it. And just so, dear mother, do not weep and lament that Louisa has left us for a better world; for as she was like the lily in innocence and beauty while she lived, so now she blooms far from this bleak and stormy earth in the ever-calm and happy skies of heaven."

The precious Plant.

Betty and Mary, two maid-servants, were going to a town not far off, each with a well-filled basket of fruit on her arm. Betty did nothing but groan and complain beneath her burden, while Mary was as merry as a lark. 'How can you laugh so?' said Betty; 'your basket is at least as heavy as mine, and you are not stronger than I am; how, then, can you trot along so gaily?' 'Oh,' replied Mary, 'I put a certain plant into my basket, which makes it seem quite light; and if you had done the same, yours would have been as light too.' 'Well,' replied Betty, 'that must be a very useful plant, and I should like, above all things, that I had it just now; do tell me the name of it.' 'Its name is patience,' replied Mary; 'and nothing but it can lighten our burdens.'

CURIOUS MANUSCRIPT OF THE HEBREW BIBLE.—There is, in the Royal Library, a curious manuscript, containing the whole Hebrew Bible, which belonged to a synagogue in Jerusalem. A very celebrated rabbi, who was born in Spain, in the year 1194, built a synagogue in Jerusalem, and in that synagogue it was preserved with the utmost veneration till that city was taken by the Emperor Solim, in 1517. The manuscript was then seized by a Turkish officer, who carried it to Aleppo, where, in 1683, it came into the hands of the celebrated D'Arvieux, and it was afterwards purchased by an English gentleman, who brought it home to enrich his own country. In this manuscript the Psalms and Proverbs are written in hemistiches, as Hebrew poetry should be. Though it has suffered by erasures, it has still many various readings, and several of consequence; in particular it has two verses in one place which are clearly genuine, though the Masorah has pronounced them spurious.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 4, 1848.

THE ADMINISTRATOR OF BAPTISM.

It sometimes happens, that a member of a pedobaptist church asks and receives baptism by immersion at the hands of a minister who himself has never been immersed. In consequence of this mode of proceeding, the question has been raised in certain Baptist churches, and we believe in one or two instances among the Seventh-day Baptists, whether such baptism is valid; or whether, in case the person should afterwards wish to join a regular Baptist church, he ought to be reïmmersed by a regular Baptist minister. Circumstances may be conceived in which this question would be one of considerable practical importance. It ought, therefore, to be calmly considered, and answered as definitely as possible.

Those who advocate the reïmmersion of the candidate in question, do so of course on the ground that in order to render baptism valid the administrator himself must have been regularly immersed. But to this it is objected—and the objection is a very natural and weighty one—that if a regularly-baptized administrator is necessary now, it was always necessary; and hence, to establish the validity of baptisms now-a-days we must be able to trace the line of administrators back to the apostles, which is believed to be impossible. There has been no new law given in relation to baptism since the canon of Scripture was closed; nor has God seen fit since that time to point out any particular man or class of men in whom authority was vested to commence a new series of regular administrators. If but one link in the chain has been broken, we are left completely in the dark as to who are the proper administrators. An improper administrator, even if he lived twenty generations ago, would be as fatal to the genuineness of the ordinance as if he were but one generation removed from us. From such considerations it is evident, that many difficulties attend the notion of baptism being invalid unless administered by a person "regularly" immersed. Even those who advocate the notion admit, that cases may arise in which a properly-qualified administrator cannot be obtained, and that then an improper one is allowable. But this admission, when analized, is equivalent to acknowledging that certain deficiencies on the part of the administrator do not necessarily invalidate the ordinance. There are cases in which persons administer the ordinance of baptism to numerous candidates, and afterwards give evidence that they themselves were never made partakers of the grace of God. Yet who doubts that the persons who, through their instrumentality, have made a public profession of faith in Christ, and been buried with Him in baptism, may be accepted of God, and entitled to the confidence of Christians? No one, surely. Why, then, should the immersion of the administrator be insisted upon as indispensably necessary to valid baptism, and the person who has not received baptism from such an administrator be required to submit to the ordinance again? It is desirable, no doubt, that the administrator should be qualified for his office to the fullest extent. Still the question remains whether his deficiency necessarily invalidates the ordinance.

It is easy to see that serious and perplexing consequences might flow from the notion to which we have alluded. If the supposed regularity in the administrator is necessary to the validity of baptism, who can tell whether he has been baptized or not? We may be able to trace back the line of administrators for a few generations, but Baptists generally believe that to trace it back to the apostles is impossible. Even if the chain could be traced back to the apostles, and every link found, still there have doubtless been many improper administrators; and who knows whether the person from whom he received the ordinance, is a descendant from the proper or the improper administrators. Numerous questions of this kind would naturally arise to the mind of the inquirer, serving to perplex rather than to edify and build him up. This circumstance alone is strong presumptive evidence that the notion is unsound. At any rate, we must have more light before we shall be prepared to adopt it.

STEALING A THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.

Rather a startling title, that; but we cannot think of a more appropriate one to indicate the character of a transaction which is now under discussion in several of our exchange papers. It seems that the Baptists of the West, feeling the need of a theological and collegiate institution there, established one in Covington, Kentucky, the "whole effected almost entirely by citizens of Cincinnati." The profits on land purchased in Covington went far to establish the institution. The charter was granted in 1840, with four trustees in Ohio, two in Kentucky, one in Indiana, with power to increase the number to 36. After various unsuccessful attempts to secure a majority of the trustees by new elections, in other words, to get the institution into their own hands, demanding pro-slavery pledges from the president, &c., the Kentucky trustees applied secretly to their legislature which granted the charter, for such a change as would allow the addition of sixteen more trustees, all to be from that State, and so are to be all future trustees! The first knowledge of this abroad was the public announcement that the charter was altered! What better than stealing is such a transaction? Some of the Western Baptists think it is about the same thing, and are therefore greatly incensed. Whether they will be able to help themselves, remains to be seen.

SUNDAY LAWS AND ANTI-SABBATH CONVENTIONS.

"For our part, we reverence the Lord's Day, and observe it strictly, never traveling, sending to the post office, or attending to any other secular business, on that day. But we reverence it as a Christian institution. We cannot consistently with what we understand of the genius of Christianity, invoke the aid of civil government to preserve it from desecration. Religion may safely be left to rest upon its own merits. There is sound philosophy in the admonition of the Court Fool to Henry VIII., Defender of the Faith—'Let thee and me defend the crown, and let the faith defend itself.' When such sentiments become universal among Christians, we shall not hear of many infidel Anti-Sabbath Conventions."

The above is from the Baptist Guardian. The idea which it suggests, that Anti-Sabbath Conventions are the legitimate offspring of Sunday Laws, ought to be seriously pondered. By most of the "orthodox" religious papers, it is strangely overlooked or carefully concealed—we fear the latter. Since the publication of the Call for the Anti-Sabbath Convention at Boston, nearly every paper in the country has had something to say upon the subject; yet only a very few of them have represented the case as it was set forth by the Call, in which it was distinctly stated, that an important object of the meeting would be to devise means for the overthrow of Sunday Laws. This fact indicates that there is a disposition to conceal the real occasion of the Convention. There is another fact equally significant, namely, that in nearly all of the accounts of the Convention published by the orthodox papers, its action in relation to Sunday Laws is either entirely overlooked or only incidentally mentioned, although that was the prominent topic before it. We have now on our table editorial notices of the Convention from Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, and Universalist papers. But in scarcely one of them can we find an allusion to the Sunday Laws as having given rise to the Convention, and occupied a large place in its resolutions and discussions. Now we do not undertake to say positively, that there is a desire on the part of the editors of these papers to conceal from the public the fact that this Anti-Sabbath movement was provoked mainly by the unnecessary and unconstitutional Sunday Laws. Still we cannot help having thoughts upon the subject, and serious fears that such is the case. We believe, with the writer of the above paragraph, that Sunday Laws and Anti-Sabbath Conventions are intimately connected, and that the latter will continue to be held so long as the former exist. What advantages are proposed from concealing this truth, is more than we can tell.

TO THE S. D. B. CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

"Have we all done our duty the past year in the missionary field, both Home and Foreign?" is a question that might perhaps with propriety be asked every member of the denomination, but in particular every member of each church in the Central Association, which has essayed to promulgate our peculiar truths at home as well as abroad. Now if we have all done our duty, there must be some evidence of it; if not in the coming up of converts, there must be an increasing glow of warmth in our own bosoms, which must manifest itself in increased activity in our exertions in the cause. We have the sure promise that he that labors shall be paid—he that sows shall reap. Have we received any pay? Have we reaped a crop? If we have not, then may we be pretty well assured that the labor has not been performed, or, if performed, not acceptable to the Master of the vineyard, or most certainly should we have received our pay. But where is the evidence that we have done all our duty? Is it in the almost universal declension of religious feeling? This pevails at present. It is evidence, strong evidence, that the work has not been done. And where is the remedy? Go to work, and act as if we believed what we professed. Be as consistent spiritually as we are temporally, and a change will come over us like a "mighty rushing wind." No man expects to prosper in the things of this world without attention to his business. He does not think of entrusting it all to another. He applies himself to the work personally, and his labors are rewarded. Just so in the work inquired after. It cannot be performed to acceptance by an agent. It is a work our Father demands of us personally, individually, and unless we perform it we shall receive his frown. What but his frown are we now receiving in the state of barrenness, coldness, and doubt, that pervades our bounds? How much has been done for the promotion of Bible truth during the past year, will be asked us at the day of Judgment; and are we prepared to say that we have done all that we could with a truthfulness that will be credited in that awful day. If we have, it is well. If not, how important that we repent and obtain forgiveness for the past, and strive for the future to come up to the performance of the task required of us. More labor in the field, more giving, more inquiry after the wants of the destitute, cannot help awakening our zeal, strengthening our hope, increasing our happiness, diffusing a knowledge of the truth, and consequently augmenting the happiness of all who come within its blessed influence. May we not find here a direct and certain channel to an increase of true happiness, that will not satiate, that will ever increase the more zealously it is pursued, and leading us onward to that perfection of happiness and righteousness found only in Heaven. We may rest assured, that this point will never be attained without effort, without toil, without expenditure of earthly treasure. The annual return of the session of our Association will soon be upon us, and are we satisfied with what we have done in an associated capacity the past year? Have we done all that we could? Have we done all that we should? If we have not, now is the time to begin to think and to act—to act in a manner that will give proof positive that we are in earnest in the work in which we are engaged. Our zeal is only truly manifested by what we do. Tested by this, has not our zeal been wanting and our faith weak the past year? Shall they not be expanded and strengthened for the year to come? Let us try the experiment, and when the Association shall meet, let us put forth one strong effort, try the veracity of the God of Heaven, and see if he will not bless us. If God is for us, who can be against us? I trust, if we believe this, that a stronger effort than heretofore will be put forth, that we shall all be ready to take hold, that "the temple may go up." Send or bring all that is needful, for the Lord requires it at our hands, and great indeed is the risk of delay. Let us all act as for the judgment, without reference to one another, keeping in view only what the eternal God requires of us.

A. L. S.

BROOKFIELD, 23d April, 1848.

THE LATE POPE GREGORY.

Professor Cassali recently delivered, in Brooklyn, N. Y., a lecture on Italy and the Popes, in which he brought to light many curious stories and interesting facts. According to him there is a striking contrast between the present Pope Pius and his predecessor Gregory. The latter, it is well known, never attempted to ameliorate the condition of his subjects, his main object seeming to be to enjoy himself and keep society where he found it. Hence he filled his cellars with wines, discountenanced the construction of railroads, steamboats, and magnetic telegraphs, and endeavored as much as possible to abridge the freedom of the press. But Pope Pius pursued entirely a different course. He ordered that the twelve thousand bottles of wine which he found in the palace of his predecessor should be sold, and the money given to the poor. He also encouraged the introduction of those facilities for communication and improvement which had before been proscribed. Among the many caricatures of Gregory, got up at Rome after his death, was one representing him on his way to Paradise in company with St. Peter. The journey being hard and tedious for an aged man like the Pope, he complained to St. Peter thus:—

"How is it, St. Peter, that our journey is so long? I did not know that Paradise was so far from the Vatican." St. Peter replied, "If you had allowed the construction of railways and steamers in your State, we should have arrived long ago. But now you must stop for a while in purgatory."

After having remained some months in purgatory, where he met his friend, O'Connell, (the story goes,) Gregory set out with St. Peter again on his eternal journey. Coming in view of Paradise, the Pope asked St. Peter why the angels and his late predecessors in the papal chair did not come out to meet him?

"Dear Gregory," replied St. Peter, "as for the Popes, there are few of them in heaven, and the news of your death has not yet reached there; as it would have done, if you had established telegraphs and granted the freedom of the Press."

When the Saint and the Pope arrived at the gates of Paradise, St. Peter asked Gregory for his key, which, after some time, the Pope found, and handed it to him; but it proved to be the key of his wine cellar.

St. Peter was admitted within the gates, but Gregory was lost in the fog.

MISSIONARIES AT SHANGHAI.

A letter of Rev. J. L. Shuck, dated at Shanghai, China, Dec. 26, 1847, gives the following account of that place and its missionaries:—

"The city of Shanghai contains as large a population without the walls as within. The wall is four miles in circumference, has a parapet with port-holes on its outer side or edge, and bastions at regular intervals. There are four grand gates and two subordinate ones, viz: the North gate, South gate, East gate, and West gate, with the little East gate and the little South gate. We have access to the inner city at all the gates and at all times; and not only so, but can make missionary tours, unmolested, in all the region round about. The people are very friendly and affable, so very different in these respects from their countrymen at some other places. The climate here at present is very cold and bracing. We have now plenty of frost and ice, and are looking out for snow. It is most fortunate we all brought a supply of stoves with us from America.

When Dr. and Mrs. James arrive, the number of missionaries at Shanghai will be, male and female, 31; 19 from America and 12 from England. This is indeed a small number compared with the extensive field submitted to our culture, for this whole region is most densely populated. Our mission here has commenced under favorable circumstances, and we trust the Master will condescend to make us useful among this great people. A wide and interesting sphere of action is spread out before us. May God grant His grace, that we may be faithful and efficient laborers.

COMPARATIVE EXPENSE OF RELIGION AND FOLLY.—Dr. Baird, in his book on the Religion of America, estimates the whole sum expended to support religious arrangements in the United States at five and a half millions of dollars. The amount contributed by the various benevolent societies for the advancement of religion abroad, is about one million more; making a total of six and a half millions. This appears like a large sum, and there are many persons who find fault because it is so large. But surely they can have no just idea of the advantages of this expenditure, who complain at its amount; nor can they have estimated their expenses for other and useless articles, when they express doubts of their ability to meet this. At the lowest estimate, we now pay one-third more for tea and coffee than we do for the support of religion at home and abroad. For tobacco, we pay about six times as much; for alcohol ten times as much; and for war fourteen times as much. Let these facts be considered, and retrenchment made in respect to these things, before we begin to complain about the expense of religion, and attempt to make retrenchment in that respect.

THE GRAND LIGNE MISSION.—This mission, which has done so much to enlighten the benighted in Canada, has for some time past been supported principally by Baptists. Madame Feller, the founder of it, was originally from Switzerland. Before leaving that country, she became convinced of the propriety and importance of baptism as her own act; and knowing no other mode at the time than that which was practiced around her, she demanded of her pastor the privilege of professing openly her faith and obedience as a Christian disciple. After considerable delay, her request was granted, and she found great satisfaction in doing her duty according to the light she then had. Since then her mind has been led into farther inquiries, which have resulted in a conviction that she ought to be immersed—a duty with which she is determined to comply at as early a day as practicable.

A SPORTING CLERGYMAN.—A late English paper says:—"On Friday last, about 9 A. M., a party assembled on the race-course to witness a match made between one of the successors of the Apostles, and a son of Galen, on the merits of their respective horses, which were ridden by their professors, attired in full jockey costume. The divine proved himself as good a jockey as a theologian, and won the match, thereby reflecting great credit on his ancestors, the Apostles." But this was not all. "The hounds were in attendance, and in less than an hour the whole assemblage were in hot pursuit of a poor fox, which, after running nearly 40 miles, was killed. One of the horses died the same evening, and all the others are so ill, that their recovery, if not hopeless, is, at least, very doubtful." We should be glad to know which of the Apostles that racing, fox-hunting divine succeeded?

JOHN JACOB ASTOR.—The N. Y. Churchman, speaking of the recent decease of this man, the richest individual in America, who bequeathed his whole estate, with a slight exception, to his relatives, most of it to one son, says, "Although, strictly speaking, he was not a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, yet he nominally belonged to it, as he many years since purchased a pew in one of our city churches, and his children were brought up in that faith. He was, also, a long time intimately acquainted with several of the clergy, and the great majority of his intimate friends belonged to that church, and many of them were of its most influential and active members. It does not appear that any reproach can be cast upon them for improper influence or interested suggestions, in regard to the disposition of his estate. Not one cent is given to any church or religious institution here or elsewhere."

A MISSIONARY ISLAND.—Capt. Brown from New London, in a recent letter to a Sandwich Island paper, dated at Stewart's Island, says:—"The people on this Island, chiefly natives of New Zealand, are nearly all missionaries, as they call themselves, that is Christians. They have no white missionary, but there is one who lives on Rolukar, an island in Foveaux's Straits, but the weather is always so bad that there is no chance, scarcely, of having communication with Stewart's Island. They gladly attended religious services on board our ship, sometimes even walking ten miles to enjoy the privilege. I gave them all the religious books I had, and a large bundle of tracts, which they gladly received. They much need Bibles, and I was very sorry I had none to give them."

UNOSTENTATIOUS BENEVOLENCE.—The Boston Traveler says that some time ago an unknown individual in Massachusetts gave $10,000 toward founding a State Reform School. The same gentleman afterward offered $10,000 more, on condition that the State would make a similar appropriation; which has been done; and now, within a few days, the same princely benevolence has furnished the additional sum of $2,500 to this State Institution, for the purpose of enlarging the farm accommodations of the school. The name of this princely giver is entirely unknown, except to the gentleman through whom the gifts are presented. In these days of greedy accumulation, and lust for holding property to the last gasp of life, and handing it down to children's children, such an instance of munificence is worthy of all commendation.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The financial year of the American Tract Society has just closed. It is said that they have printed within a year seven and a half millions of books and tract publications, averaging more than 27,600 per day. Of these, 737,800 were handsome bound volumes of instructive reading, from the pens of gifted minds, whose works have been approved by good men of various denominations. In addition to the large number of colporteurs now in the employ of the Society, 29 new laborers were commissioned recently for various States, including Texas. During the year past, the Society have circulated 40,000,000 pages gratuitously, valued at $27,000.

GOOD EXAMPLE.—The editor of the Christian Chronicle has received from Dr. Dawson, late of India, an extract of a private letter from Madras. It states that a Baptist minister, Mr. Page, was expected soon from England, to be settled at Madras. His salary for seven years is paid by Major Russell of the 84th Regiment. He is a Baptist, and was formerly a member of the little church at Maulmain. Mr. Page's outfit and passage are alse provided for by him. A very praiseworthy example, Are there none in our land who will imitate it?

LATE FROM CHINA.—The editor of the N. Y. Recorder has received a note from Rev. W. Dean, dated Jan. 28th, from which he learns that the Rev. Mr. Loomis, Seaman's chaplain to Whampoa, reached Hong Kong Jan. 27th, in the Candace. Governor Bonham of Singapore is to succeed Sir John Davis as Governor of Hong Kong. All was quiet at Canton, but some predicted a war with the English. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union had commenced the study of Chinese at Hong Kong. Mr. and Mrs. Jones, and Miss Morse, were to sail for Bangkok direct, the following week. Four Chinese were baptized Jan 23d,—one Chinese woman from Chik Choo received as a candidate for baptism. Dr. Magowan and Mr. Lord at Ningpo, and the firiends at Shanghai, were as well as usual, Jan. 15. A-Bak has recovered and resumed his work. Mr. Dean had advanced with his notes on Matthew to the 17th chapter; Acts, coming from the press. 'All well and prosperous.'

LATEST FROM CHINA.—The ship Samuel Russell, Capt. Palmer, which sailed from Canton Feb. 5, arrived at New York on the 28th of April. She brings intelligence of a pacific character. Negotiations were in progress, which, it was believed, would lead to a satisfactory settlement of the difficulties connected with the murder of the Englishmen. Capt. Palmer heard from our missionaries while at Canton—all well. Mrs. A. H. Everett and Mrs. Clopton, whose husbands died at Canton, returned in the Samuel Russell.

HORRORS OF SLAVERY!

Correspondence of the Albany Evening Journal.

WASHINGTON, April 22.

FRIEND WEED—Last evening, in passing the Railroad Depot, I saw quite a large number of colored persons gathered round one of the cars, and from manifestations of grief among some of them, I was induced to draw near and ascertain the cause. I found in the car toward which they were so eagerly gazing, fifty colored persons, some of whom were nearly as white as myself. A large majority of the number were those who attempted to gain their liberty last week, in the schooner Pearl. About half of them were females, a few of whom had but a slight tinge of African blood in their veins; they were finely formed and beautiful.

The men were fronted together, and the whole group looked sad and dejected. At each end of the car stood a ruffian-looking guard, with large canes in their hands. In the middle of the car stood the notorious slave-dealer of Baltimore, who is a member of the Methodist church, in good and regular standing. He had purchased the men and women around him, and was taking his departure for Georgia. While observing this old gray-headed dealer in the bodies and souls of men, the Chaplain of the Senate—a Methodist brother—entered the car, took his brother Methodist by the hand, chatted with him for a short time, and seemed to view the heart-rending scene before him with as little concern as we would look upon cattle! I know not whether he came with a view to sanctify the act, or pronounce the parting blessing; but this I do know, that he justifies slavery.

A Presbyterian minister, who owned one of the fugitives, was the first to strike a bargain with the slave-dealer, and make merchandize of God's image. Some of the colored people outside, as well as in the car, were weeping most bitterly. I learned that many families were separated. Wives were there to take leave of their husbands, and husbands of their wives; children of their parents, and parents of their children. Friends parting with friends, and the tenderest ties of humanity severed at a single bid of the inhuman slave-broker before them. A husband, in the meridian of life, begged to see the partner of his bosom. He protested that she was free—that she had free papers, and was torn away from him, and shut up in the jail. He clambered up to one of the windows of the car to see his wife, and, as she was reaching forward her hand to him, the black-hearted slave-dealer ordered him down. He did not obey.

The husband and wife, with tears streaming down their cheeks, besought him to let them speak to each other. But no; he was knocked down from the car, and ordered away! The bystanders could hardly restrain themselves from laying violent hands upon the brute. This is but a faint description of the scene which took place within a few rods of the Capitol, and under enactments recognized by Congress. Oh, what a revolting scene to a feeling heart, and what a retribution awaits the actors. Will not their wailings of anguish reach the ears of the Most High? "Vengeance is mine—I will repay, saith the Lord."

General Intelligence.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The new steamship America arrived at New York on Sabbath last, bringing seven days later news from Europe. The general character of the continental advices is much more pacific than for some time past. Political affairs are generally quiet, except in Denmark and Prussia.

England.

The great Chartist Demonstration, from which so much was feared, did not turn out to be any thing very alarming. A large Convention was held on the 10th and 11th, but the Procession did not take place in consequence of the Government having forbidden it and taken possession of the bridges and principal thoroughfares for the purpose of breaking it up. The two monster petitions—one with 5,706,000 signatures attached, and the other with 30,000—in favor of the People's Charter, after being paraded at the Convention, were taken to the House of Commons, and presented by Mr. O'Connor. The Petitions pray for annual parliaments, universal suffrage, vote by ballot, equal electoral districts, the abolition of property qualification, and payment of members. They were laid on the table and a day fixed for their discussion.

France.

A collision took place on the 7th ult. at Marmoutier, (Bas-Rhin,) between the military and the people, in which three of the latter were killed.

Three of the Bonaparte family are now candidates in Corsica for seats in the National Assembly, viz., Louis Napoleon; Napoleon, son of Jerome Bonaparte; and Pierre, son of Lucien.

All the Kalifas and other Arab chiefs of the province of Algiers, have presented their homage to the new Governor-General, and made their submission to the French Republic.

M. Lamartine has received from the Ministers of Spain and Russia respectively, assurances of the most friendly dispositions towards the French Republic.

Austria.

The Austrian Government has resolved to relinquish Lombardy on reasonable conditions.

The Berlin Zeitungs-Halle, of the 6th, announces in a correspondence from Pesth, dated the 31st, that Hungary declares herself independent, and that Archduke Stephen had been chosen King. A feeling of strong discontent had long existed at Pesth, which has at last shown itself.

War has been declared against the Pope and Tuscany, and both the Nuncio and the Tuscan ambassador have left Vienna.

The Poles of Gallicia have presented an address to the Emperor of Austria, in which they declare their desire to remain united with Austria, but on certain conditions.

Prussia.

The accounts from Silesia are most unsatisfactory. The greatest alarm prevails among the resident noblemen and the landed proprietors. The atrocious scenes that were enacted two years past in Gallicia by the peasants have been carried into effect in several districts. Bands of incendiaries have traversed the country, burning, maltreating, pillaging and destroying property of every denomination. The authorities of Breslau have been compelled to send out detachments of troops, and free corps have been formed for general and individual protection.

The accounts from Westphalia are alarming in the extreme. All is complete anarchy there. Popular tribunals are erected, before which persons in authority are summoned or conducted, and by which they are not unfrequently deposed from their office. The rich Jews and nobles are the chief victims of popular vengeance.

Italy.

The Pope of Rome has determined to disperse the order of Jesuits, and has appointed a person to take charge of and administer their property.

Denmark.

Hostilities have seriously commenced between the forces of Denmark and those of Schleswig Holstein. A very fierce battle has been fought near Rendsburg, in which the Danes had a decided superiority in numbers, as well as in their cavalry and artillery. The Schleswig Holstein army was defeated, and compelled to retreat toward Rendsburg. The loss of life has been very great on both sides.

Russia.

The Emperor, it is stated, in letters from St. Petersburg of the 28th March, in consequence of the receipt of dispatches from Berlin and Vienna, had suddenly countermanded the war-like preparations which were on foot all over the Russian Empire.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR COLORED SCHOOLS.—The following appropriation of money to defray the expense in part of schools for the exclusive instruction of colored children, was made by the Legislature of New York on the 12th of May, 1847. It is said that only three schools have availed themselves of the appropriation. The reason must be, that the colored people are not generally informed upon the subject:

"There shall be paid from the income of the United States deposite fund, to the trustees of every incorporated village which shall, during one year from the passage of this act, support for three months or more a school for the exclusive instruction of colored children, the sum of twelve dollars a month during the time such school shall be kept, not to exceed six months, to be applied to defraying expenses thereof; but no money shall be paid, as aforesaid, for any month during which the number of scholars attending such school shall be, on an average, less than ten; and for this purpose the sum of five thousand dollars of the said income is hereby appropriated."

A man named Boyer, in Bucks Co., Pa., on being committed for stealing a coat, blew out his brains with a pistol, on the 21st ult.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Senate.

The California claim bill was under consideration more or less throughout the week.

Mr. Clarke, of R. I., submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on the Library to inquire whether Washington's Library was for sale, and if so, on what terms; and as to the expediency of the Government purchasing the same, which was adopted.

Mr. Hale, of N. H., presented a petition from citizens of New York, praying for an investigation of the conduct of Col. Childs requiring American soldiers under his command at the town of Jalapa, to kneel before the Catholic host, which was received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, presented petitions from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the establishment of a Post Route by Railroad between Philadelphia and New York, in opposition to the Camden and Amboy Railroad.

Mr. Cass, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill directing the Secretary of War to purchase 5,000 of Colt's Repeating Pistols for the use of the Army.

House of Representatives.

The House had under consideration, and finally laid on the table, the resolutions of Mr. Palfrey respecting the privileges of members. A bill to grant bounty lands to soldiers gave rise to a lengthy discussion. The bill for the admission of Wisconsin as a State was taken up and made the special order of the day for Tuesday, May 2d.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

From the Frankfort (Ky.) Commonwealth, April 18th.

Jessamine Circuit Court, March term, 1848—Before Hon. Samuel Lusk, Circuit Judge; CASSIUS M. CLAY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES B. CLAY and THOMAS H. WATERS, defendants.

This was an act of trespass vi et armis, brought by plaintiff against the defendants, for entering the printing office of the "True American," in the city of Lexington, and taking and carrying away the printing presses, types and other fixtures belonging thereto, and converting the same to the use of defendants; damages $10,000.

Defendants filed a special plea, in which they alledged in substance, that the plaintiff established said press and issued therefrom a newspaper called the "True American," with the view, and for the purpose of operating on the public mind, and thereby inducing the owners of slaves to emancipate them. That the plaintiff did not discuss the subject of slavery in a temperate and prudent manner, but on the contrary, the tendency of his articles was to inflame the public mind, and hold out hopes to the slaves for unconstitutional emancipation; and also created insubordination among the slaves, and an inclination to insurrection: That the value of slave property became less secure and depreciated, whereby the said printing establisnment became and was a nuisance, which the citizens of Lexington and Lafayette counties had the lawful right to abate. And that in pursuance to the requent of a large public meeting of the citizens of Fayette and other counties, held the 18th of August, 1845, the defendants and fifty-eight others, acting as a Committee of said meeting, repaired to the office of the "True American," took down the presses, types, &c., carefully packed them, and caused the same to be shipped to Cincinnati, subject to the order of the plaintiff.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred. After an elaborate argument as to what constituted a nuisance, and the sanctity of the press, the court sustained the demurrer.

Defendants then offered a second plea similar to the first, but more in detail, embodying therein portions of the articles supposed by them to be intemperate and inflammatory. The court refused permission to file it, and the defendants declining any further defence, the jury were sworn to inquire of damages, and rendered a verdict for $2,500. The defendants appealed, and the only question which the record presents, is as to the validity of the pleas. And that involves the question, whether a printing press can become a moral nuisance in consequence of promulgating opinions which a majority of the people in the vicinity in which it may be situated, deem injurious to the peace and good order of society.

MARRIED WOMEN'S RIGHT IN PROPERTY.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania at their late session passed a law to secure to married women the right to their own property, of which the following is a section:

"Be it enacted, &c., That every species and description of property, whether consisting of real, personal, or mixed, which may be owned by, or belong to, any single woman, shall continue to be the property of such woman as fully after her marriage as before, and all such property, of whatever name or kind, which shall accrue to any married woman during coverture by will, descent, deed of conveyance, or otherwise, shall be owned, used, and enjoyed by such married woman as her own separate property; and the said property, whether owned by her before marriage, or which shall accrue to her afterwards, shall not be subject to levy and execution for the debts or liabilities of her husband, nor shall such property be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, transferred, or in any manner encumbered by her husband without her written consent first had and obtained and duly acknowledged before one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of this Commonwealth, that such consent was not the result of coercion on the part of her said husband, but that the same was given voluntarily and of her own free will.

"That any married woman may dispose by her last will and testament of her separate property. real, personal, or mixed, whether the same accrues to her before or during coverture. Provided, The said last will and testament be executed in the presence of two or more witnesses, neither of whom shall be her husband."

The Scientific American says that a company is about to commence the manufacture of flax at Northampton, Mass. They are ready to contract with farmers in that vicinity for the supply of the raw material. They will furnish seed to be returned after harvest, and will purchase the flax after being threshed, at $12 per ton. It is their intention to prepare the flax for spinning, to erect a mill with machinery, and to manufacture thread, twine, or whatever will meet with demand in the market.

SUMMARY.

The Shelby (Ky.) News of April 19, says that on the Wednesday afternoon previous, at a party at Mr. Pierce Griffin's, between forty-five and fifty persons were poisoned—several quite dangerously—by eating boiled custard. The first report was that the custard had been prepared in a brass kettle. This, we learn, is not the fact, and the general impression now is, that the poison had been placed in the custard by some wretch for the purpose of destroying the lives of the company. We learn that every one of Mr. G.'s family, black and white, were among the poisoned; no suspicion attaches to any of his negroes. As far as we can learn, death has resulted in none of the cases, although several are dangerously ill.

The Cleveland Plaindealer tells of a young man who left Kingston for that place on the 17th ult., on board the Niagara; was wrecked, and after 12 hours of great peril, escaped to the shore by means of a rope. He then took the cars at Rochester—the same train that ran off the track, upset in a smash, and killed two men. By an extra train he arrived at Buffalo and took the steamer Ohio for Cleveland. The Ohio broke her crank off Erie and was towed back to Buffalo. He then took passage on the Saratoga, which met with an accident, and was detained several hours in Erie for repairs.

A man named Pierre Ramonial was arrested in New Orleans for shooting a man named Virgillio Sellares. After quarreling some time, the former drew a pistol and shot the other. The ball struck him in the forehead between the two eyes, and glancing upwards along the right side of the forehead, traveled right round under the skin, and came out at the back of the neck, doing little or no injury. The surgeon who examined the wound, said that he never knew or heard of such an escape.

The editor of the Chronotype has seen a letter from a young man not eighteen, who enlisted into one of the new regiments of military in Boston, and is now on Governor's Island, New York. He says, "Here we are, five hundred of us, some with the small pox, and some with coughs and colds, &c., &c. Bitterly have I repented of the rash step I took the day I enlisted, and bitterly do I repent of not following your advice, when you told me to go and pay back what I had received and go about some honest employment."

A child at Monteville, near Rouen, not long since, swallowed a few pinches of asenic, thinking it to be flour. It was soon seized with dreadful convulsions, and little hope was entertained of saving its life, when a physician administered hydrated peroxide of iron, which immediately overcame the effects of the poison.

Mr. Henderson has discovered in New Siberia, the claws of a bird, measuring each a yard in length; and the Yakuts assured him they had frequently, in their hunting excursions, met with skeletons, and even feathers of this bird, the quills of which were large enough to admit a man's arm.

By telegraph from St. Louis to the Pittsburgh papers, we have confirmatory accounts of the battle fought at Roselia, sixty miles from Chihuahua. The Americans were victorious, and the Governor of Chihuahua, fourteen pieces of artillery, and a large number of prisoners, were taken by our forces. The loss in killed and wounded on both sides is represented as heavy.

Mrs. James C. Washington, of Mount Vernon, has authorized a contradiction of the current report that Mr. Stephens has purchased the library of General Washington, or 3,000 volumes of it, for $5,000. She says that there is not the slightest foundation for it. The family have never entertained the thought of selling that property, and five times the sum named could not purchase it.

The University of Mississippi advertises for five Professors, one of them to be President of the University. The salary of the President will be $2,000, of the Professors $1,500, and houses will be provided for them free of charge.

The Journal des Debats states that the experiments made for introducing the culture of the tea plant in France have fully succeeded, the climate, in the coldest part of the country, being fully adapted to it. The experiments made in Algeria have not been so successful; all the plants were killed by the heat, notwithstanding every precaution.

Two war steamers, the Rattler and Alecto, the one a screw and the other a paddle steamer, were lashed together, stern to stern, recently in England, and both their engines put to their full speed, when it was found that the screw towed the paddle steamer backwards.

Mrs. Cowden Clarke dedicated her volume of Proverbs from the works of Shakspeare, in the following style:—"To Douglas Jerrold, the first wit of the present age, these Proverbs of Shakspeare, the first wit of any age, are inscribed by Mary Cowden Clarke, of a certain age, and no wit at all."

The robbers of Darlington, the President of the Chester (Pa.) Co. Bank, have been arrested at Matamoros, Texas, and it is thought that $40,000 of the money will be recovered. [Mr. Darlington was robbed of a carpet-bag, containing about $50,000, several months since.]

Mr. Silas Rice, of Ashby, was seriously if not fatally injured on Saturday, April 22, while making some repairs near the water-wheel of his saw-mill, by the accidental starting of the wheel. His right leg was broken in several places, and his left arm nearly torn from his shoulder.

Hon. Mr. Vinton, of Ohio, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the U. S. House of Representatives, is now the occupant of the chair which was for so many years filled by the lamented Adams.

John Mann died at the Almshouse, Germantown, a few days ago, after being an inmate of the institution nearly fifty years. At the time of his death he was supposed to be one hundred years old!

The abolition of slavery in the French Islands is to be superintended by Gen. Rostoland, the new Governor, who has arrived out with full powers from the Provisional Government.

Richard Burns was arrested in New Orleans recently, for having bitten off the nose of George Trainer.

According to information received from England by the last steamer, it is anticipated that the daughter of Justice Pierce, of Brooklyn, will shortly come into possession of about $350,000, as a legatee of Sir Joseph Banks, who died about 20 years ago, and who left the principal portion of his wealth to persons in this country, but owing to some fraud practiced by the brother of the testator, the claims of the heirs of Sir Joseph have been withheld until recently, when the brother, on his death-bed, acknowledged the wrong he had done, and took measures to make restitution.

It is stated in the Rochester papers, that Mr. Zachary Potter, and his father, of that city, have left home for England, under the well founded expectation of entering upon the speedy possession of an estate, in the county of Durham, England, valued at £3,000,000 sterling, or $15,000,000. If it comes, even in part, it will be a "windfall" for the country as well as for the fortunate inheritor.

A meeting was held in Boston on Tuesday of last week, to aid the captain and men of the schooner Pearl, now in prison at Washington. Addresses were delivered by W. H. Channing, Elizur Wright, Dr. W. Channing and others. It was proposed to procure the $75,000 bail asked for the prisoner, and to raise funds for trying the constitutionality of the imprisonment before the Supreme Court.

In a letter to a friend dated March 1, and published in the Courrier des Etats Unis, Lamartine says—"For seven days I have hardly had breathing time. I have passed three without ceasing to harangue and combat in the midst of 60,000 men, more agitated than the waves of the sea, but it was a sea of fire and of iron. God has protected me; now may he protect the mother of ideas and great hearts—la France!"

The joint committee on colleges in the Massachusetts Legislature, have reported in favor of allowing the school fund, now limited to $1,000,000, to accumulate to $1,500,000, and to divide the surplus interest, $30,000, among Cambridge, Amherst, and William's Colleges. The school fund is derived from the sale of public lands in Maine.

Fourteen hundred houses were erected in Philadelphia last year. This was surpassed by Baltimore, where nineteen hundred and fifty-nine houses were erected in that short space of time.

The Pike County (Ill.) Free Press states that a justice of that county voted against the new Constitution on the ground that he had taken an oath to support the old one!

A report from the land office shows that the State of New York still owns more than four hundred thousand acres of uncultivated land.

There are 40 churches in Providence, one to every 1,000 inhabitants.

Only one hundred and seventy victims of the revolution have been publicly buried in Paris. 1300 were killed when Charles X. was driven forth.

Whenever you meet a man particularly spiteful toward a paper, a magazine or a publisher, just look at him significantly, and ask if he is not a rejected contributor.

Mr. Head, of Durham, Greene Co., recovered $1,000 in a suit against Ransom Tanner, for the seduction of Miss Effa Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Head.

The Gloucester Telegraph states that over 40,000 barrels of mackerel have arrived at Boston from the British Provinces, since the last of September last.

Two hundred officers, who have served with distinction in the Mexican War, have been nominated to the Senate for brevet appointments.

Deputy Sheriff Smith, of Hudson, is said to be recovering from his wounds.

MARRIED,

In Berlin, N. Y., April 22, by Eld. J. L. Scott, Mr. WILLIAM P. GREEN, to Miss CAROLINE P. LANPHEAR, all of Berlin.

In Hartford, Ky., March 20th, by Rev. Robert Fisk, Mr. SALEM A. LEWIS, of Almond, N. Y., to Miss REBECCA BOYCAN, of Lindley's, Ky.

At Alfred Academy, April 13, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. ASA W. SMITH, of Coudesport, Pa., to Miss CAROLINE M. HUGHS, of Almond, N. Y.

DIED,

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 14th of April, Mrs. ANNIS BASSETT, widow of the late William Bassett, aged 94 years. The subject of this notice was a devoted disciple of Jesus. She had long been connected with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and died full of faith, good works, and with hope full of glory, as a shock of corn fully ripe. She appeared ripe for immortality, and has been called home to enjoy her heavenly inheritance.

In Brookfield, Madison Co, N. Y., April 14th, Mrs. MARIA BURDICK, wife of Mr. Benjamin Burdick, aged 28 years. Sister B. was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. She was patient in her distressing illness—peaceful and joyful in her death. W. B. M.

In Petersburg, N. Y., March 7th, SOPHRONIA FISHER, relict of Wm. J. Fisher, in the 38th year of her age. Sister Fisher has been a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Petersburg for the last seven years, and died in full hope of an eternal inheritance above.

This body will hold its annual session with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in May, 1848, at 10 o'clock A. M. Introductory Sermon by T. B. Brown, of N. Y.; alternate A. B. Burdick, of R. I.

The Executive Board of the Association holds its second semi-annual session at the same place, on the fourth day of said week, at 10 o'clock A. M. The following persons compose the Board: A. D. Titsworth, Chairman; T. B. Brown, Secretary; S. S. Griswold, Corresponding Secretary; H. S. Berry, Treasurer; Daniel Coon, Josiah W. Langworthy, A. B. Burdick, Wm. A. Weeden, I. Moore, C. T. Champlin, Lucius Crandall, W. B. Gillett, S. Davison, P. L. Berry, Paul Stillman.

S. S. GRISWOLD, Cor. Sec.

HOPKINTON, R. I., April 19, 1848.

P. S. Missionaries in the employ of the Association are requested to forward their reports to the Corresponding Secretary previous to the 15th of May; also any suggestions relative to eligible fields of labor.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given, that the 13th Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will be held with the Church in Lincklean, Chenango Co., N. Y., commencing on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June next, (June 7th,) at 11 o'clock A. M. Eld. James Bailey was appointed to preach the introductory discourse; Eld. Russel G. Burdick his alternate.

It is earnestly hoped, that a full delegation will be in attendance, with great hearts, strong arms, and a firm determination to push forward the car of Bible truth, with a resolution and consistency worthy of the cause. Brethren, ask yourselves before God your duty, and fear and tremble lest ye come short of what the judge requires of you. An eternity of happiness is at stake. Will ye risk it?

A. L. SAUNDERS, Ass't Sec.

BROOKFIELD, April 23, 1848.

Extract from the Minutes of the Session of 1847.

"Resolved, That the ministers of each church call the attention of their congregation to the Home Mission semi-annually, and take collections for its support at the time."

It will especially devolve on those who were present and voted for the resolution, to act in the matter immediately if they have heretofore delayed. I hope there will be no frivolous excuses offered by any for not complying, and I do not believe a valid one can be offered. A. L. S.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History; edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

Miscellaneous.

WE ARE GROWING OLD.

BY FRANC[illegible] BROWN.

We are growing ol[illegible]how the thought will rise
When a glance is backward cast
On some long-remembered spot, that lies
In the silence of the past!
It may be the shrine of our early vows,
Or the tomb of early tears;
But it seems like a far-off isle to us,
In the stormy sea of years.

Oh! wide and wild are the waves that part
Our steps from its greenness now—
And we miss the joy of many a heart,
And the light of many a brow;
For deep o'er many a stately bark
Have the whelming billows rolled,
That steered with us from that early mark—
Oh! friends, we are growing old!

Old in the dimness and the dust
Of our daily toils and cares,
Old in the wrecks of love and trust
Which our burdened memory bears.
Each form may wear to the passing gaze
The bloom of life's freshness yet,
And beams may brighten our latter days
Which the morning never met.

But oh, the changes we have seen
In the far and winding way—
The graves in our path that have grown green,
And the locks that have grown gray!
The winters still on our own may spare
The sable or the gold;
But we saw their snows upon brighter hair—
And, friends, we are growing old!

We have gained the world's cold wisdom now,
We have learned to pause and fear—
But where are the living founts, whose flow
Was a joy of heart to hear?
We have won the wealth of many a clime,
And the lor[illegible] of many a page—
But where is the hope that saw in Time
But its boundless heritage?

Will it come again when the violet wakes,
And the woods their youth renew?
We have stood in the light of sunny brakes,
Where the bloom was deep and blue;
And our souls might joy in the spring-time then,
But the joy was faint and cold—
For it ne'er could give us the youth again
Of hearts that are growing old.

PRESERVING NEWSPAPERS.

The importance of preserving a file of some good newspaper is not generally understood. Here is a paragraph upon the subject by a correspondent of the British Banner, which ought to be not only read but heeded:—

"One of the many things which I have to regret, when I review my past life, is, that I did not, from earliest youth, at least as soon as I was able to do it, take and preserve—I believe the technical word is "file"—some good newspaper. How interesting would it be now to a sexagenarian to look into the papers which he read when he was twelve or sixteen, or twenty years old! How many events would this call to mind which he has entirely forgotten! How many interesting associations and feelings would it revive! What a view would it give of past years! What knowledge would it preserve by assisting the memory! And how many valuable purposes of a literary kind, even, might it be rendered subservient to! How much do I wish that I could look into such a record when composing this short article! But newspapers are quite different things now from what they were sixty, or even twenty years ago. They are unspeakably more interesting and valuable; in this respect, at least, (I believe in many others,) these times are better than the former. Formerly the editors of newspapers were obliged to strain their wits and exhaust their means, in order to obtain matter to fill their pages. Now, the great difficulty is, to insert all the valuable, interesting materials that are poured upon them from every part of the world, and from every grade and phase of society. Now, newspapers contain many of the best thoughts of the most highly gifted men, on the most momentous subjects, and their reports and statements are far more accurate than they formerly were or could be. They have repudiated the character for lying they once had, and have become records of truth."

ISLAND OF CHUSAN.

The Island of Chusan is seven miles from the mainland, and forty miles distant from the city of Ningpo, and lies in the vicinity of all the great and valuable marts of commerce on the eastern coast. It is 150 miles in circumference. The chief bay, that of Tinghae, is capable of accommodating, in perfect security, a hundred sail of square-rigged vessels, and possesses the most admirable facilities for the establishment of docks. Good water abounds, not only at the capital, but throughout the Island. Chusan consists of a succession of hills and dales, which present one unbroken scene of rich cultivation, and exhibit the most lovely scenery. Wheat, rice, tea, grass-cloth, sweet potatoes, cotton, tobacco, and other articles, grow in luxuriance. The Island is intersected with roads—not intended for wheeled conveyances—from five to seven feet broad, and paved and flagged throughout; and it is thickly studded with villages. Those who have the best opportunity of forming an opinion on the subject, believe that a hundred well populated and superior villages would be found on it, containing from one to five thousand inhabitants. The whole population is estimated at 270,000. The people are industrious and comfortable, and appear to have no want unsupplied; scarcely a beggar is to be seen, and there is a comparative absence of crime, which reflects no small credit on the Chinese character. Not a single homicide has occurred during the time in which it has been in British occupation; and the inmates of the jail, contributed by the whole island, have rarely exceeded twenty; and the majority have consisted of those who were confined for the illegal sale of its indigenous whiskey, the shamshoo.

The climate vies with that of the most favored regions in the world. There are but three months which can be called hot, June, July, and August. In this latter month, the thermometer stands on an average at 83 deg., but sinks at night to 73 deg. The next month it subsides to 74 deg. Then comes winter, with its bracing influences, and the ground is covered with hoar frost, and the ice lies half an inch thick. In January and February, the thermometer stands at 20 deg. of Fahrenheit. In March it rises to 28 deg., but the hills continue to be capped with snow and the cheerful fire is kept up until the commencement of June, so that it is only during three months of the year that woolen clothing is unnecessary. All the other places in China, where we have commercial stations, are hot, sultry, and unhealthy. The Island furnishes provisions of every description, of the best quality, at a very moderate price. Beef, pork, and poultry, may be obtained in the greatest abundance. Of geese, as large as those in America, there is no lack. Ducks are hatched by steam by thousands, and eggs are less than a halfpenny a piece. Game of every variety easily procured. Bread of good quality, is readily prepared by the Chinese. All kinds of vegetables may be obtained, and fruit grows with great luxuriance. Potatoes have now been introduced, and will probably become an article of great consumption throughout China. Indeed all kinds of provisions may be had at one-half the sum they cost at Hongkong. It is only for an American want to be known, to be immediately supplied from the Island or the continent. Fishing is universal around the Island, and it is calculated that no fewer than 7,000 vessels come from the continent, and remain for three months of Chusan, employed in fishing. They are attended with boats filled with ice, in which the fish are packed, and then dispatched to the neighboring coast.

THE SIMPLICITY OF GOLDSMITH.

One afternoon, as Colonel O'Moore and Mr. Burke were going to dine with Sir Joshua Reynolds, they observed Goldsmith (also on the way to Sir Joshua's) standing near a crowd of people who were staring and shouting at some foreign women in the windows of one of the houses in Leicester Square. 'Observe Goldsmith,' said Burke to O'Moore, 'and mark what passes between him and me by-and-bye at Sir Joshua's.' They passed on and arrived before Goldsmith, who came soon after, and Mr. Burke affected to receive him very coolly. This seemed to vex poor Goldsmith, who begged Burke would tell him how he had had the misfortune to offend him. Burke appeared very reluctant to speak, but after a good deal of pressing said, 'that he was really ashamed to keep up an intimacy with one who could be guilty of such monstrous indescretion as Goldsmith had just exhibited in the square. Goldsmith, with great earnestness, protested that he was unconscious of what was meant. 'Why,' said Burke, 'did you not exclaim as you were looking up at those women, What stupid beasts the crowd must be for staring with such admiration at these painted Jezebels, while a man of your talents passed by unnoticed?' Goldsmith was horror-struck, and said, 'Surely, surely, my dear friend, I did not say so.' 'Nay,' replied Burke, 'if you had not said so, how should I have known it?' 'That's true,' answered Goldsmith with great humility, 'I am very sorry—it was very foolish. I do recollect that something of the kind passed through my mind, but I did not think I had uttered it.'

THE DOGE'S DUNGEONS, VENICE.

To the right, stands the Doge's palace, in all its barbaric splendor—it frowns down upon you in sullen grandeur—in style and architecture, alone of its kind, half Byzantine, half Saracenic. Within its walls sat the Great Council, in the days of the Republic, and the immense room is still there, with the portraits of all the Doges, save Marino Faliero, hung around its walls. A black cloth covers the frame intended for him, with a pithy Latin inscription, saying—"Here is the place for Marino Faliero, who, for his crimes, was executed." In another chamber sat the Council of Ten, and in a small one the Council of Three.

What stories could the walls of this latter apartment tell? They show you a door, and a dark stair-case in the wall, leading from the Bridge of Sighs, up which the prejudged prisoners were brought to be examined before this terrible Inquisition—and, on the other side, as a gloomy finale, another door, leading down to the dungeons under the palace; the poor prisoner was sure to bring up there to die by drowning, the silken cord, or the axe. And if you are curious, and do not fear the cold and damp, take guide and flambeau, and descend to these prisons, renowned for their horrible security.

The first floor contains eight, in a square, round which you can walk—the double doors of each dungeon opened upon the narrow corridor, and not a ray of light could possibly penetrate these massive stone prison-houses. The next floor is the same; only a narrow passage marks out the "strangling place," and by sundry fixtures, the mode in which it was done; a closed up door leads to the steps down which the prisoners destined to the "sack" were taken.

Two little vaulted chambers are side by side—the one for the confessor to absolve the doomed man; the other, the executioner's attiring room. Further on, a private door conducted to the apartments of the Doge. A staircase, now masoned up, led to a third dungeon, (underneath the two,) below the level of the water. If you tread heavy, the flooring gives back a hollow sound. It made me shudder to think of the horrible cruelties, sufferings, and secret murders of these poor victims of political tyranny and ecclesiastical bigotry. When Napoleon entered Venice in 1797, the people broke open these dungeons, scattered the doors, and locks, and bolts, to the four winds. In one, a prisoner was found—he had been confined for fifteen years, and during that time had never seen a human face, or a gleam of sunlight. The populace, with loud shouts, brought him out on the square. The sun's rays, breaking from behind a cloud, suddenly fell on his face, and he was struck blind. Poor fellow! he never saw more, and so accustomed had he become to a solitary life, that he acted like one bewildered, and soon died. He was the last victim to the Inquisition in Venice, thanks to Napoleon and his grande armee.

Horrible Death.—We translate the following from a French paper: A banditti, consisting of eight persons, were recently arrested during the night, in a village near Venice. As it was too late to transport them elsewhere, they were put into a dungeon, and the chief of the band, notorious for his cruelty, and the number of assassinations he had committed, was confined in an old tower, which had been uninhabited for some time. Towards midnight, the sentinel, who was near this tower, having heard at first oaths, and afterwards groans, reported this to the local authority. Little importance was attached to it, and they waited till morning to confirm the circumstances; but what was their astonishment when, at break of day, they repaired to the tower, they found the prisoner dead, and all his limbs mangled. In order to discover the cause of so terrible a death, they deposited in the same place several pieces of poisoned food. At the end of two days, thirty two serpents were found dead in the same place.

FACTS FOR PRINTER'S BOYS.

M. Thiers, the great French ex-Minister, seven years before the last revolution in France, was a poor boy, and distributor of newspapers, at the office of the "Constitutional." He afterwards supplied the editor's chair—he led on the popular mind to revolt, and finally contributed to seat Louis Phillippe on the throne of Charles X., and placed himself in possession of the portfolio of Polignac. Guizot, the Minister, was the editor of the Journal des Debats. The great Erskine was formerly a reporter to the London Chronicle. Brougham and Sir James Mackintosh were also reporters to the Times. Beranger, the lyrical poet of France, also graduated among types and ink. Being asked recently if he were really a printer, Beranger replied:—"That I was, and a famous one too, nor do I ever take up a book without scanning the title-page, for I always excelled in composing title-pages. Handbills, too, I used to like to work upon, and well remember one blue Monday, when all alone in the office, poring over an old volume of poetry, an old farmer came in with an order for some auction placards. Though I had not been in the office three months, I took the composing stick in hand, set up the type, then locked up the form, put it to press, and by stepping upon a frisket, worked off the job—presenting my master the next morning with a specimen, and the money I had received. He was so pleased, good man, that he gave me the money, and half a day to spend it in—and a happy half day it was."

AN ANECDOTE FOR ALMANAC MAKERS.

Every one remembers the pleasant anecdote told of Patridge, the celebrated almanac maker, about one hundred years since. In traveling on horseback into the country, he stopped for his dinner at an inn, and afterwards called for his horse, that he might reach the next town, where he intended to sleep. "If you would take my advice, sir," said the ostler, as he was about to mount his horse, "you will stay where you are for the night, as you will surely be overtaken by a pelting rain." "Nonsense, nonsense," exclaimed the almanac maker, "there is a sixpence for you, my honest fellow, and good afternoon to you." He proceeded on his journey, and sure enough, he was drenched in a heavy shower. Patridge was struck with the man's prediction, and being always intent on the interest of his almanac, he rode back on that instant, and was received by the ostler with a broad grin. "Well, sir, you see I was right after all." "Yes, my lad, you have been so, and here is a crown for you, on condition that you tell me how you knew of this rain." "To be sure, sir," replied the man; "why, the truth is we have an almanac at our house called 'Patridge's Almanac,' and the fellow is such a notorious liar, that whenever he promises us a fine day, we always know that it will be the direct contrary. Now, your honor, this day, the 21st of June, is put down in our almanac in doors, as settled, fine weather; no rain. I looked at that before I brought your honor's horse out, and so was enabled to put you on your guard."

PERSEVERANCE.

A Constantinople correspondent of the London Literary Gazette tells the following pleasant story of a Countess of 70 and her interview with Mehemet Ali:

"The Pacha has only once before received ladies. He did, however, receive the Countess Talbot, (not the Shrewsbury family.) She compelled him to do so. She went to the Kiosk or the Citadel, I am not sure which, and asked to see His Highness; she was refused, he could not be seen. She insisted on being announced; she was then told His Highness would see her at another time, he was sleeping; 'wake him, then, and tell him I'm only an old woman and won't eat him.' She was admitted. He was much amused with her. She told him she was going to Jerusalem. He inquired whether she had plenty of companions for such a journey; she told him she had, and enumerated her dragoman, seven camels, the drivers! She told him that she had been up in a balloon, down in a diving-bell, at the top of Pompey's Pillar, and now she had seen Mehemet Ali! She was entirely alone, and came from Vienna, not even a female servant with her. She had made a vow to be at Jerusalem on Christmas Eve, and she accomplished it alone. She was upwards of 70, but never appeared fatigued."

Confidence in the People.—When the Revolutionists who won the Republic for France had forced their way into the Palais Royal, and had reached the apartments of Gen. Athalin, one of Louis Phillippe's aid-de-camps, they encountered the General's lady, a woman of dignified deportment and stature, whom the General had espoused for her rare beauty, being but the daughter of a poor fisherman of Granville. "My friends," she exclaimed, "I trust you have not come here to offer any injury to myself or my husband. I am not one of your fine ladies, but a daughter of the people; I throw myself then confidently on your protection. But I will not leave my husband; he is confined to his bed by illness." The band were struck with the boldness of the appeal. They repaired to the General's chamber, placed him in an arm-chair, and, headed by this daughter of the people, they conveyed him to a friend's house in the neighborhood. On reaching his destination, the General recollected leaving a sum of 130,000f. (£5,200) in notes and gold in his desk. He handed the key of the desk to a working man in a blouse, whom he did not know. An hour after, the man returned with every sou of the money.

Ledyard the Traveler.—Mr. Beaufoy had an interview with Ledyard just as he was setting off on his last expedition, and repeats the following passage from his conversation:—"I am accustomed," said Ledyard, "to hardship. I have known both hunger and nakedness to the utmost extremity of human suffering. I have known what it is to have food given me as charity to a madman; and I have at times been obliged to shelter myself under the miseries of that character, to avoid a heavier calamity. My distresses have been greater than I have ever owned, or ever will own, to any man. Such evils are terrible to bear; but they never yet had power to turn me from my purpose. If I live, I will faithfully perform, in its utmost extent, my engagement to the society; and if I perish in the attempt, my honor will still be safe, for death cancels all bonds." [Ledyard's Life.

A New Mineral Useful in Arts.—Mr. Blake, lately a citizen of Alexandria, Va., and now of Akron, Ohio has discovered a mineral in the neighborhood of the latter place which promises to be of great value. He has visited Washington and obtained a patent for it. When first dug up it is of the consistence of tallow, and gradually hardens in a few days, so as to resemble slate; and, finally, it becomes as hard as rock. It is the color of indigo, is impervious both to water and fire, and admits of the finest polish. When reduced to powder, and mixed up with linseed oil, it has the appearance of black paint, and may be spread over wood, canvass, &c. Roofs have been guarded by it against fire; and as it does not absorb the rain, it protects the rafters from decay. It consists of about one-half of silica, one-fourth of alumina, with less proportions of magnesia, black oxide of iron, sulphate of iron, lime and carbon.

Remarkable Operation.—The Charleston Courier says, we have lately been permitted to see three casts of the nose and face of a young gentleman of this city who labored under a great natural deformity of the nose—what is vulgarly called the bridge being very much depressed, whilst the point was turned up. To relieve this deformity, Dr. N. D'Alvigny, dentist, invented an instrument not thicker than a good-sized needle flattened, and with cutting edges at the point, which made an incision so small, that since the healing of the wound it can scarcely be perceived—and yet, with this needle, the cartilages which connect the ossa nasi and the nasal processes of the superior maxillary bones were divided, and an apparatus steadily applied upon the bridge of the nose so as by constant pressure to keep the parts in a correct position, until the parts became permanently united. The nose by this means has been restored to a natural and comely shape.

VARIETY.

"Died, at her residence in Park street, Nottingham, England, on the 4th of March, Miss Mary Chambers, in the seventy-first year of her age. Although deprived of sight at the age of two years, she nevertheless was enabled, by close study and unremitting effort, to acquire a thorough knowledge of classical literature, being well versed in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was also skilled in arithmetic, geography, and the use of the globes. For upwards of thirty years she conducted a school in Nottingham, and was an invaluable friend to the blind, having taught gratuitously very many blind children, and assisted in founding an institution for that afflicted class."

Carlyle, in his quaint but rich work on the French Revolution, in speaking of the beautiful but unfortunate Marie Antoinette, says, 'There is no proof of evil against her character, save that she might have been a little inattentive to rules of etiquette. She acknowledges her enemies, even Mirabeau, when she becomes acquainted with them, to be much better men than she had been told they were. The instant recognition of worth and talent, wherever it be, is a fine trait. An incident that is told of her is very touching—the day before her execution she borrowed a needle of the jailor's wife to mend her clothes and die with decency, preserving a woman's love of neatness to the last.'

When Pope Pius VII. visited the Royal Printing Office at Paris, he was presented with the Lord's Prayer in one hundred and fifty different languages. There are more than 150 hand presses in it and two power presses. In one room there are forty thousand forms packed away. The hands employed in it work ten hours, and good compositors earn from five to six francs per day, and pressmen about the same. After thirty years' service in the establishment, a workman gets a pension of four hundred francs per annum. Authors can have works of real utility printed in it free of expense.

In the Place du Carrousel, says the Presse, after the municipal guards had ceased firing, some of the citizens, enraged by the conflict, wished to sacrifice these unfortunate men. One of the citizens exclaimed, "They killed my brother at the Palais Royal, and I in turn must kill one of them!" A National Guard, standing by him, immediately said, "Remember that if you kill one, you will also have caused the death of a brother." These sublime words at once extinguished every feeling of revenge.

An English agriculturalist paper gives the following method of destroying caterpillars, which was accidentally discovered, and is practiced by a gardener near Glasgow. A piece of woolen rag had been blown by the wind into a current bush, and when taken out was found covered with the leaf-devouring insects. Taking the hint, he immediately placed pieces of woolen cloth in every bush in his garden, and found the next day that the caterpillars had universally taken to them for shelter. In this way he destroys many thousands every morning.

It is now a well established truth, that when a young tree is in a vigorous state of growth, and the wood full of sap, just previous to its having made any hard wood, (say in June or July, in most parts of the United States,) any branch may be taken off, without injury. Therefore, at this stage of existence of the tree, pruning may be safely performed, giving its top that shape it is intended to assume when it attains its full size.

The great business of a city life, said one our city clergymen to his people recently, is that of getting ready to live. This is true to the letter. Nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine hundreths of our business men are toiling and fretting, planning and executing, with this single end in view—to get ready, at some future time, to enjoy life.

To cure bots and cholic in horses, take from a pint to a quart of castor oil, mixing in it as much fine table salt as it will take; bleed the horse in the mouth, and when bleeding freely, pour the above down, blood and all.

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties ot their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

CHARITY BOWERY.

BY L. M. CHILD.

The following story was told me by an aged colored woman in New York. I shall endeavor to relate it precisely in her own words, so oft repeated that they are tolerably well impressed on my memory. Some confusion of names, dates, and incidents, I may very naturally make. I profess only to give 'the pith and marrow' of Charity's story, deprived of the highly dramatic effect it received from her swelling emotions, her earnest looks and changing tones.

I am about sixty-five years old. I was born on an estate called Pembroke, about three miles from Edenton, North Carolina. My master was very kind to his slaves. If an overseer whipped them, he turned him away. He used to whip them himself sometimes, with hickory switches as large as my little finger. My mother suckled all his children. She was reckoned a very good servant, and our mistress made it a point to give one of my mother's children to each of hers. I fell to the lot of Elizabeth, her second daughter. It was my business to wait upon her. Oh, my old mistress was a kind woman. She was all the same as a mother to poor Charity. If Charity wanted to learn to spin, she let her learn; if Charity wanted to learn to knit, she let her learn; if Charity wanted to learn to weave, she let her learn. I had a wedding when I was married; for mistress didn't like to have her people take up with one another, without any minister to marry them. When my dear good mistress died, she charged her children never te separate me and my husband; 'For,' said she, 'if ever there was a match made in heaven, it was Charity and her husband.' My husband was a nice good man; and mistress knew we set stores by one another. Her children promised her they never would separate me from my husband and children. Indeed, they used to tell me they would never sell me at all; and I am sure they meant what they said. But my young master got into trouble. He used to come home and sit leaning his head on his hand by the hour together without speaking to any body. I see something was the matter, and begged him to tell me what made him look so worried. He told me he owed seventeen hundred dollars that he could not pay; and he was afraid he would have to go to prison. I begged him to sell me and my children rather than go to jail. I see the tears come to his eyes. 'I don't know, Charity,' said he, 'I'll see what can be done. One thing you may feel easy about, I'll never separate you from your husband and children, let what will come.'

Two or three days after, he came to me, and says he, 'Charity, how should you like to be sold to Mr. McKinley?' I told him I would rather be sold to him than any one else, because my husband belonged to him. My husband was a nice good man, and we set stores by one another. Mr. McKinley agreed to buy us; and so I and my child went there to live. He was a kind master, but as for Mrs. McKinley, she was a divil. Mr. McKinley died about a year after he bought us; and in his will he gave me and my husband free; but I never knowed any thing about it for years afterwards. I don't know how they managed it. My poor husband died and never knew he was free. But it's all one now. He's among the ransomed. He used to say, 'I thank God it's only a little way home; I shall soon be with Jesus.' Oh, he had a fine old Christian heart.

Here the old woman sighed deeply, and remained silent for a moment, while her right hand rose and fell, as if her thoughts were mournfully busy. At last she resumed:

Sixteen children I've had, first and last; and twelve I nursed for my mistress. From the time my first baby was born, I always set my heart upon buying freedom for some of my children. I thought it was of more consequence to them than to me; for I was old and used to being a slave. But mistress McKinley would n't let me have my children. One after another—one after another, she sold 'em away from me. Oh, how many times that woman broke my heart!

Here her voice choked, and tears began to flow. She wiped them quickly with the corner of her apron, and continued: I tried every way I could to lay up a copper, to buy my children; but I found it very hard; for mistress kept me at work all the time. It was 'Charity! Charity! Charity!' from morning till night. 'Charity do this, and Charity do that.'

I used to do the washings of the family; and large washings they were. The public road run right by my hut, and I thought to myself while I stood there at the washtub, I might as well be earning something to buy my children. So I set up a little oyster-board; and when any body came along that wanted a few oysters and a cracker, I left my washtub and waited upon him. When I got a little money laid up, I waited on my mistress and tried to buy one of my children. She knew not how long my heart had been set upon it, and how hard I worked for it. But she would not let me have one. At last what do you think that woman did? She sold me and five of my children to the speculators!

After a short pause, [illegible] face again brightened up, and her voice suddenly changed to a more gay and sprightly tone.

Surely, ma'am, there's always some good comes of being kind to folks. When I kept my oyster-board, there was a thin, peaked-looking man used to buy of me. Sometimes he would say, 'Aunt Charity, (he always called me Aunt Charity,) you must fix me up a nice little mess, for I feel poorly to-day.' I always made something good for him; and if he did n't happen to have any change, I always trusted him. He liked my messes mighty well. Now who do you think it turned out to be but the very speculator that bought me! He come to me, and says he, 'Aunt Charity, (he always called me Aunt Charity,) you have been very good to me, and fixed me up many a nice little mess when I've been poorly; and now you shall have your freedom for it; and I'll give you your youngest child.'

That was very kind, said I, but I wish he had given you all of them.

With a look of great simplicity, and in tones of expostulation, the slave-mother replied, 'Oh, he could n't afford that, you know.'

Well, continued she, after that I concluded I'd come to the free States. But mistress McKinley had one child of mine, a boy of about twelve years of age. I had always set my heart upon buying Richard. He was the image of his father; and my husband was a nice, good man, and we set stores by one another. Besides, I was always uneasy in my mind about Richard. He was a spirity lad; and I knew it was hard for him to be a slave. Many a time I have said to him, Richard, let what will happen, never lift your hand against your master.

But I knew it would always be hard work for him to bring his mind to be a slave. I carried to her all my money, and told her I had more due to me, and if all of it was n't enough to buy my poor boy, I'd work hard and send her all my earnings till she said I had paid enough. She knew she could trust me. She knew Charity always kept her word. But she was a hard-hearted woman. She would n't let me have my boy. With a heavy heart I went to work to earn more, in hopes I might one day be able to buy him. I did n't get much more time than I did when I was a slave; for my mistress was calling upon me, and I did n't like to disoblige her. I wanted to keep the right side of her, in hopes she would let me have my boy. One day she sent me on an errand. I had to wait some time. When I come back, mistress was counting a heap of bills in her lap. She was a rich woman; she rolled in gold. My little girl stood behind her chair; and as mistress counted the money, ten dollars, twenty dollars, fifty dollars, I see that she kept crying. I thought may be that mistress had struck her. But when I see the tears keep rolling down her cheeks all the time I went up to her and whispered, What's the matter? She pointed to mistress' lap, and said, Broder's money! Broder's money! Oh, then I understood it all! I said to mistress McKinley, Have you sold my boy? Without looking up from counting her money, she drawled out, Yes, Charity; and I got a great price for him! (Here the colored woman imitated to perfection the languid, indolent tones common to southern ladies.)

Oh, my heart was too full! She had sent me away on an errand because she did n't want to be troubled with our cries. I had n't any chance to see my poor boy. I shall never see him again in this world. My heart felt as if it was under a great load of lead. I could n't speak a word to reproach her. I never reproached her from that day to this. As I went out of the room all I could say was, Mistress, how could you do it?

The poor creature's voice had grown more and more tremulous, as she proceeded, and was at length stifled with sobs.

In a few moments she resumed her story:—When my boy was gone, I thought I might sure enough as well go to the free States. But mistress McKinley had a little grandchild of mine. His mother died when he was born. I thought it would be some comfort to me if I could buy little orphan Sammy. So I carried all the money I had to my mistress again, and asked her to let me buy my grandson. But she would n't let me have him. Then I had nothing more to wait for; so I come on to the free States. Here I often take in washing, and my daughter is smart at the needle, and we get a very comfortable living.'

'Do you ever hear from any of your children,' said I.

'Yes, ma'am, I hear from one of them. Mistress McKinley sold one to a lady that comes to the North every summer; and she brings my daughter along with her.'

'Don't she know that it's a good chance to take her freedom, when she comes to the North?'

'To be sure she knows that,' replied Charity, with significant emphasis, 'but my daughter is pious. She's a member of a church. Her mistress knows she would n't tell a lie for her right hand. She makes a promise on the Bible that she won't try to run away, and that she will go back to the South with her; and so, ma'am, for her honor and her Christianity's sake, she goes back into slavery.'

'Is her mistress very kind to her?' I asked.

'Yes, ma'am, but then every body likes to be free. Her mistress is very kind. She says I may buy her for four hundred dollars; and that's a low price for her; two hundred paid down, and the rest as we can earn it. Kitty and me are trying to lay up enough to buy her.'

'What has become of your mistress McKinley, do you ever hear from her?'

'Yes, ma'am, I often hear from her, and summer before last as I was walking up Broadway, with a basket of clean clothes, who should I meet but my old mistress McKinley! She gave a sort of a start and said in her drawling way: Oh, Charity, is it you? Her voice sounded deep and hollow, as if it came from under the ground; for she was far gone in a consumption. If I was n't mistaken there was a little something about here, (laying her hand on her heart,) that made her feel strangely when she met poor Charity. Said I, How do you do, mistress McKinley, and how does little Sammy do? (That was my grandson, you know, that she would n't let me buy.')

'I'm poorly, Charity,' says she; 'very poorly. Sammy's a smart boy. He's grown tall and tends table nicely. Every night I teach him his prayers.'

The indignant grandmother drawled out the last word in a tone that Garrick himself could not have surpassed. Then suddenly changing both voice and manner, she added, in tones of earnest dignity, 'Och! I could n't stand that! Good morning, ma'am, said I.'

I smiled, as I inquired whether she had ever heard from Mrs. KcKinley since.

'Yes, ma'am. The lady that brings my daughter to the North every summer, told me last fall she did 'nt think she could live long. When she went home, she asked me if I had any messages to send to my old mistress McKinley. I told her I had a message to send. Tell her, says I, to prepare to meet poor Charity at the judgment seat.'

About a year after this conversation, I again visited New York, and called to see Charity Bowery. I asked her if she had received any further tidings of her scattered children. The tears came to her eyes. 'You know I told you,' said she, 'that I found out my poor Richard was sold to a Mr. Mitchell of Alabama. A white gentleman who has been very kind to me went to them parts lately, and brought me back news of Richard. His master had ordered him to be flogged, and he would n't come up to be tied. If you don't come up, you black rascal, I'll shoot you, said his master. Shoot away, said Richard, I won't come to be flogged. His master pointed a pistol at him, and in two hours my poor boy was dead. Richard was a spirity lad. I always knew it was hard for him to be a slave. Well, he's free now. God be praised he's free; and I shall soon be with him.'

In the course of my conversation with this interesting woman, she told me much about the patrols, who, armed with arbitrary power, and frequently intoxicated, break into the houses of the colored people, and subject them to all manner of outrages. But nothing seemed to have excited her imagination so much as the insurrection of Nat Turner. The panic that prevailed throughout the Slave States of course reached her ear in repeated echoes, and the reasons are obvious why it should have awakened intense interest. It was, in fact, a sort of Hegira to her mind, from which she was prone to date all important events in the history of her limited world.

'On Sundays,' said she, 'I have seen the negroes up in the country, going away under large oaks or in secret places, sitting in the woods with spelling books. The brightest and best men were killed in Nat's time. Such ones are always suspected. All the colored folks were afraid to pray in the time of the old prophet Nat. There was no law about it, but the whites reported round among themselves, that if a note was heard we should have some dreadful punishment; and after that, the low whites would fall upon any slaves they heard praying or singing hymns, and often killed them before their masters or mistresses could get to them.'

I asked Charity to give me a specimen of their hymns. In a voice cracked with age, but still retaining considerable sweetness, she sang

> 'A few more beatings of the wind and rain
> Ere the winter will be over—
> Glory Hallelujah!
>
> Some friends have gone before me;
> I must try to go and meet them—
> Glory Hallelujah!
>
> A few more risings and settings of the sun,
> Ere the winter will be over—
> Glory Hallelujah!
>
> There's a better day a-coming—
> There's a better day a-coming—
> Glory Hallelujah!'

With a very arch expression she looked up as she concluded, and said, 'They would n't let us sing that. They thought we was going to rise because we sung, Better days are coming.'

It's now more than a year since poor Charity went where the 'wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'

ANECDOTE OF SWEARING.

An anecdote of this description, which we read a few days ago, reminded us of one we had never seen in print, but which we have for a long time stored among our recollections of the Rev. Jos. Grafton of Newton. We know nothing of the truth of the story, and yet so perfectly characteristic is it, that we have always regarded it as the relation of a veritable incident. Father Grafton stood high in the public estimation, and was often present with other clergymen on great occasions. At one time he was dining with the Governor and Council, the Mayor and Aldermen, or some other body of magnates in Boston, and was excessively annoyed, as well as shocked, by the profanity of a young man who sat nearly opposite him at table. Having endured the odious vice as long as his patience would allow, the old gentleman arose and exclaimed, 'Mr. President,' in the sharp, energetic tone, which all who knew him will recollect. The President struck his knife handle on the table, to command attention, and replied, 'The Rev. Mr. Grafton.' Silence prevailed, and the old gentleman very coolly proceeded: 'I move you, sir,' that there be no swearing done at this table except by my friend the Rev. Dr. Homer.' The motion prevailed by acclamation, and the remedy was as thoroughly effectual as the mortification of the young swearer was complete. [N. Y. Recorder.

DR. BARROW IN THE PULPIT.

He was so careless in his person and manner, even in the pulpit, as by his slovenliness greatly to mar the effect of his fine compositions. "He had one fault more," observes Dr. Pope, "if it deserves that name—he was generally too long in his sermons; and now," adds this garrulous biographer, "I have spoken as ill of him as the worst of his enemies could, if ever he had any. He thought he had not said enough, if he omitted anything that belonged to the subject of his discourse; so that his sermons seemed rather complete treatises, than orations designed to be spoken in an hour. He spent three hours and a half in the delivery of his sermon 'on Bounty to the Poor,' before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, 1671. Being asked, after he came down from the pulpit, whether he was not tired; 'Yes, indeed,' replied he, 'I began to be weary with standing so long.'"

EPITAPH OF SIR WM. JONES.

Here was deposited the mortal part of a man who feared God, but not death, and maintained independence, but sought not riches; who thought none below him but the base and unjust; none above him but the wise and virtuous; who loved his parents, kindred, friends, and country, with an ardor which was the chief source of all his pleasures, and all his pains; and who, having devoted his life to their service, and to the improvement of his mind, resigned it calmly, giving glory to his Creator, wishing peace on earth, and with good-will to all creatures, on the (twenty-seventh) day of (April,) in the year of our blessed Redeemer one thousand seven hundred (and ninety-four.)

He was acquainted with twenty-eight languages, and his opinion was, that all men are born with an equal capacity for improvement. Thomas Law, Esq., who entertained a different opinion, sent him the following:

> Sir William, you attempt in vain
> By depth of reason to maintain
> That all men's talents are the same,
> And they, not nature, are to blame.
> Whate'er you say, whate'er you write,
> Proves your opponents in the right.
> Lest genius should be ill-defined,
> I term it your superior mind,
> Hence to your friends 'tis plainly shown,
> You're ignorant of yourself alone.

SIR WM. JONES' ANSWER.

> Ah! but too well, dear friend, I know
> My fancy weak, my reason slow,
> My memory by art improved,
> My mind by baseless trifles moved.
> Give me (thus high my pride I raise)
> The ploughman's, or the gardner's praise,
> With patient and unceasing toil,
> To meliorate a stubborn soil,
> And say, no higher meed I ask,
> With zeal hast thou performed thy task.
> Praise of which virtuous minds may boast,
> They best confer who merit most.

TOUCHING REMINISCENCE.

The Hon. J. Quincy Adams concluded his argument before the United States Supreme Court, in the Amistad case, with the following touching reminiscence:—

May it please your Honors, on the 7th of February, 1804, now more than thirty-seven years past, my name was entered, and yet stands recorded on both rolls, as one of the attorneys and counsellors of this Court. Five years later, in February and March, 1809, I appeared for the last time before this court in defense of the cause of justice, and of important rights, in which many of my fellow-citizens had property of large amount at stake. Very shortly afterwards, I was called to the discharge of other duties; first in distant lands, and in later years, within our own country, but in different departments of our Government. Little did I imagine that I should ever be required to claim the right of appearing in the capacity of an officer in this Court. Yet such has been the dictate of my destiny; and I appear again to plead the cause of justice, and now of Liberty and life, and in behalf of many of my fellow-men, before that same Court, which, in a former age, I had addressed in support of rights of property. I stand again, I trust for the last time, before that same Court, "hic cæstus artemque repono." I stand before the same Court, but not before the same judges, nor aided by the same associates, nor resisted by the same opponents. As I cast my eye along those seats of honor and of public trust, now occupied by you, they seek in vain for one of those honored and honorable persons whose indulgence listened then to my voice. Marshall, Cushing, Case, Washington, Johnson, Livingston, Todd; where are they? Where is that eloquent statesman and learned lawyer who was my associate counsel in the management of that cause—Robert Goodloe Harper? Where is that brilliant luminary, so long the pride of Maryland and of the American bar, then my opposing counsel—Luther Martin? Where is the excellent clerk of that day, whose name has been inscribed on the shores of Africa, as a monument of his abhorrence of the slave trade—Elias B. Caldwell? Where is the marshall? Where are the criers of the Court! Alas! where is one of the very judges of the Court, arbiters of life or death, before whom I commenced this anxious argument? Gone—gone from a world of sin and sorrow, I trust—to that blest abode, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." And it is my ardent wish, and fervent prayer, that each and every one of you may go to his final account with as little of earthly frailty to answer for, as these illustrious dead; and that you may every one, after a long and virtuous career in this world, be received at the portals of the next with the approving sentence; "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of thy Lord."

THE RURAL POPULATION IN CHINA.

The farms are small, each consisting of from one to four or five acres; indeed, every cottager has his own little tea garden, the produce of which supplies the wants of his family, and the surplus brings him in a few dollars, which are spent on the other necessaries of life. The same system is practiced in every thing relating to Chinese agriculture. The cotton, silk, and rice farms, are generally all small, and managed upon the same plan. There are few sights more pleasing than a Chinese family in the interior, engaged in gathering the tea-leaves, or, indeed, in any of their other agricultural pursuits. There is the old man, it may be the grandfather, or, even the great-grandfather, patriarch-like, directing his descendants, many of whom are in their youth and prime, while others are in their childhood, in the labors of the field. He stands in the midst of them bowed down with age; but, to the honor of the Chinese as a nation, he is always looked up to by all with pride and affection, and his old age and gray hairs are honored, revered, and loved. When, after the labors of the day are over, they return to their happy homes, their fare consists chiefly of rice, fish, and vegetables, which they enjoy with great zest, and are happy and contented. I really believe that there is no country in the world where the agricultural population are better off than they are in the north of China. Labor with them is pleasure, for its fruits are eaten by themselves, and the rod of the oppressor is unfelt and unknown. [Fortune in China.

SHERIDAN'S PROCRASTINATION.

Much of the inconvenience to which Sheridan was subjected, arose from his procrastination; whether it was a deed to sign or a letter to frank, he would still put off doing it. Nothing was ever done in time or place. Letters containing money or bearing intelligence of importance remained unopened. Whether private or official business demanded his attention, still there was the same indolence, the same unwillingness to apply, which eventually led to the most serious results. Professor Smyth was waiting one morning for him in his ante-room, and happened to cast his eyes on a table that stood in the middle of the room covered with manuscripts, plays, pamphlets, and papers of every description. As he proceeded to tumble them over and look at the superscription, he observed that the letters were most of them unopened, and that some of them had coronets on the seal. He remarked to Mr. Westley, the treasurer of Drury Lane, who was sitting by the fire, having also for a long time danced attendance, that Mr. Sheridan treated all alike, wafer or coronet, pauper or peer, the letters seemed equally unopened. "Just so," was the treasurer's reply; "indeed, last winter I was occupying myself as you are doing, and for the same reason, and what should I see among these letters but one from myself, unopened like the rest—a letter that I knew contained a £10 note within it. The history, sir, was that I had received a note from Mr. Sheridan, dated Bath, and headed with the words 'money bound,' and entreating me to send the first £10 I could lay my hands upon. This I did. In the meantime I suppose some one had given him a cast in his carriage up to town, and his application to me had never more been thought of; and, therefore, there lay my letter, and would have continued to lie till the housemaid had swept it with the rest into the fire, if I had not accidentally seen it." Mr. Smyth could not help, on going down stairs, telling the story to his valet, Edwards, suggesting to him to look after the letters; to which he replied—"What can I do for such a master? The other morning I went to settle his room after he had gone out, and on throwing open the windows, found them stuffed up with paper of different kinds, and amongst them bank-notes; there had been a high wind in the night—the windows, I suppose, had rattled—he had come in quite intoxicated, and, in the dark, for want of something better, stuffed the bank-notes into the casement! and as he never knows what he has in his pocket, or what he has not, they were never afterwards missed." INFIDELITY AND CHRISTIANITY.

The Abbe Boismont happily unites the powers of logic with the splendor of rhetoric, in his address to the infidel writers:

"I am ready to acknowledge the service you have rendered humanity; I am ready to acknowledge that you have checked the progress of fanaticism; that you have thrown down the flaming pyres of intolerance; and, as a minister of the gospel, I thank you in the name of religion. But let me ask, why you are so ardent for the annihilation of all worship? Why so anxious for the abolition of our solemnities? Were every temple of this metropolis leveled with the dust, to what sanctuary would the wretched resort to pour out their afflicted souls to Heaven? Were every minister of the gospel proscribed, where would be the hand to wipe the tear from the cheek of misfortune—where the voice to breathe the accents of consolation to the miserable? Renowned and exalted as your name may be, tell me, do you account it sufficiently powerful to summon avarice and opulence to unlock their treasures, and to respect the rights of the poor? Can the abstract images of humanity, of liberty, of equality, warm, soften, or subdue the heart? You every where represent mankind in your writings under the soothing imagery of a fraternal community; with an equal ardor we embrace this image, and hold it to our bosom. To you that image is a cold statue; to us it is warm, and throbbing with life! You declaim, and we perform; for it is in our temples only that this family of brotherhood is seen; it is in our temples only where passion, resentment, and vengeance sink into a calm; where separate interests congregate into one benevolent sentiment. You have your lyceums and institutions for the encouragement of literature, but you have no school for the science of humanity. You speak of her indeed in your discussions and academic harangues; but it is in our temples only that she speaks herself, acts, and commands! Because equality is only to be found at the foot of the altar, where birth, dignity, and talents disappear, and the Christian alone remains!"

SWIFT AND THE LADY'S DINNER.—A lady invited Dean Swift to a most sumptuous dinner. She said, 'Dear Dean, this fish is not as good as I could wish, though I sent for it half across the kingdom, and it cost me so much,' naming an incredible sum. 'And this thing is not such as I ought to have for such a guest, though it came from such a place and cost such a price.' Thus she went on decrying and underrating every article of her expensive and ostentatious dinner, and teasing her distinguished guest with apologies, only to find a chance to display her vanity in bringing her trouble and expense into view, until she exhausted his patience. He is reported to have risen in a passion, and to have said, 'True, madam, it is a miserable dinner, and I will not eat it, but go home and dine upon sixpence worth of herring.'

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE.

A deep interest is now felt in the question, whether the Revolution in France will lead to a separation of the Church from the State. Many of the French people, among whom might be named several members of the new government, are decidedly in favor of such a measure. M. de Lamartine is said to have often expressed his opinion, that the voluntary principle ought to be adopted in France as it has been in the United States, thus leaving every religious society to pay its own pastor from the contributions of its individual members. But whether the representatives to be elected for the formation of a new Constitution will adopt this view, is somewhat doubtful. One argument in favor of it will be the lessening of the public expenditure to the extent of some eight millions of dollars; and this, at a time when the finances are so deranged, will undoubtedly be a very tempting consideration. But, on the other hand, it is feared that the measure would give offence to the rural population, who would think religion lost if the priests should not continue to receive their salaries from the State. Besides, it is not impossible that the new government may think the indirect authority they will retain over the Church, by affording to the clergy the means of support, will amply repay the expense of the system now in vogue. Under such circumstances, there is of course much uncertainty as to the course which will be taken in France relative to the separation of the Church from the State.

It is amusing, if not instructive, to notice the course of the Catholic bishops and clergy of France towards the new government. When Louis Philippe occupied the throne, they gladly availed themselves of the privileges and money he bestowed, and bowed humbly enough before him. But no sooner was he fallen, than they became equally obsequious to the Republic. The day after the Revolution, the Archbishop of Paris addressed a letter to the members of his flock, praising the revolutionists, offering the churches for temporary hospitals, and declaring that he would fervently implore the blessing of Heaven upon the French Republic. In a subsequent letter, he affirms that "if the bishops have flattered the kings for the last three hundred years, the fault must be imputed to heretics who endangered both Church and State." The Archbishop of Lyons has shown equal eagerness to salute the new government. In a letter to his cures he says:—"You have often felt a wish to enjoy that liberty which renders our brethren of the United States so happy; that liberty you will have. If the authorities desire to set up the national flag on religious edifices, hasten to comply with the desire of the magistrates." In another letter he writes farther:—"The citizens who were slain at Paris, in the struggle of February, have fallen gloriously in defending the principles of civil and religious liberty, which will be henceforth in France a reality; we shall no longer have occasion to envy North America." These extracts show how easy it is for Catholic bishops to transfer allegiance from an avaricious and selfish monarchy to a republic. They show also—what the world was not perhaps fully aware of before—how devoted these prelates are to religious liberty and the rights of the people. Should the new government decide to separate the Church from the State, it is not impossible that even they will side with it.

It is not easy to judge of the prevailing feeling in France relative to the separation of Church and State, although the London Patriot of April 6th sums up the latest information in a way to encourage the hope that the measure is pretty extensively favored. In some departments, that paper says, 'the clubs call for the suppression of payments for forms of worship. The clergy would seem to be alarmed, since they are accused of procuring the destruction of placards in support of this demand. The opponents of the connection between Church and State, have issued an "Appeal" to French Protestants. At a meeting of the eleventh legion, on occasion of the elections for the National Guards, it had been determined to demand from candidates for the grades of officer, sub-officer, and corporal, a declaration, one article of which will bind them to sustain "liberty of worship without burden to the State, the expenses of each creed to be defrayed by those citizens who profess it." A meeting of "United Socialists" has accepted the same programme. The Courrier Francais, the Democratic Pacifique, and the Peuple Constituant, all maintain this principle of separation. The Presse, on the contrary, proposes to pay all forms of worship which can give proof of ten years' existence. The Universe continues to observe a discreet silence. The Republique Francaise suggests, among other pieces of economy, the retrenchment of forty millions of francs from the ecclesiastical budget. The Libre Echange advocates the entire suppression of the Ministry of Cultes. The Revue de l' Instruction Publique urges that the clergy be paid, but on condition of their being entirely excluded from public instruction, colleges, seminaries, and schools, and that teaching fraternities be suppressed.'

THE ABYSSINIANS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In consideration of the Missionary Board's having changed the destination of our missionaries from the originally designated ground, and in consideration of the impression obtained that the Abyssinians are in the observance of the seventh day of the week for the Sabbath, I am induced to offer the following extract from James Bruce's Travels to discover the Sources of the Nile, together with some preliminary observations of my own, for the reflection of your readers.

In the first place, we should notice that Mr. Bruce had resided several years as Consul of the British Government in Barbary; had traveled extensively in Egypt, Syria, and Arabia; had become familiar with the habits, customs, and languages of those countries East and South, and was furnished with passports, firmans, and recommendations, from courts, officers, and merchants having intercourse with the Government of Abyssinia, together with a special written invitation from the King of that country to be his guest and physician; and yet, with all these precautions, his journey was the most perplexing, difficult, and dangerous; so much so, that in many instances he came near losing his life, and often all his effects. If the history of his travels had been known by our brethren, it seems to me they never would have thought of sending missionaries there, especially females.

Mr. Bruce arrived there in the year seventeen hundred and sixty-nine, was soon appointed an officer in the court and in the army, was made Governor of a province, was a soldier in the field, a physician in the city, and courtier every where, mingled in all circles, became familiar with all their habits, civil, social, and religious, gives a distinct account of their ceremonies, doctrine, and state of religion, frequently speaks of what was done on Sundays, but not a word of their observing the seventh day as the Sabbath until he starts on his return, which was about two years after his arrival, and that in the following language:—

"The Kemmont were a sect once the same as the Falasha, (Jews,) but were baptized in the reign of Facilidas, and ever since have continued separate from their ancient brethren. No great pains seems to have been taken with them since their admission to Christianity, for they retain most of their ancient customs. They eat the meat of cattle killed by Christians, but not of those slaughtered, either by Mohammedans or Falasha. They hold as a doctrine, that, being once baptized, and having once communicated, no sort of prayer, nor other attention to divine worship, is farther necessary. They wash themselves from head to foot when they come from market, or any public place where they may have touched any one of a sect different from their own, esteeming all such unclean. They abstain from all sorts of work on Saturday, keeping close at home; but they grind corn, and do many other such like works on Sunday. They have great abhorrence to fish, which they not only refrain from eating, but cannot bear the sight of; and assign as a reason, that Jonah (from whom they boast they are descended) was swallowed by a whale, or some other such great fish. They are hewers of wood and carriers of water for all Gondar, [the capital of Abyssinia,] and are held in great detestation by the Abyssinians." STILLMAN COON.

CHEAP RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

The editor of the Christian Index, published at Penfield, Ga., has proposed to reduce the price of his paper to one dollar per year, on condition of having guarantied to him ten thousand paying-in-advance subscribers. Rev. H. Keeling, assistant editor of the Religious Herald, notices the proposition, and makes the following common-sense remarks upon it:—

"Why is it, there is so much ado in all the land about the enormous price of religious newspapers? Is it not a well known fact, that even at present prices, those papers considered financially are scarcely able to breathe? And suppose the price be reduced 100 per cent., what is the vast gain to a subscriber? It is a dollar a year—a sum which, with a Georgia planter, equals an armful of cotton—which, to the poor husbandman, is faced by a bushel of potatoes or a pig—and which, to a journeyman mechanic, is equal to two evenings work at his trade.

And what is the sacrifice at which this vast good—viz. the saving of a dollar a year—is to be attained? It is simply this, that either the paper itself is to be submerged in ruin, with the bankruptcy of the editor and publisher; or that the editorial department of the work is to be wretchedly conducted, or perhaps both of these evils together.

We have had some little experience in these matters, and therefore speak the more freely. In saying what we do say, we have no motive on earth but the welfare of the great cause we all love.

Our advice is this: Get the ten thousand subscribers to the Index, and let the subscription price be two dollars. This would fairly pay such a compensation as to carry on the concern efficiently, and no more. The editorial labor bestowed upon a paper is indefinite. The editor may do his work in two hours, or he may labor six days in the week, and not be idle on the seventh. Give the editor time, and he may condense into one column what might otherwise be scattered over six. Hence the folly, too, of demanding large papers, instead of demanding lage editorial labor. A mammoth paper may be filled with articles carelessly selected, or, perhaps, not selected at all, while the columns of a very small paper may be exceedingly rich and varied.

Do we act thus sillily in any other matters? When sick, who sends to a quack, rather than to a regular physician, to save the regular fee? It were as wise to elect representatives and scholars—to employ teachers and pastors—to appoint judges and choose barristers, on condition that they serve for half price as it is to demand religious newspapers, at a price that does not fairly pay the publisher, and compensate the editor."

☞ The writer of the following article has spent much time in endeavors to simplify the Science of Geology, and bring it within the comprehension of the young—a work in which we wish him all success—and to aid which we cheerfully comply with his request to publish:

GEOLOGY.

BY JOSIAH HOLBROOK.

Geography, Geometry, and Geology, are all derived from the Greek word ge, signifying earth, or the world. Grapho, meaning to write or describe, added to ge, makes Geography, or a description of the earth. Logos, meaning a word or discourse added, forms Geology, or a discourse about the earth. Metron, meaning measure, added, forms Geometry, or the measure of the earth. The specific objects of these three sister sciences are to describe, analyze, and measure the earth. Geography tells the places, and Geology the ingredients, of mountains, islands and continents. The one tells where the Andes mountains are, the other what they are. Hence the one is essential to a full knowledge of the other.

The editor of the New York Tribune, after witnessing, by visits to the schools of the City of New York, the great interest and intelligence, even in very young children, in the specimens of Geology exhibited to them, inquires emphatically, "What more rational or appropriate starting point in the race after knowledge, can be selected, than the elements of our globe?" at the same time adding, "that every person in the world ought to know of what the world is made; especially as this information can be acquired at a very early age, and with the greatest ease and delight."

Ten simple minerals are the elements of all mountains, rocks, and soils; and hence are called the "Geological Alphabet." These minerals variously combined form about twenty-five different kinds of rocks. The names of these minerals and the rocks which they compose, can be learned easily by children. The knowledge thus obtained is of the most substantial, as well as interesting character; and the more substantial and interesting, because very young children, not only may, but do, both learn and prepare this fundamental lesson of knowledge for themselves.

The first time a little child picks up a pebble, he learns the most important lesson that can be learned in this very interesting and useful science. This pebble is one of the most important letters in the Geological Alphabet. It is called quartz, and is the only mineral found every where. It enters more largely into rocks, mountains, and soils, than any other, and also forms, under different colors and textures, much the greatest portion of gems, used as ornaments, and articles of commerce, in all ages of the world. The twelve precious stones placed in the breast-plate of Aaron, the High Priest, were varieties of quartz, as were those named in the book of Revelations, as forming the streets of the New Jerusalem. Quartz is also essential in the manufacture of glass, of every variety.

As quartz, the first and most important letter in the Geological Alphabet, also one of the most instructive and interesting things in the world, is found every where, we invite every child in every school and family to look for it, as he will most certainly find it, and as certainly learn it. It is very hard, and scratches glass. It also has a great many colors, and is sometimes beautifully crystalized, with six sides. Frequently the middle of the crystal is a six-sided prism, and the two ends six-sided pyramids.

Great quantities of quartz crystals are collected by the children at Little Falls, New York, and sold to travelers under the name of "Diamonds." Red quartz, with a fine texture, is called jasper; when purple, it is called amethyst; if clouded, agate; if yellow, cornelian, or perhaps topaz; when of a pearly lustre, it is called opal.

MR. ABBOTT IN SANDOWAY.—An extract of a letter from Mr. Abbott, in the Macedonian, under date of Dec. 16, says; "We are to start for Ong Kyoung in a day or two, where there is to be a gathering of the people next full moon, and where I expect to meet those native preachers from whom I parted on that spot, under such gloomy apprehensions, three years ago. My health is really very good, with the exception of a slight cough, which may affect my throat so much as to render preaching in the evening and in the open air, to large assemblies, rather hazardous. Br. Beecher is with me, and will be able to relieve me from the necessity of constant preaching. I hear very satisfactory accounts from the Christian villages. But I can say nothing more until I have visited them."

LIBERAL BEQUEST.—Mrs. Sarah Hills, late of West Newbury, Mass., has made the following bequests in her Will:—To the American Home Missionary Society, $500; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, $500; American Bible Society, $500; American Tract Society, $500; American Education Society, $500; Second Parish in West Newbury, $1,800; Town of West Newbury, $1,500. She has also constituted the Home Missionary Society and Board of Foreign Missions, Residuary Legatees.

LATEST FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.—Since our last paper went to press, we have received letters from Br'n Carpenter and Wardner, dated Jan. 1, 1848. They seem to be pursuing their arduous work with cheerfulness and courage. Mrs. Carpenter, who was ill at the previous report, had nearly recovered her usual health, and the others were well.

HOUSE OF INDUSTRY AND HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS.—The corner-stone of the buildings of this excellent institution, in the city of New York, was laid on the afternoon of May 5, in Thirtieth-st., between Fourth and Fifth avenues, in the presence of a good number of persons interested in its establishment and progress. E. W. Chester, Esq., presided at the ceremonies. The corner-stone was laid by Lewis Tappan, Esq., and an address was delivered by Rev. W. W. Everts. In the evening a public meeting in behalf of this charity took place at the Church of the Puritans, Union-Square, attended by a very large and deeply attentive audience. Addresses were made by Rev. H. W. Beecher, Rev. Dr. Tyng, and Dr. Dowling. It was stated, in the course of the exercises, that above $11,000 had already been raised for the proposed institution, of which $5,000 had been expended in the purchase of lots for the erection of buildings. The remaining $6,000, with about as much more, will be required to complete the buildings.

NEWSPAPERS IN ITALY.—A correspondent of the New England Puritan, writing from Italy, says that the newspapers in Rome, Florence, and Turin, and indeed every where, are losing concerns, though the editorial labor expended on them is mostly gratuitous. They are all got up from patriotic motives, by men rich in money or in intellect. Even the agents who receive a compensation, content themselves with a small remuneration for their services.

REVIVAL IN NEW JERSEY.—The New York Observer reports a revival in the church where Brainerd and Whitfield preached, and William Tennent and John Woodhull prayed and labored a century ago. A precious shower of divine influence has falled upon the congregation who still worship there. On the 9th ult., 110 new members were received, who have given pleasing evidence of having passed from death unto life. Religious meetings have been held in five different sections of the congregation.

REVIVAL.—There has been a great revival in the First Baptist Church at Zansville, Ohio, in the course of which one hundred and forty-one persons have been baptized, and four restored to fellowship, making a total increase of one hundred and forty-five.

STARTLING INTELLIGENCE.—The London Times has the credit of publishing the earliest and most reliable intelligence. Here is an item from that paper which will amuse, if it does not alarm, American readers:—

"Already is the dissolution of the Union considered a probable occurrence, and it is hard to avoid concluding that, before five years more have elapsed, the United States of America must necessarily have been either resolved or expanded into some political society vastly different from that represented now. The final decision of this vital question will, in all probability, be sealed by the next Presidential election, for which all parties are preparing."

INTERESTING RELIC.—The Boston Whig publishes the following extract of a letter written by John Adams to his son John Quincy, while the latter was Secretary at Petersburgh, in the year 1782:

"Your studies, I doubt not, you pursue, because I know you to be a studious youth; but above all, preserve a sacred regard to your own honor and reputation. Your morals are worth all the sciences. Your conscience is the minister plenipotentiary of God Almighty in your breast. See to it that this minister never negotiates in vain. Attend to him, in opposition to all the courts in the world.

"So charges your affectionate Father,
"JOHN ADAMS."

SCHOOLHOUSES VS. ARSENALS.—At a school meeting recently held in Boston, Hon. Josiah Quincy thus beautifully contrasted the defenses of the cities of Boston and Paris:—

"The late King of the French, one of the most sagacious and astute sovereigns of the world, had caused to be expended forty millions of dollars for the defence of Paris, and had placed his batteries in such positions that their shots might reach every house in the city. Yet, at the first movement of the people he fled from his country with but a five-franc piece in his pocket. In a similar manner our own city had erected its batteries on every hill top, and designed also to throw a shot into every dwelling house. In this kind of defense, a defense of moral power, consisted the welfare of the race, and the permanence of political institutions."

THE MISSIONARY WORK.—The American Tract Society has recently published a volume of stirring "Thought on Missions," by Rev. Mr. Dibble, late a missionary to the Sandwich Islands. Speaking of the expectation of some persons that God will convert the heathen with a mere handful of men, and a fraction of the resources of the Church, he says:—

"Be assured, God loves the church too well thus to pamper a luxurious and self-indulgent spirit: he will allow no cheap and easy way of accomplishing the work. The object is worth more: worthy not only of the combined wealth of Christendom, but worthy also of the energies, the toil, and the blood if necessary, of the greatest and holiest men. It will not be in consistence with God's usual providence, that a victory so noble should be achieved, till the treasures of the church shall be literally emptied in the contest, and the precious blood of thousands and tens of thousands of her ablest and best men poured out on the field. The work has already cost the blood of God's only Son; and the prosecution and finishing of it shall be through toil, self-denial, entire devotement, and obedience even unto death."

DEATH OF NATHAN MORGAN.—Many of our readers know something about Bro. Nathan Morgan, of West Springfield, Mass., who embraced our views of the Sabbath several years ago. We are pained to learn that he is no more. The following account of the circumstances connected with his death, is taken from a letter we have just received from Mrs. Morgan, the bereaved widow:—

"As he was crossing the Connecticut river, on Tuesday, April 11th, in a ferry-boat, with two yoke of oxen, when nearly across the cattle started, and in his haste to stop them, he slipped into a scuttle-hole about four feet square and six feet deep, and received the whole heft of the fall upon his left side, which caused his death the third day after the injury. It was found, on a post-mortem examination, that five ribs were broken, the middle rib split, which pierced the lower part of the lung, and which no medical aid could have relieved even if the extent of the injury had been known. He had his reason, but it was difficult for him to converse, and his physicians objected to his conversing, as it would increase the inflammation, and be a great hindrance to his recovery, if that should be possible. May the bereaved and afflicted widow, and three fatherless children, be remembered in the prayers of the friends and acquaintances of my deceased husband. Should the Seventh-day Baptist friends feel disposed to call upon me, it would give me pleasure to see them."

COMMUNICATION WITH MISSIONARIES.—When the question of locating our Foreign Mission at Shanghai was under consideration, one advantage of that location was said to be the facilities for communicating with the missionaries. The importance of that consideration may be inferred from the following account, given by Mr. Lord, of the difficulty of obtaining letters and papers at Ningpo, where he is stationed. We copy from the Christian Chronicle:—

"You can hardly imagine how entirely we who inhabit the Celestial Empire are cut off from you outside barbarians. We seldom have opportunities to send letters to you; and as for getting letters from you, that is hardly to be thought of. Once a month, perhaps, there is an opportunity to send letters as far as Lukoney, an opium station some twenty-five or thirty miles from this place, where vessels passing up and down the coast sometimes stop. But after our letters reach this place, they may lie there a month or two before they are shipped for Hongkong. But the delay and uncertainty attending our letters to you is nothing, when compared with that of yours, (that is, if you ever send any,) to us. I supposed that letters and papers would follow us to China, at least, but a month or two behind. But I have now been in China nearly seven months, and not a scrap of a paper has reached us. A few straggling letters have come to hand after much delay. Were I at Hongkong, I should not be so far out of the world, nor should I, were I at Shanghai, some two hundred miles farther North, for these places have constant intercourse with the rest of the world. But Ningpo has but little or no foreign trade, and consequently but little foreign intercourse."

DELEGATE FROM FRANCE.—Rev. Mr. Bridell, an eloquent young preacher, who has just arrived in this City, as Delegate from the Paris Tract Society, stated in a recent address, that those few Protestants with whom he was associated, had now the fullest liberty for spreading the Scriptures and Evangelical Tracts among the 34,000,000 of Catholics in France; and he fervently invoked American Christians, at this crisis, greatly to transcend all their former benefactions to that country; though these, he said, were remembered with devout gratitude to Heaven. Superstition and ignorance, and general thirst for privileges, as yet but little understood in France, now earnestly implored the means of light and true knowledge.

TO THE FRIENDS OF LIBERTY THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES.

The undersigned, at a public meeting of citizens of Boston, held at Faneuil Hall on the 25th inst., in relation to the recent arrest at Washington of three men charged with assisting the escape of fugitive slaves, were authorized to collect money and employ counsel, for the purpose of defending those men, and of bringing before the Supreme Court of the United States, the question of the legality of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Our action in this matter can furnish no color of pretence to charge us with meddlesome interference. Whatever may be the case in the States, Slavery in the District of Columbia is a national affair—our affair. Over that District Congress possesses sole and exclusive jurisdiction. It is the citizens of the United States who are the jailors of these men.

We deny that the Constitution confers on Congress any power to establish or to maintain Slavery, in territory over which it possesses exclusive jurisdiction. This is a most important question, in reference not only to the District of Columbia, but to the territory about to be acquired from Mexico. We wish to bring it before the Supreme Court, and to have it presented there, along with some other closely-related questions, by the very ablest counsel. To do that, money is needed; and we call on you, friends of Liberty, to furnish it. Even pirates and murderers are entitled to counsel—how much more men, guilty only of an act of humanity, prisoners in the midst of a hostile community, surrounded by enemies thirsting for their blood! This call, we know, will not be in vain. We suggest the expediency of setting subscriptions on foot, in the principal towns. All remittances to our Treasurer, J. P. Blanchard, or to Samuel E. Sewall, 10 State-street, or Francis Jackson, 27 State-street, or to any member of the Committee, will be acknowledged through the public prints, and the expenditure duly accounted for. Editors friendly to Liberty are requested to give this a few insertions.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

We find but little to report in the proceedings of Congress last week. In the Senate, on Monday, Mr. Borland, of Ark., announced the death of his colleague, Hon. Chester Ashley. The same was announced to the House by a message from the Senate. Both Houses attended the funeral on Tuesday. On Wednesday, in the Senate, Mr. Butler of S. C. from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill in favor of facilitating the recovery of fugitive slaves, and imposing a penalty of $1,000 for aiding to rescue any slaves from the services of their owners. Mr. Butler also presented a report on the subject which was ordered to be printed. Mr. Hale of N. H. submitted a resolution, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report what legislation was necessary to protect colored citizens from non-slaveholding States in the enjoyment of their Constitutional rights, &c., which was adopted without debate. Mr. Underwood, of Ky., from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the Colonization Society. On the same day, in the House, Mr. McClelland, of Mich., from the Select Committee to which the subject had been referred, reported favorably on Whitney's Railroad proposing to connect Lake Michigan with the Pacific. The report was ordered to be printed. Besides the foregoing, the only subject of much interest was a bill, introduced by Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to enable the President to take military possession of Yucatan.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Britannia arrived at Boston on Sunday last, with seven days later intelligence from Europe.

In England and Ireland there has been no movement of special importance since last advices. The people of Ireland are said to be preparing for rebellion. There is also some uneasiness in Scotland. But it is not likely soon to amount to much.

In France there has been some commotion, which has happily subsided. It seems that at a sitting of the Provisional Goverment in Paris, M. Ledru Rollin, the ultra Communist, had some sharp words with M. Marrat, to whom he applied approbious epithets, which were repaid by a slap in the face. The other members interfered and prevented farther violence. On the following day, Sunday, at the summons of M. Ledrn Rollin, the revolutionaires met in the Champ de Mars to the number of 150,000, and afterwards directed their steps to the Hotel de Ville, to display their physical force for the intimidation of the Government. But the rappel was beat, and the National Guards and the Gaardes Mobile turned out under arms, by which the hostile demonstration was completely checked and peaceably dispersed. It is thought that this demonstration will strengthen immensely the power of the moderate members of the Provisional Government.

At Paris, the grand national festival to celebrate the fraternization of the army and the National Guards, took place as announced on the 20th, and was concluded by a grand military demonstration, the like of which has never before perhaps been witnessed. The whole of the force under arms, consisting of 330,000 National Guards and Gardes Mobiles, and 5,000 troops of the line, fell into line and marched round the Boulevards and through the city in military order, with drums beating and colors flying. The procession took eight hours in passing any given spot in the line of march.

The condition of Austria is the most stormy possible. Lombardy and Venice are irrecoverably lost. Hungary has already declared herself independent, and will soon dissolve all connection with Austria. Gallicia labors to the same end; and Bohemia makes unmeasured demands. Croatia, too, Liebenbürgen, Illyria, and even the Tyrol, now no longer true to the Emperor, speak a very decided language, and threaten a total separation at the least delay to grant their requirements.

There is an incendiary insurrection in the north of Saxony, which the Government has not been able to suppress.

Another battle has taken place in Schleswig, Holland, and the Germans had slightly the advantage.

In Hungary there is a strong movement to abolish the compulsory celibacy of the Romish Priesthood.

The Austrian Government has ordered the Jesuits to quit the Lintz to the satisfaction even of the Roman Catholics.

The King of Sardinia attacked Peschiera, a strong town held by the Austrians, on April 13, but did not carry it.

Verona has been taken by the Piedmontese army.

The King of Naples has been compelled to issue a proclamation in favor of the Italian Independence union.

A revolutionary demonstration has taken place in Egypt. The Pacha promised Reform and as soon as the people were quieted hanged the leaders.

RIGHTS OF MEN.—A Society has been formed in Paris, under the title of "La Societe pour l'application du Christianisme aux Questions Sociales," which is to embrace to following objects:

1. The application of the principles of Christianity to social questions.
2. The assertion of the rights of conscience and of private judgment in all cases in which they may require to be protested against the absorbent tendencies of the State.
3. The non-payment of ministers of religion by the State, as a primary application of the Christian principle.

SINGULAR FORGETFULNESS.—John Taylor, Esq. President of the Newark Banking and Insurance Company, came to this city on the 3d inst., and after making his exchanges, started on his return to Newark. Shortly after stepping on board the ferry-boat Arresseoh, he placed down on one of the seats a package tied in a silk hankerchief, containing bank notes and securities to the amount of about $49,000; and on arriving on the Jersey side, he walked ashore with the crowd, without the package of money. After walking a few steps he bethought himself of the package, and instantly returned to the boat for it, when, to his dismay, he discovered that it had disappeared. The package contained bills of the Newark Banking and Insurance Company of various denominations, from $500 down to $1, amounting to from $20,000 to $25,000. Also various checks and other securities, the payment of which has been stopped. A reward has been offered, and it is to be hoped that it has fallen into the hands of some one who may have honesty enough to return it, but of course that is doubtful. Mr. Taylor cannot be held responsible for the loss, as it occurred in the course of his regular duties as an officer of the Company. —

Twenty-seven thousand dollars of the money stolen from John Taylor, Esq., President of the Newark Banking Association and Insurance Company, has been recovered. Some of the money was offered for goods by a person who could not satisfactorily account for the possession of it. It was finally traced to a colored woman in Jersey City, who says it was left with her for safe keeping by a white man. The $27,000 was found concealed in a coal basket.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN IN NEW YORK.—The Legislature of New York has passed a law which makes an entire change in the social position of the married. The first section provides that the real and personal property of any female who may hereafter marry, and which she shall own at the time of marriage, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts, and shall continue her sole and separate property.

§ 2. The real and personal property, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, of any female now married, shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, but shall be her sole and separate property, as if she were a single female, except so far as the same may be liable for the debts of her husband heretofore contracted.

§ 3. It shall be lawful for any married female to receive by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, and hold to her sole and separate use, as if she were a single female, real and personal property, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and the same shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts.

§ 4. All contracts made between persons in contemplation of marriage, shall remain in full force after such marriage shall take place.

SUMMARY.

The Chancery order allowing 30 days for exception to the Master's report on the account of the Receivers of the Plainfield Bank will expire toward the close of this month. They will then be prepared to make a dividend, unless some exceptions are interposed. The Master reports, according to the State Gazette, that the Receivers have received, as proceeds of the assets of the Bank, $45,402 67, and have paid for costs, counsel fees, charges, and expenses, 2,218 97; leaving in their hands the sum of $43,183 79. There have been presented to them the bills of the Bank to the amount of $67,202 50; and other claims, including deposits, for $917 66, amounting in the whole to $68,120 16. The Master awards the Receivers, for their compensation, $3,600.

The Post-Office Department has decided that under the act of the 3d of March, 1847, allowing officers and soldiers of the Army in Mexico to receive their letters free, that officers and crews of vessels belonging to the Navy, and coöperating with the Army in the Gulf, may also receive their letters free. In order to insure their conveyance in the mails free, they should be directed to the vessel upon which the person is doing service, and containing as part of the direction, "Belonging to the Navy, and coöperating with the Army in Mexico."

A man named Hill, living in Westchester Co., threatened the life of another named Conklin, unless the latter would sign a bond to pay back to the former $3,000 of the sum recovered from him for a breach of promise of marriage to Conklin's sister. Mr. C. signed the bond, and then had Hill arrested, indicted, and bound over in the sum of $5,000.

An infamous attempt was made recently in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., to poison the family of Mr. Edward Beach. It was done by leaving candy at the kitchen door which had been wet and rolled in arsenic. A servant maid and one of the children ate a little of the candy, and were made very sick, but fortunately with no fatal result.

In New Orleans the Post-Office receipts in the quarter ending March 31st, 1843, were $21,115; in the quarter ending March 31st, 1847, the receipts were $27,083; increase nearly $6,000. This is one more glorious triumph of cheap postage.

A company of men, six in number, went to the house of a Mr. Thomas, in Downington, Chester County, Pa., on Tuesday and seized a colored girl in the employ of Mr. T. They gagged and forced her into a carriage, and drove off with their victim to the Maryland line. The circumstance has caused great excitement in the neighborhood.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copies sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

FORGET THEE! *

BY REV. JOHN MOULTRIE.

Forget thee! If to dream by night,
And muse on thee by day—
If all the worship, deep and wild,
A poet's heart can pay—
If prayers in absence, breathed for thee,
To Heaven's protecting power—
If winged thoughts that flit to thee
A thousand in an hour—
If busy fancy blending thee
With all my future lot—
If thou call'st "forgetting," thou
Indeed shalt be forgot.

Forget thee! Bid the forest birds
Forget their sweetest tune;
Forget thee! Bid the sea forget
To swell beneath the moon;
Bid the evening flower forget
To drink refreshing dew;
Thyself forget thine own dear land
And its mountains wild and blue;
Forget each old familiar face,
Each long-remembered spot—
When these things are forgot by thee,
Then shalt thou be forgot.

Keep if thou wilt thy maiden peace
Still calm and fancy free,
For God forbid thy gladsome heart
Should grow less glad for me;
Yet, while that heart is still unwon,
Oh! bid not mine to rove,
But let it nurse its humble faith
And uncomplaining love.
If these, preserved for patient years,
At last avail me not,
Forget me then! but ne'er believe
That thou canst be forgot!

INCORPORATION OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

AN ACT, for the incorporation of benevolent, charitable, scientific, and missionary societies.

Passed, April 12, 1848.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Any five or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of this State, who shall desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, scientific, or missionary purposes, may make, sign, and acknowledge before any officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds in this State, and file in the office of the Secretary of State, and also in the office of the Clerk of the County in which the business of such society is to be conducted, a certificate in writing, in which shall be stated the name or title by which such society shall be known in law, the particular business and objects of such society, the number of trustees, directors, or managers to manage the same, and the names of the trustees, directors, or managers of such society, for the first year of its existence, but such certificate shall not be filed unless by the written consent and approbation of one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the District in which the place of business or principal office of such company or association shall be located, to be endorsed on such certificate.

§ 2. Upon finding a certificate as aforesaid, the persons who shall have signed and acknowledged such certificate, and their associates and successors, shall thereupon, by virtue of this act, be a body politic and corporate by the name stated in such certificate, and by that name they and their successors shall and may have succession, and shall be persons in law capable of suing and being sued; and they and their successors may have and use a common seal, and the same may alter and change at pleasure, and they and their successors, by their corporate name, shall, in law, be capable of taking, receiving, purchasing, and holding real estate, for the purposes of their incorporation, and for no other purpose, to an amount not exceeding the sum of fifty thousand dollars in value, and estate, for like purposes, to an amount not exceeding the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars in value, but the clear annual income of such real and personal estate shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars; to make by-laws for the management of its affairs, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this State, or of the United States; to elect and appoint the officers and agents of such society, for the management of its business, and to allow them a suitable compensation.

§ 3. The society so incorporated may annually elect from its members its trustees, directors, or managers, at such time and place, and in such manner, as may be specified in its by-laws, who shall have the control and management of the affairs and funds of said society, a majority of whom shall be a quorum for the transaction of business; and whenever any vacancy shall happen among such trustees, directors, or managers, by death, resignation, or neglect to serve, such vacancy shall be filled in such manner as shall be provided by the by-laws of such society.

§ 4. In case it shall at any time happen that an election of trustees, directors, or managers shall not be made on the day designated by the by-laws, said society for that cause shall not be dissolved, but it shall and may be lawful on any other day to hold an election for trustees, directors, or managers, in such manner as may be directed by the by-laws of such society.

§ 5. The provisions of this act shall not extend or apply to any association or individuals who shall in the certificate filed with the Secretary of State, or with the County Clerk, use or specify a name or style the same as that of any previously-existing incorporated society in this State, nor shall they authorize the formation of any corporation which can be incorporated under the act entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of religious societies," passed April 5, 1813, and the several acts amending the same, or the formation of any secret societies.

§ 6. Any corporation formed under this act shall be capable of taking, holding, or receiving any property, real or personal, by virtue of any devise or bequest contained in any last will or testament of any person whatsoever, the clear annual income of which devise or bequest shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars, provided, no person leaving a wife or child or parent shall devise or bequeath to such institution or corporation more than one-fourth of his or her estate, after the payment of his or her debts, and such devise or bequest shall be valid to the extent of said one-fourth, and no such devise or bequest shall be valid in any will which shall not have been made and executed at least two months before the death of the testator.

§ 7. The trustees of any company or corporation organized under the provisions of this act, shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts due from said company or corporation contracted while they are trustees, provided said debts are payable within one year from the time they shall have been contracted, and provided a suit for the collection of the same shall be brought within one year after the debt shall become due and payable.

§ 8. All institutions formed under this act, together with their books and vouchers, shall be subject to the visitation and inspection of the justices of the Supreme Court, or by any person or persons who shall be appointed by the Supreme Court for that purpose, and it shall be the duty of the trustees, or a majority of them, in the month of December in each year, to make and file in the County Clerk's office where the original certificate is filed, a certificate under their hands, stating the names of the trustees and officers of such association or corporation, with an inventory of the property, effects and liabilities thereof, with an affidavit of the truth of such certificate and inventory, and also an affidavit that such association or corporation has not been engaged directly or indirectly in any other business than such as is set forth in the original certificate on file.

§ 9. Each corporation formed under this act shall possess the general powers conferred by, and be subject to the provisions and restrictions of the third title of the eighteenth chapter of the third part of the Revised Statutes.

§ 10. The Legislature may at any time amend, annul, or repeal any incorporation formed or created under this act.

THE LATE KING AND QUEEN OF PRUSSIA.

A household scene at Potsdam is not to be omitted. The king was accustomed to take his breakfast in the queen's apartments, however busy he might be, even if he had but a moment to take this meal, which generally was composed of fresh fruit or other simple viands. On one occasion, as he entered, he saw lying on her work table, a very pretty head-dress, which seemed to be quite new. He asked her, jestingly, the price of this pretty cap.

'It is not always right,' said the queen, also in a tone of pleasantry, 'that men should know the price of women's toilettes; they don't understand them, and they always find everything too dear.'

'Well, but you can tell me the price of this cap, and I should like to know it.'

'Oh! certainly I can. I bought it—a great bargain—I only gave four dollars for it.'

'Only! a horrible price for such a thing; what a large sum of money!'

Whilst he continued to run satirically on the subject, he was standing at the window, and an old veteran of the guard, an invalid, highly respected, passed by. The king beckoned him in, and as he entered the room, the king said, 'The lady who is sitting on that sofa has a great deal of money; now what ought she to pay for that little cap that lies on the table? You must not be dazzled by the beautiful pink ribbons, but say what you think it is worth.'

The old soldier, of course knowing nothing of such things, said, after shrugging up his shoulders and pausing to think, 'Why, I suppose it would cost some groschen (pence.')

'There, now,' said the king, 'do you hear that? Groschen, indeed! that thing cost four dollars. Now go and ask that pretty lady for four dollars, she can well afford to give you as much as she can afford to pay for that.' Smiling, the queen opened her purse, and presented the good old veteran with four dollars most cheerfully, kindly adding a few condescending words.

'And now,' continued the queen, with an arch look, still imitating the king's tone of merry satire; 'you see that noble gentleman standing at the window; he has much more money than I have. All I have I receive from him, and he gives very freely. Now, go to him and ask him for double what you have received of me; he can afford to give you eight dollars.'

The king laughed, acknowledged he was caught in his trap, gave the sum she had so playfully forced him to give through her extravagance, as he called it, and heartily wished the old invalid good luck with his present. The affair was, of course, repeated in the ante-chamber, and was received with peals of laughter. That veteran's name was Christian Brandes, who told this anecdote to Bishop Eylert himself. He also added, that when the king returned to Potsdam, after the death of the queen, he saw his royal master, who remembered his features perfectly, and making him a little present, said, with a countenance of sorrow, 'Brandes, dost thou remember?' and then turned quickly away.

THE FEJEE ISLANDS.

A recent number of the Sydney (N. S. Wales) Chronicle contains an interesting account of these islands, furnished by a person who has resided there during seventeen years, from which we gather the following particulars:—The group consists of upwards of fifty inhabited islands, the largest of which is Vananlever, about 350 miles in circumference, with a population of nearly 30,000. Vitelyu, the next in size, is about 300 miles in circumference, and contains from 20,000 to 30,000 inhabitants. The other islands are of various sizes down to 10 miles in circumference, with an average of from 80 to 100 persons to the square mile. The climate is extremely healthful, extremes of heat and cold never being felt, and beside the ordinary productions of the South Sea islands, coffee, sugar, and cotton are produced. European fruits have not been found to succeed well. Pigs are numerous; but there are few cattle. The basis of the islands is coral, and although there are mountainous regions, there is an abundance of level land for agricultural purposes, timber, &c. The principal articles of export are biche de mer, cocoa-nut oil, and tortoise-shell.

The Fejeans are an intelligent race, industrious, hospitable to strangers, but with a fondness for war and love of cannibalism, which prevent them from enjoying that degree of happiness which their beautiful and fruitful country would otherwise afford them. In the last expedition of the chief of the Bow, 15,000 fighting men were engaged. They have double canoes, some of them carrying 300 men. The dress of the islanders is composed of tapa, a cloth made of the inner bark of a tree, in the same manner as that worn by the other natives of the South Sea islands. Recently fire-arms are superseding the use of bows and arrows, clubs, &c., as weapons of war. The natives are heathens, but not idolaters, and have a numerous priesthood. The Wesleyan missionaries have, however, made some converts to Christianity among them.

The Government of the Fejees is an absolute monarchy. Next to the King is a class of Sovereign Chiefs, who are the heads of subordinate Districts or States, owing a sort of feudal allegiance to the Chief.

The European and American settlers are about sixty in number, and are for the most part married to native wives. They are chiefly engaged in ship-building, as pilots, traders, &c., and possess among them eleven small decked vessels, of from six to thirty tons burden. The Chiefs make no opposition to the European settlements, but readily allow to them land sufficient for a house and garden. The group abounds with harbors, and good anchorage.

HORSE BEEF.

In an early part of my practice, says a Worcester Physician, I was called into a neighboring town to visit a patient. It being the middle of the day, the old gentleman of the house (being over sixty years of age) invited me to stop and dine. While at dinner he says, "I don't know as you like my dinner." "Why, yes," said I, "I do; I like it very well; it is very good." "I guess," said he, "you don't know what you are eating." "Why, yes," said I, "it is some new corned beef." "Ah," said the old gentleman, "it is horse beef." I replied, "I don't believe it." "It is," said he, "I declare it is some of my old mare." I was not much acquainted with him at that time; I looked at him, supposing him to be joking, but could not discover a muscle of his face to alter or change. I had just taken another piece on my plate, and a mouthful of the second slice in my mouth, and in fact it was horse meat, sure enough; I could taste it as plainly as my olfactory nerves could discover the scent of an old horse. The more I chewed it, the more disagreeable it tasted. I continued picking and tasting a little sauce which I could swallow, but the meat, as the negro said, would no go, I at last gave a swallow, as I do with a dose of physic. I afterwards tasted a little sauce, but took care not to put any meat in my mouth, and kept time with the family. Glad was I when dinner was over. It being cool weather, the old gentleman went to smoking and telling stories. At last he says, "I won't leave you in the dark about your dinner. I told you we had horse meat for dinner, and so it was. I told you it was some of my old mare, and so it was, for I swapt her away for a steer, and that was some of the beef."

ON THE TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

Something has occurred which has brought me into conflict of mind; how far to restrain young persons in their pleasures, and how far to leave them at liberty. The longer I live, the more difficult do I see education to be, more particularly as it respects the religious restraints that we put upon our children; to do enough, and not too much, is a most delicate and important point. I begin seriously to doubt, whether, as it respects the peculiar scruples of Friends, it is not better quite to leave sober-minded young persons to judge for themselves. Then the question arises—when does this age arrive? I have such a fear that in so much mixing religion with those things which are not delectable, we may turn from the thing itself. I see, feel, and know, that where the scruples are adopted from principle, they bring a blessing with them; but where they are only adopted out of conformity to the views of others, I have very serious doubts whether they are not a stumbling-block.

THE POOR BISCUIT.—A plain-spoken, faithful pastor in the city of ——, N. Y., called by request, to take tea with one of his parishioners. At the table every thing bore the appearance of plenty and culinary skill. A blessing was invoked, the bell rang, and a servant appeared with the smoking biscuit, white as milk, and light as a honey-comb. The good lady, looking up with all the honesty which usually prompts such a course, said to her guest, I really hope, Mr. ——, you will excuse my biscuit this evening, they are so poor; I hoped I should have something nice, but they are hardly fit to eat,' at the same time extending towards him the dish containing the pride of her table. The good man took one, saying as he tasted it, with arch gravity, 'They might have been better, ma'am.' With a sudden motion the dish was withdrawn, and with a voice in full keeping with the language, she said, 'They are good enough for you!' Apologies often conceal, and are often employed to gratify, a similar vanity.

NAPOLEON'S PROPHECY.—During his imprisonment on St. Helena, Napoleon made to Las Casas the following prediction—part of which has already been fulfilled:—

"In less than 25 years from the present time, the whole European system will be changed. The French will cast the Bourbons and their debts off, as my Arabian steed would any stranger who would dare to mount him. Then, if my son be in existence, he will be seated on the throne amid the acclamations of the people; if he be not, France will go back to a republic; for no other hand will dare to seize a scepter which it cannot wield. The Orleans branch, though amiable, are too much like other Bourbons, and will share the same fate, if they do not choose to live as simple citizens under whatsoever changes take place. France once more a republic, other countries will follow her example—Germans, Prussians, Poles, Italians, Danes, Swedes, and Russians, will all join the crusades for liberty."

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.—In a late Treatise on the Fisheries of Newfoundland, by Patrick Morris, of St. Johns, N. F., it is stated that the French have 25,000 men engaged in the fisheries on the Banks, with 500 large vessels, and that they cure a million quintals of fish a year; the Americans 2,000 schooners of 30 to 120 tons, and 37,000 men. They cure a million and a half of quintals. The British cure a million of quintals, like the French, have 25,000 fishermen and sailors employed, 520 sealing ships from 100 to 180 tons, and 10,082 open boats.

COTTON.—In 1784, now only 64 years since, an American vessel, having eighty bales of cotton on board, was seized at Liverpool, on the plea that so large an amount of cotton could not have been produced in the United States. In 1785, the shipment amounted to 14 bales; in 1786, to 56 bales; in 1787, to 109; 1788, to 389; in 1789, to 842. In "Norman's New Orleans and Environs," we read the following anecdote: "An old Carolina planter, having gathered his crop of five acres, was so surprised and alarmed at the immense amount they yielded, that he exclaimed 'Well, well, I have done with cotton—here is enough to make stockings for all the people in America.' How many stockings would the crop of 1847 make, which will in all probability number about 2,250,000 bales.

THE SKULL OF ST. ANDREW STOLEN!—Some eccentric robber carried off out of St. Peter's church, Rome, (where it was kept under three strong locks,) the skull of St. Andrew, the Apostle, and the greatest excitement has since prevailed. A reward of $500 was offered in the Gazette by the Dean and Chapter of the Basilica, and it was found some days afterwards in a sack of corn down at the lower quay, (Ripa grande,) ready for sailing in a small schooner. The schooner was impounded and the crew imprisoned, but the real vagabond has not yet been got at. Several of the church attendants must have been cognizant of the abstraction; but the sailors and captain knew no more about the skull being in one of their corn bales than did Benjamin about the Egyptian silver cup, which he carried off in utter innocence 3,000 years ago.

PAUPERISM AND INTEMPERANCE.—The Marietta Intelligencer publishes some remarkable facts in relation to pauperism and intemperance. We give them below;

Liquor sellers (all of them foreigners)	9
Paupers in the poor-house	56
Intemperance cause of pauperism	54
Cost of intemperate paupers	$1,360
Cost of criminal trials of paupers	600
Cost of intemperance in paupers	$1,069

These facts show that two-thirds of the pauperism of Washington county arises from intemperence, and that each liquor-seller there costs the County Treasury $217! The property-holders pay a direct tax of $2,000 per annum, to support nine liquor-sellers!

WONDERFUL SAGACITY.—When the crowd of fashionables was greatest at an exhibition of animals, a girl, who had fed the elephant with sundry cakes and apples from her bag, drew out her ivory card case, which fell unobserved in the saw-dust of the ring. At the close of the ring performances, the crowd opened to let the elephant pass to his recess, but instead of proceeding as usual, he turned aside and thrust his trunk in the midst of a group of ladies and gentlemen, who, as might be expected, were so much alarmed that they scattered in every direction. The keeper at this moment discovered that the animal had something in his trunk. Upon examination he found it to be the young lady's card case, which the elephant had picked up, and was only seeking out the fair owner.

VARIETY.

The number of dead letters sent to Washington from the Post Offices of the United States, amounts to about two millions a year. They are carried in carts once a quarter to an open part of the city, and a bonfire made of them. Ten carts have been employed in removing the accumulations of a single day. The money found in these letters averages $60 a day. Often articles of jewelry are found in them. Among them recently was found a valuable pin, a pair of costly ear rings, and a daguerreotype miniature sent from Russia, to a person supposed to be deceased.

Echoes are produced by the reflexion of sounds. The distance which a person should be from a perpendicular wall or building in order to produce an echo with the voice, is about 62 1-2 feet If there are a number of perpendicular objects, at the suitable distance, the sound will be repeated many times. Near Milan there is a remarkable echo which repeats a sound thirty times, and at Port Kent, on Lake Champlain, there is also a beautiful echo.

A gentleman farmer of our acquaintance tells us, that for three years he has planted potatoes at three different periods, viz:—early in April, late in April, and in May. Every year the early potatoes have been sound and firm, the middle part unsound, and the late ruined. He says it is early planting which protects the potatoe against the epidemic. We recollect in a great many accounts of the rot, that the early potatoes were sound.

An apple has been produced near Ticonderoga, having neither core nor seeds, by the following method. The experiment is worth repeating, as it may lead to important results:—"The top of a young tree was bent over and covered with earth, which took root. The tree was then cut asunder, which stopped all connection with the natural root of the tree, and, by sprouts which sprung from the top portion of the body, a regular top was formed, which produces this fine fruit—a beautiful red, good sized, very pleasant table apple in the fall."

A new kind of machine, called an "idolater," is used in Leicester jail, for the employment of rogues and vagabonds committed to hard labor; and it is said to be much dreaded by them, as it accurately registers the amount of labor performed, and is susceptible of exact adaptation to the bodily strength of the person who works it.

The New Orleans Commercial Times says that Dr. Dickey of that city has an only child of three years old, whose constant habit is to make rhymes. The little fellow rattles them off so rapidly at times, as to prevent their being taken down. His ear for music is in keeping with his wonderful powers of rythm.

Since the 1st of March it is stated that silver plate to the value of fifty millions, has been coined into five-franc pieces in Paris.

Scotland, with only a population of about the same as the State of New York, circulated in 1846, three millions more letters than the whole United States.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25, and ending	Dec. 1
Second	" "	Dec. 15, "	March 22
Third	" "	April 5, "	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

☞ Few persons have any definite idea of the Overland Route to India. The following notes by Mr. Abbott of his journey from Alexandria to Aden, will help to form some correct notions of the way that route is traveled. We copy from the Macedonian.

NOTES ON THE OVERLAND ROUTE TO INDIA.

CITY OF ALEXANDRIA.

We had a fine voyage from Malta—having sailed from there on the morning of Oct. 1st, and anchored in the bay of Alexandria at noon, on the 6th. The land is so low around Alexandria that it cannot be seen till we are near the harbor. But some time previously we observed the wind-mills, lighthouse, Pompey's pillar, and Cleopatra's needle, rising as it were from the sea. "These wind-mills," says a writer in Egypt, "number two hundred, having eight vanes each, and as they are set in different ways, so as to move in opposite directions, when tossing their arms in the wind they look like a set of sea-monsters sprawling about on shore, striving to regain their native element." They are all employed in grinding wheat.

On landing we felt that we were beyond European civilization. Around the traveler as he steps on shore, crowd the half naked, miserable Arabs, each with his donkey, pressing up and bawling, at the highest pitch of his voice,—"Very good, master;" "Take my donkey, master." I made a way through the drove of donkeys with my cane, and got into a "van," (omnibus,) and was conveyed to a hotel in the "grand square" of the city. This great square is in the centre of the city, and has quite a European appearance. It is built of whitish limestone, and is the residence of foreign consuls and merchants.

"Alexandria was originally built in the form of a Madonian mantle, with its longer side to the sea. At one time it contained a population of half a million, of which half were slaves. It boasted of four thousand palaces, four thousand baths, four thousand theatres, twelve thousand shops for the sale of vegetables, and forty thousand tributary Jews. Its public libraries contained seven hundred thousand volumes of books. It was accidentally destroyed by fire during the war with the Romans in Cæsar's time. Ages of misrule under Saracens, and latterly under Turks, fell like a blight on every thing in Alexandria, as on every thing in Egypt; and not until the era of Mohammed Ali, the present tyrant, did the country show any symptoms of revival. Since the beginning of the present century, the population has increased from seven to seventy thousand. With its harbor and docks, it now presents the appearance of a thriving port."

My fellow passengers mounted their donkeys and scattered themselves over the site of the former city to see its ruins. They found "richly sculptured columns, cornices, and other portions of architecture richly ornamented." But the most interesting sights in Alexandria are Pompey's pillar and Cleopatra's needle. The former is a single shaft of granite, nine feet eight inches in diameter, and seventy three feet long, supposed to have been erected by Publius, the Prefect of Egypt, in honor of the Emperor Dioclesian. There are two of Cleopatra's needles—one prostrate, the other erect—one seventy, the other sixty five feet in length, and seven feet in diameter at the base.

I saw none of these wonders except from a distance, being an invalid and confined to the hotel till it was necessary to move. I saw enough of Alexandria, however, while passing through the city, to detect the poverty, oppression, and deep degradation of its inhabitants.

THE GREAT CANAL.

Just at dusk of evening the vans took all the passengers to the place of embarkation on the great canal, about two miles distant. Our baggage and the cargo of the ship had been forwarded previously on camels; several hundred tons were conveyed in this way from the Mediterranean to the canal in a few hours. Our road from the city to the canal leads through the Rosetta gate, and close to the elevation on which Pompey's pillar stands. Not far to the left is the battle-field where Sir Ralph Abercromy fell. We embarked on the canal in two small steamers, our baggage being a large boat, (something like our canal boats,) towed by one of the steamers. This canal connects Alexandria with the western branch of the Nile, is ninety feet wide and eighteen feet deep, and forty-eight miles in length. It was built in 1820, and it is said that in its construction were employed one hundred and fifty thousand persons. The inhabitants of all the villages of lower Egypt were marched down under the soldiery to the stations assigned them, with a small pittance given to each to support his wants. The assemblage of so large a multitude produced a scarcity of food, and twenty thousand perished from excessive labor and starvation. Two thirds of them, it is said, were without tools or clothes of any kind, shoveling up the mud with their hands.

THE NILE.

Our steamers got under way about ten o'clock, P. M., and at six the next morning we reached the Nile—the "eternal river, the river of Egypt, recalling the days of Pharaoh and Moses." Where we entered, it is perhaps a mile wide; its banks on each side are clothed with beautiful verdure and bear groves of palm trees. But its small villages indicate extreme poverty, degradation, and misery. Karen houses are palaces, and the Karens live like princes, in comparison.

On entering the Nile we embarked on two other small steamers, and got under way for Cairo at 7 o'clock, A. M. The distance from the entrance of the canal to Cairo is a hundred and forty miles. The voyage up the Nile occupied about thirty hours, and it was to me intensely interesting.

Some distance below Cairo, the pacha is building across the river a dam of solid masonry. The stones are all brought down from upper Egypt in small boats, and the whole work is superintended by French engineers. Thirty thousand people are constantly employed, "toiling under the bastinado," and receiving a monthly pittance scarcely sufficient to support life. We saw half naked women carrying stones and mortar on their heads, tottering under their burden as if they would sink to the earth. But in their midst are the armed soldier and the more fearful bastinado, and they labor on till they sink in death. From one hundred and fifty to two hundred perish in a week. The object of this structure is to raise the waters of the river some three feet, and send it off in different directions on a higher level, to irrigate large tracts of uncultivated land, and in the end to add to the pacha's income.

On the east of the Nile, from the canal to Cairo, is the delta—an extensive tract of low, rich land, well watered and cultivated; on the west is a narrow strip of the same kind, and then comes the great desert, stretching away to the west 2,000 miles to the Atlantic ocean.

CAIRO.

Long before we reached Cairo we came within sight of one of the "world's great wonders," the "eternal monuments," standing in solitary and gloomy grandeur. On entering the city of the Pharaohs and the Caliphs at the head of the delta on the borders of the great southern desert, the traveler will see many "curious and striking spectacles." In the words of an American writer, "he will see streaming from the gate among loaded camels and dromedaries, the dashing Turk with his glittering sabre, the wily Greek, the grave Armenian, and the despised Jew—with their long silk robes and turbans, their solemn beards, and various and striking costumes; he will see the harem of more than one rich Turk, eight or ten women, on horseback, completely enveloped in large black silk wrappers, perfectly hiding face and person, and preceded by the abomination of the east, a black eunuch; the miserable santon—the Arab saint with a few scanty rags on his breast and shoulders, and the rest of his body perfectly naked; the swarthy Bedouin of the desert; the haughty Janezary, with a cocked gun in his hand, dashing furiously through the crowd, and perhaps bearing some bloody mandate of his master; and perhaps he will see and blush for his own image in the person of some beggarly Italian refugee." On landing from the steamer we dashed through such motley groups, in the omnibus of the Transit Company, and reached the "English Hotel," at 12 o'clock—forty hours from Alexandria.

PREPARATION TO CROSS THE DESERT.

As no time was to be lost by those travelers going over the desert, application was immediately made at the "transit office" for seats in the van. The van is simply a large box on two wheels, with two pair of shafts for two wheel horses, and each van carries six persons. We consequently divided ourselves into parties. We learned that four of the vans would start at 6, and four at 10 P. M., four at 2, and four at 6 A. M., and so on till all the travelers were sent on their way. In our party were two ladies and four gentlemen. We appointed one of our number to secure for us seats in the van which would be last to start the next morning. He represented that he had a gentleman in his party who was an invalid (meaning myself) who had no rest for the two preceding nights, owing to the crowded state of the steamer, and requested for him a night's rest—which was readily granted. So we had the prospect of a night of quiet rest before encountering the desert. During the afternoon some of our party procured a carriage and invited me to take a ride with them to the pacha's garden. After a pleasant drive of a mile we walked into one of the most extensive and elaborately cultivated and beautiful gardens I ever beheld. But I had not been there more than an hour when I saw my mistake in forgetting that I had been subject to a fever daily since leaving London. I ordered the carriage to drive me back to the hotel, and till near twelve o'clock at night my fever was violent. I thought of the next day's journey through the desert, eighty-five miles to Suez, and from what I had heard of the roughness of the way, the weakness and soreness of my right side, that would bear no jolting, led me to begin to say, "I shall not live to get over that desert." But I rested quietly from 12 to 6 o'clock, A. M.

THE DEPARTURE.

At 8 o'clock we entered our van, having three others in company, and four horses attached to each van. We dashed through the city at full gallop, and passed into the desert, which rises gradually for some four or five miles, after leaving the valley, one barren, fearful waste, without a green or living thing to relieve the eye. In the distance, mountains, throwing up their black summits, appeared as though they had yesterday emerged from volcanic fires.

ABSORBING SCENES.

During the first ten miles were spread out before us the most enchanting and bewildering prospects that I ever beheld. I recollected of having a few times in my life looked upon scenes "that filled the mind with beauty." Once, while standing on the top of the highest pagoda, on a hill near Maulmain; and again on Mount Auburn, overlooking Cincinnati and the valley of the Ohio, and in the rural scenery of England. I recollected the sublime emotions produced by the towering mountains in Southern Africa, and of the terrible agitation occasioned by "the roar of dread Niagara." But the scene from the desert hills east of Cairo was adapted to awaken all these emotions at once. Before us, stretching away to the north a hundred and fifty miles to the Mediterranean, lay the valley of the Nile, in all its surpassing loveliness—and that majestic river itself, "which the Egyptians worshiped and the Arabs love, recalling the days of Pharaoh and Moses." Turning the eye to the west and south, the great Lybian desert awakened a sense of desolation. Farther to the south the eye rested on "the Cairo of the Caliphs, the superb town, the holy city, the delight of imaginations, greatest among the great—whose splendor and opulence made the prophet smile." The dómes of its palaces glittered in the sun, and its mosques pointed their "four hundred minarets" in solemn mockery to the skies. Beyond the narrow valley were the pyramids, and on the south and east a boundless and eternal bed of sand. Beneath our feet, but a few miles distant to the north east of Cairo, lay in quiet beauty "the land of Goshen." Thousands of years seemed to pass through the mind in a moment, with visions to absorb the soul. But all passed away. Scene after scene vanished as we hastened on, till the pyramids only remained in desolate majesty. These were fifteen miles distant, yet they seemed almost within our reach. Finally the pyramids disappeared, and we began to feel that we were in the mighty desert.

CROSSING THE DESERT.

The body of our van rested on good steel springs, and the road was quite smooth, so that, lost in the scenery and the thoughts which it awakened, I forgot my infirmities. Station houses were erected five miles distant from each other from Cairo to Suez, at each of which we had a relay of horses. Every van had its driver and whipper, and the speed of the horses was a gallop, nearly all the way. Where the sand was deep, one of the horses at least in some one of the four vans would balk; and as all were ordered to keep together, the drivers and whippers of the other three would join with those of the balky team, to whip the poor beast into a disposition to "go ahead." The road has been greatly improved within a year, so that one of our stage coaches might be driven with safety all the way from Cairo to Suez.

FIRST SIGHT OF THE RED SEA.

At 9 o'clock in the morning we had the first glimpse at the Red Sea. We had observed a range of mountains on our right running east and west, and now we saw that it ran quite into the sea, so that there could be no passing down on the right shore. At half past nine we were near the spot at which the children of Israel were hemmed in by the mountains and sea, and where Moses said, "Stand still, and see the salvation of God." I am aware that it is a disputed point whether the passage of the Israelites was made north of these mountains or in a valley to the south of them. But I have no doubt they crossed from the small bay a mile or two south of Suez, having the range of mountains on the right; and we must have passed over the spot were the Egyptian hosts, "with all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, his horsemen and his army encamped, by the sea beside Pihahiroth, before Baal zephon;" and where the tribes of Israel in mad dispair asked Moses, "Are there no graves in Egypt?" I opened my Bible, read the account given of the passage of the Red Sea, and looked out upon the arid waste. All was silent as the house of death; and the burning plain was sending up its lurid glare and consuming heat as a fiery furnace. But my musings were soon interrupted, for the ground descending, our drivers whipped their horses into a quick run, and in a few minutes we were in Suez—twenty-six hours from Cairo.

SUEZ AND THE BENTINCK.

We found Suez to be a miserable, poverty-stricken, fishing village—with but one building fit for any other use than a stable. The pacha has erected a good hotel for the accommodation of "overland travelers." The steamer that was to take us to Calcutta was lying at anchor about two miles below. Our baggage and the freight of the ship had been previously forwarded across the desert on camels; it was said that one thousand were required to do it. The passengers who had preceded us were on board, and we had no time to lose. We immediately got into our Arab boat, and in an hour all were on board the "Bentinck." A hundred and twenty passengers, among whom were a good many ladies having young children and infants, had crossed the desert and were well pleased with the route. God had been better to me than my fears, and I was evidently better than when I landed in Alexandria. In fact, I left the fever, arising from chronic inflammation of the lungs, on the desert.

RED SEA AND ADEN.

Fairly afloat on the Red Sea, there is little to attract the eye—the shores being rocky, sandy, and lifeless. We did hope to get a glimpse of the summits of Mount Sinai, but were at too great distance from them, being near the western shore. We found the heat, going down the sea, most oppressive, more so than ever I experienced in India. Being in rather a weak state, I was, perhaps the more sensible to its influence. We were five days in reaching the southern point of the sea, and having passed the straits of Babelmandel, anchored at Aden at 12 o'clock, M., on the morning of the 16th Oct.—six days from Suez.

Aden is a wild, barren peninsula, composed of volcanic rocks, joined to the Arabian main land by a narrow isthmus of sand, and is of no use except as a half-way house to India, via the Red Sea. It fell into the hands of the English in 1838, having previously belonged to one of the sultans of Arabia, Felix, who, it was said, had plundered a vessel sailing under British colors, which had the misfortune to go ashore. England wanted Aden. It contains but few thousands of inhabitants, and is garrisoned by a regiment of native soldiers from India.

We sailed from Aden on the 17th, at 12 M., the ship during our stay having taken in five hundred tons of coal. We soon lost sight of the mountains of Arabia, caught a glimpse of the high lands of Guardafui on the eastern point of Africa, and the western world faded from our view forever.

PERSEVERANCE.

From an Irish Paper.

There is a word of strength and cheer,
That all great works of man's creation—
The ship, the book, the code, the year,
Machine and poem, town and nation—
Pronounce with emphasis to man,
Whene'er he'd shrink from long adherence
To thoughtful work and settled plan:
That glorious word is Perseverance!

It hails us in the crowded street—
'Tis writ on flag-way, shop, and market—
The factory's wheels that word repeat,
And from the steam-urged vessel—hark it!
'Tis murmured in the shuttle's hum,
And through the gathering woofs appearance,
Behold! the mystic letters come!
A radiant wonder, Perseverance!

Hail to that word! Oh, far beyond
A people's million-mouth defiance,
The power it wields—a magic wand—
Infuses hope and self reliance.
'Work on,' it saith, 'reviled to-day,
Thy work, if good, will show a year hence;
To shallow aims give present pay,
But great ends ask for Perseverance!'

Take heart, then, friends, though long our march,
Beset with perils, toils and trouble,
Be sure the proud triumphal arch
Will terminate a course so noble!
Make faith your staff, and truth your guide;
Oh cherish every friend of Erin's;
Fling fear and foreign help aside,
And trust yourselves and Perseverance.

HOLY WATER AND PAGANISM.

The following article, from Ewbank's Hydraulics, will show the origin of holy water, as used in the Roman Catholic churches:—

"Most readers are aware that holy water was derived from that of the heathen. When a worshiper was about to enter the temple, he sprinkled himself from a vase of it placed near the entrance. On some particular occasions, the people were sprinkled by priests. Those who celebrated the Eleusinian mysteries were particularly required to wash their hands in holy water. In the middle ages the liquid was a source of considerable profit to monks, and it was even a custom for clerks and scholars to hawk it for sale. From Heron's description, we learn that heathen priests also made it a source of revenue; the vessels containing lustral water not being always open for public use, free of charge, but closed, and like a child's money-box, provided with a slit at the top, through which a certain sum was to be put before the donor could receive any of the purifying contents. Five drachmæ, or about seventy-five cents, were usually required, and from the construction of the apparatus, no less sum could procure a drop, although as much more might be put in as the donor thought proper. The device is a very neat specimen of religious ingenuity, and the more so since it required no attending minister to keep it in play. We may judge of other apparatus belonging to the old temples, by the talent displayed in this. Near one side is seen a cylindrical vessel. It is this only that contained water. A small tube attached to the bottom is continued through the side of the vase where the liquid was discharged. The inner orifice of the tube was formed into the seat of a valve, the plug of which was fixed on the lower end of the perpendicular rod, whose upper end was connected by a bolt to the horizontal lever or vibrating beam; one end of which was spread out into a flat dish, and so arranged as to receive on its surface every thing dropped through the slit. The lever turns on a pin or fulcrum, very much like a pump-handle. The operation will now be understood. As the weight of the rod kept the valve closed while nothing rested upon the broad end of the lever, so no liquid could escape; but if a number of coins of sufficient weight were dropped through the slit upon the end of the lever, the valve would then be opened and a portion of liquid escape—the quantity flowing out would, however, be very small, not only from the contracted bore of the tube, but from the fact that the valve would be open only a moment; for, as the lever became inclined from its horizontal position, the pieces of money would slide off into the mass accumulated below, and the efflux would as quickly be stopped; the apparatus would then be ready to supply the next customer on the same terms. This certainly was as simple and ingenious a mode of dealing out liquids as it was a profitable one, and after all was not half so demoralizing as the retailing of ardent spirits in modern times."

THE BIRDS.

The following very interesting incident occurred a few years ago in one of the villages of Connecticut. A young lady, confined to the house by protracted indisposition, was in the habit of feeding a sparrow, which had a nest on a tree near the door, with crumbs of bread. The little creature had a warm heart under her homely dress, and soon learned to love her patron, became exceedingly tame, and would hop about the table while the family were at meals. This was repeated whenever the door was open, till at last her mate was induced to accompany her, and both would pick up the scraps which their fair entertainer, as she lay upon the sofa, scattered near her on the carpet. In the fall one of them flew against the window and tried to get in, but the lady was too feeble to expose herself to the air, and so could not admit her little visitor to a farewell interview. Next spring they both came again as docile as ever. In the course of a few weeks, as the lady lay, upon a Sunday morning, being too unwell to go to church, the house perfectly still and the door open, she heard a great twittering and chirping on the steps. Looking about for the cause, she espied her tame sparrow entering the apartment, followed by several of her progeny, and the partner of her toils bringing up the rear. They all remained with her half an hour, perfectly fearless and at home, till having satisfied their appetites with the morsels which were strewn for them, and expressed their admiration with sweet wild music, they retired to the shrubbery.

DYING GLADLY.

Behold here the secret of dying! "These all died in faith." Bad men die reluctantly; life is extorted from them as if by main force. The believer dies willingly; his will is sweetly submitted to his Father's will; he makes it a religious act to die. Just as Jesus himself commended his human soul to his Father, saying, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," Luke 22: 46; so his believing disciple commends his soul to Jesus, and through him to the Father. Here, I repeat, is the secret how to die happily. To those who know not the secret, it is a fearful thing to die. It is a serious matter for any. But to the worldly-minded and ungodly, if not past feeling, to die must be, as one of the heathen philosophers (Aristotle) confessed it, "of all formidable things the most formidable." Only mention a neighbor's death in a gay circle, lo! you have thrown a gloom over the whole assembly; all are evidently sorry that the topic was introduced. The ancient Romans would not mention death in plain words, if they could avoid it, but only by circumlocution and implication. The heathens, at this day, in like manner, "shun all conversation on death, as most repugnant to their feelings;" I quote the words of an eye-witness:—"They account it the height of cruelty to speak of the probability of a sick person's death, even to his relatives." Even serious Christians are often in bondage through fear of death. It is such a venture; a mistake may be so fatal; to go before God is so awful; judgment will bring to light such secrets; that many think, How can I die? Yet you all must. Be persuaded, give your soul to Jesus now; do it again from day to day; and then, when your dying day is come, again approach the Saviour, and say, "Lord, I hear thee calling for my spirit; I see the wagons sent to fetch me home to thee; in the hand of death I recognize thy hand of love; thou askest for my soul; take it, for it is thine. Do with it what thou wilt, I have given it to thee to be washed in thy blood, and sanctified by thy Spirit; I am sure thou wilt do it no harm!"

Does a thought here arise, And what shall become of my poor body? Why, even if, like Stephen's, it was battered and bruised with stones murderously hurled; even though it were burning at a stake, or tortured on a rack, you need not mind; look but that the soul be safe; and then, whatever may become of the body, Jesus will take care of thy dust and ashes. The remains of his faithful servants are to him the most precious parts of this material earth. They form a pledge of his final coming. For if your souls are truly his, he will hereafter raise up your bodies glorious, incorruptible, immortal, like unto his own. Phil. 3: 21.

[Hambleton.

UNEXPECTED GUESTS.

When the detachment of the British army, sent out to destroy Mr. Madison's house, entered his dining-parlor, they found a dinner table spread, and covers laid for forty guests. Several kinds of wine, in handsome cut-glass decanters, were cooling on the side-board; plate-holders stood by the fire-place, filled with dishes and plates; knives, forks, and spoons were arranged for immediate use; everything, in short, was ready for the entertainment of a ceremonious party. Such were the arrangements in the dining-room, whilst, in the kitchen, were others answerable to them in every respect. Spits loaded with joints of various sorts turned before the fire; pots, saucepans, and other culinary utensils, stood upon the grate; and all other requisites for an elegant and substantial repast were in the exact state which indicated that they had been lately and precipitately abandoned. The reader may easily believe that these preparations were beheld by a party of hungry soldiers with no indifferent eye. An elegant dinner, even though considered considerably overdressed, was a luxury to which few of them, at least for some time back, had been accustomed; and which, after the dangers and fatigues of the day, appeared peculiarly inviting. They sat down to it, therefore, not, indeed, in the most orderly manner, but with countenances which would not have disgraced a party of aldermen at a civic feast; and, having satisfied their appetites with fewer complaints than would have probably escaped their rival gourmands, and partaken pretty freely of the wines, they finished by setting fire to the house which had so liberally entertained them.

THE MINISTRY OF THE AGE.

No preceding generation of ministers ever saw such a day as this! Such openings for usefulness; such calls for exertion; such multiplied and extensive fields whitening to harvest; such abundant and potent means for doing good to mankind. To live now is a talent put into your hands for which you must give an account. Have you an ardor of piety, a tone of moral sentiment, a spirit of enterprise, corresponding with this day? If not, give yourself no rest till you in some good measure attain them all. If an ancient heathen rhetorician, in giving directions for the attainment of the "sublime" in writing, could say,—"Spare no labor to educate your soul to grandeur, and to impregnate it with great and generous ideas;" much more may the same language be addressed to the gospel minister, in the present state of the Church's progress. Take unceasing pains to get large views of ministerial furniture, ministerial duty, and ministerial success. Strive to educate your souls to grandeur of conception, and grandeur of wishes, and hopes and enterprise, for the moral benefit of your fellow men. Aim high. Let no petty plans satisfy you, either as to acquirement or exertion. Every one of you, however humble your talents, if really disposed to make the most of what God has given you, might cause your influence to be felt to the ends of the earth.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 18, 1848.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

In New York, the second week of May is regularly devoted to the Anniversaries of the principal benevolent and reformatory societies of the country, and on that account is called Anniversary Week. This year the gathering was about as extensive as usual, and the meetings generally we should think quite as interesting. Most of the societies announce an increase of receipts, and nearly all of them speak encouragingly of their future prospects. Presuming that our readers would be interested and profited by knowing what their neighbors are doing, we give below the statistics of the principal societies.

American Seamen's Friend Society.

The Twentieth Anniversary of this Society was held at the Broadway Tabernacle on the evening of second-day, May 8. From the Annual Report, read by one of the Secretaries, it appears that the receipts of the Society for the year ending May 1, 1848, were $24,007, and that the expenditures for the same period were $23,793, being an excess over the last year of $6,492. This is exclusive of a large amount which has passed through the Treasuries of Auxiliary and Branch Societies. In addition to the Chaplains and Sailor Missionaries previously employed, the Society has, during the year, commissioned seven Chaplains or Missionaries on important stations, being located in China, France, the West Indies, Chili, and the Sandwich Islands. The Society in the meantime has acted in harmonious concert with Auxiliary Societies devoted to the same cause. Temperance Boarding-houses and Sailors' Homes have been constantly increasing, and with the very best results, which may be seen in the great improvement of the condition of sailors generally, in their more temperate habits, in their greater self-respect and more manly bearing; in the increased and increasing amounts deposited by them in Savings Banks, in their reluctance to board in houses or engage on vessels where spirituous liquors are used, in the greater regard of ship-masters and owners for the physical comfort of seamen, and in the softening down of the usually severe discipline on ship-board from iron rule to paternal regard. The Temperance Boarding-house in this city owned by the Society, has ceased to be a burden to the Society, having sustained itself during the past year, with the exception of a trifling sum for repairs, &c. During the year ending May 1, 3,663 sailors have been entertained at that establishment, and during the last six years 21,919. The reading of the Report was followed with speeches by Rev. Henry Chase of the Mariner's Church in New York, John Thompson, Esq., of Poughkeepsie, and Dr. Bethune of Philadelphia.

American Anti-Slavery Society.

This Society held its Fourteenth Anniversary at the Tabernacle on third-day morning. Wm. Lloyd Garrison called the meeting to order, prayer was offered by Theodore Parker, and selections from Scripture were read by Samuel J. May. The Treasurer's Report was read by Francis Jackson, showing that the Society had received and expended about $9,000 during the year. Rev. Theodore Parker then addressed the meeting, setting forth in an earnest manner certain signs of the times which he regarded as very favorable to the anti-slavery cause. He was followed by Lucretia Mott and Wendell Phillips, the latter holding the audience spellbound for an hour and a half upon a resolution which affirmed in substance that the only exodus of the slave out of bondage must be over the ruins of the present Church and Constitution. Frederick Douglass made the concluding address, which was listened to with attention, and frequently interrupted by bursts of applause. Just as he concluded, and at the point of adjournment, the Hutchinson Family surprised the audience by rising in the gallery and singing an animated song.

Besides the meeting at the Tabernacle, this Society held several sessions at the Minerva Rooms, at which there was an interesting discussion relative to the recent attempt of seventy-seven slaves to escape from the District of Columbia—an attempt in which they have the cordial sympathy of this Society.

American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

This Society held its Annual Meeting at the Tabernacle in the afternoon of third-day, Arthur Tappan presiding. After reading the Annual Report, Lewis Tappan presented a series of resolutions, expressing gratitude to God for the progress of the anti-slavery cause during the past year—urging every disciple of Christ to employ his resources for the extermination of slavery—asserting the duty of the American Bible Society to see that every slave in this country who can read is supplied with a copy of the Scriptures—encouraging the efforts of the colored people to engage in agricultural pursuits, and establish educational societies—denouncing the Mexican war—expressing joy at the progress of freedom abroad—and approving the principles of the Liberty Party. After the resolutions were read, addresses were delivered by H. B. Stanton, Dr. Vionis of Paris, and Hon. John P. Hale.

On fourth-day morning, this Society had a public breakfast, at which between three and four hundred persons were present, who did justice to the "creature comforts" provided, and listened eagerly to speeches appropriate to the occasion.

Female Moral Reform and Guardian Society.

The Fourteenth Anniversary of this Society was held in the evening of third-day. The Annual Report stated that the Institution known as the "House of Industry and Home for the Friendless," has grown legitimately out of the labors of this Association. During the past year a house has been leased and opened as a temporary home for respectable adults seeking employment, and friendless children, either orphans, half orphans, or abandoned by their parents. The number of applicants received from July 1 to May 1, ten months inclusive, has been 605; of this number, 334 have been adults, and 271 children. More than 200 of the latter have been placed in Christian families by adoption or otherwise. The average number at the Institution has varied from 30 to 75. One hundred and ninety-seven boxes, barrels, &c., containing various useful articles of clothing, provision, bedding, &c., have been received. Also numerous liberal contributions toward the building fund, varying from $100 to $500.

The whole amount of funds contributed toward the enterprise to May 1, 1848, is $11,704 24. Received otherwise than by donations $594 34. Of this sum $5,627 65 have been expended, by advice of the Reference Committee, toward the purchase of building lots, &c., and defraying the current expenses, leaving $6,676 93 toward the erection of the building, now chiefly in Bank, subject to the order of the Building Committee. To complete the edifice projected, and meet the current expenses for the ensuing year, from $6,000 to $8,000 will need to be raised, exclusive of pledges yet to be redeemed. For the collection of this sum, the managers rely upon the continued aid of a benevolent public. The reading of the Report was followed by addresses from Rev. Messrs. Patton of Hartford, Ct., and Spencer of Westmoreland, N. Y.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions held its 11th Anniversary on third-day, at which addresses were delivered by Rev. Drs. McCarty of Goshen and Murray of Elizabethtown, and Rev. Hugh A. Brown, missionary to China.

The abstract of the Annual Report, read by Rev. Mr. Lowrie, showed the receipts of the Board for the past year to be $108,586 38; the expenditures $109,183 66—making a balance against the treasury of $400. According to the abstract, the number of missions is 16, in 6 fields of labor, viz: American, Indian, Western Africa, North India, Siam, China, Papal Europe, and the Jews, having 22 stations, employing 101 missionaries and other persons, exclusive of native laborers. The number of missionaries sent out the last year was 12—5 of whom were females. Of the funds expended by the Board for the support of the American Indian missions, more than half had been refunded. Two beloved missionaries were reported to have died the past year at the China missions. Never was there more interest in the Church throughout the land in this enterprise.

The chief feature of interest at this meeting was the address of Rev. Mr. Brown, who has recently returned from China. We wished, he said, to know the signs that God was collecting together a chosen people out of the millions of China, and he thence proceeded to draw the contrast between the present time—employing 100 laborers, (60 male and 40 female,) at the different stations in that country—and the time past, or 40 years ago, when only one missionary was established there. More than one-third of the number at present there, arrived the last year. Concharcon, a city of 600,000 inhabitants, was six months ago for the first time occupied. One sign of the advancement in favor of missionaries in China, is the fast-increasing liberty that is allowed them, particularly in Canton. Another is the influence that is beginning to be had over the females. Flourishing native female schools are multiplying under the charge of missionary teachers.

American Tract Society.

This Society held its 23d Annual Meeting at the Tabernacle on fourth-day. After the usual introductory exercises, the Treasurer's Report and the Annual Report were read, and speeches were made by G. D. Husbands, Esq., of Rochester, N. Y., Rev. Wm. Passavant, of Pittsburg, burg, Pa., Rev. Mark Hopkins, President of Williams College, and several others. The following is a summary of the results of the year, as gathered from the Annual Report:—

New publications 63, of which 19 are volumes, making the whole number 4,313, of which 231 are volumes; sanctioned for publication abroad, 2,303, in about 100 languages and dialects. Circulated 693,303 volumes, 6,887,262 publications, 211,730,285 pages; 22 years, 4,063,928 volumes, 96,949,992 publications, 2,035,001,325 pages. Christian Almanac, 128,000; American Messenger, upward of 100,000 monthly. Gratuitous distribution, in 5,172 district grants, for foreign missionaries, the army and navy, seamen's chaplains, shipping, lakes, rivers, canals, home and domestic missionaries, Sabbath-schools, etc., including Tracts drawn by Life Members, 40,948,459 pages, value, twenty-seven thousand dollars. Receipts, $237,296 04; of which $129,744 31 for sales, and $105,905 15 donations, including $32,912 76 for Colportage, and $12,804 88 legacies. Expenditures for paper, printing, binding, engraving, and copyright, $143,699 32; for presses and machinery, $6,741 70; remitted in cash for foreign lands, $11,000; expended for Colportage, (exclusive of grants of publications to the value of $16,622 40,) $50,559; total expenditure, $237,255 95. Balance in the treasury, $140 09. Due for printing paper, payable within four months, $16,894 97.

The American Home Missionary Society held its Annual Meeting at the Tabernacle on fourth-day evening. The Treasurer reported the receipt of $140,479 during the year, being about $15,000 more than in any previous year. The total liabilities of the year were stated to be $148,768. There has been an increase of 34 missionaries, of whom 28 are in the Western States, Sunday-school scholars 5,000, temperance members 2,000. The Report of the Executive Committee recommends an increase of missionary labors in the West. It set forth in strong language the vast and growing importance of the Mississippi Valley, and the earnest necessity of additional labor to counteract the evil tendency of annexation and conquest. The report also alluded to the emergency occasioned by the distracted state of affairs in Europe, and the consequent crowding of immigrants to our shores; and concluded with a confidence in the Power which upholds our country in the fulfillment of her great destiny. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Leonard Bacon, Rev. P. Dwight, John Thompson, Esq., and Rev. Mr. King, of Dublin, Ireland.

Foreign Evangelical Society.

The Anniversary of this Society was held at Dr. Potts' Church, University-place, Rev. Dr. De Witt in the Chair. From the Treasurer's Report it appeared that the receipts of the year were $14,855, of which $11,346 were appropriated to Europe; $1,535 to Canada; $1,325 to Spanish America; $300 to St. Domingo, and $4,576 to expenses, salaries and rent, leaving a balance on hand of $498. The report of the Society's proceedings was read by Dr. Baird, and gave great encouragement in respect of the progress made in the work of the Society.

American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.

This Society held its Anniversary on fourth-day evening. The Secretary read an abstract of the 25th Annual Report, from which we learn that the Society is free from internal embarrassments and divided councils. The laborers have done their work for the year cheerfully and well. One of the missionaries, Rev. John H. Bernheim, had died at Newburyport, Mass., in September last. There is but one traveling agent in the service of the Board. The missionaries have done very little for the Treasury. The receipts have been $5,395 34, and the expenditures have been $5,406; leaving a debt of about $400 on the Society. Several addresses were delivered after the report had been read.

American Bible Society.

The Twenty-third Anniversary of this Society was held in the Tabernacle on fifth-day last. Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen occupied the chair, and delivered an address in which he spoke of the present commotion of the world as opening ways for the wider circulation of the Bible, and calling for increased exertion on the part of Christians. The Treasurer's Report was read, showing that $254,377 had been received during the year—an increase of $49,308 over the previous year. The Managers' Report stated that three of the Vice-Presidents have died in the course of the year, viz. Hon. J. Q. Adams, Alexander Henry, and P. G. Stuyvesant; also one Manager, John Aspinwall. 46 new Life Directors have been added, and 751 new Life Members. 655,068 Bibles and Testaments have been printed, being 27,196 more than the previous year, and a total since the formation of the Society of 6,780,095 copies. Beside numerous grants of the Scriptures to individuals and to feeble auxiliaries, others have been made to the various benevolent societies of this country, and for the Army, the Navy, for Oregon, Mexico, and the West Indies. Grants of money have been made for publishing the Scriptures in France, Switzerland, Syria, Persia, and India. A resolution was passed advising the Managers to raise $10,000 to aid the French and Foreign Bible Society during the coming year, and a like sum for the succeeding year. The principal addresses at the meeting were delivered by Drs. Ferris and Tyng, Rev. T. B. Sargent, Jas. McMurray, S. G. Potter, Rev. Mr. King of Dublin, Rev. Dr. Pomeroy, and Rev. S. H. Calhoun, Missionary to Syria.

American Temperance Union.

An immense audience attended the Twelfth Anniversary of this Society, at the Tabernacle, on the evening of fifth-day. Chancellor Walworth presided, and read a temperance address. The Annual Report was read by the Secretary, Rev. Mr. Marsh. In this document, among other startling facts, it was stated that 100,000 die annually from drunkenness in the United States and Great Britain alone. After reviewing the general state of the temperance movement, the Report concluded with an expression of the satisfaction of the Executive Committee at the progress of the cause during the year. In England all was encouraging; but France was in great need of a temperance reformation. In that country 1,053,797,854 gallons of intoxicating drinks were consumed annually. Fourteen millions of persons in that country were engaged either in the manufacture or sale of liquors. Now is the time to make a great temperance movement in France. On the whole there is great encouragement for enlarged action, and the Committee would bid the friends of the cause to look up to God for his blessing on their efforts.

The American Evangelical Alliance held its First Anniversary on fifth-day evening last. The principal speakers on the occasion were Rev. Dr. Pomeroy, of Bangor, Me., and Rev. Dr. Cox, of Brooklyn. The former spoke mainly of the spirit which should characterize the intercourse of members of the various Christian sects. The latter endeavored to show that the Evangelical Alliance is not a failure, and dealt out some pretty severe blows for those who do not lend it their countenance and aid. We do not learn that much has yet been done, nor do we expect much except declamation and show. It is proposed to hold a universal meeting of the Alliance in this country in 1849.

American Baptist Home Missionary Society.

A public meeting of this Society was held in the meeting-house of the First Baptist Church, on fifth-day evening, Hon. Isaac Davis in the chair. After the usual introductory exercises, an abstract of the Annual Report was read, from which it appears that the total amount of receipts for the year ending April 1, 1848, is $26,136 57, of which $20,068 73 were in direct contributions, being $2,340 01 more than last year. The total amount disbursed for the same period is $21,347 90, leaving in the hands of the Treasurer $4,790 67; of which $2,992 32 is in cash. The liabilities of the Society on the 1st of April were $20,652 24, and its available resources, consisting of the above cash balance, the balance of a previous temporary investment in Government stocks and donations in other stocks and property of supposed value, were $11,387 85, which shows a balance against the Society of $9,264 39. To meet this balance, and especially to provide for the increasing claims of another year, the dependence of the Board is entirely upon the liberality of their friends and patrons in future contributions. The missionary operations of this Society have been gradually extending. The number of agents and missionaries employed during the year was 156—being 15 more than last year. The whole number of States and Territories occupied, including Canada, was 20. The missionaries have occupied statedly 558 stations and out-stations, and the aggregate amount of time bestowed by them is equal to that of one man for 104 1-2 years. They report the baptism of 694 persons, (more than 4 for each agent and missionary,) the organization of 35 churches, and the ordination of 30 ministers. Twelve houses of worship have been completed and 38 commenced by the churches under their care; and 4 churches, heretofore aided, require that aid no longer. Those churches have also contributed to the usual objects of Christian benevolence $2,262 72, being $745 more than last year; besides nearly $14,000 for the support of the gospel among themselves, and many thousands for the building of houses of worship for their own accommodation. The receipts, labors, and results of the year, compared with those of the previous one, show the following differences—$2,340 received; 15 missionaries, 53 stations supplied; 21 years of labor; 204 baptisms; 6 churches organized, and 5 ministers ordained more than in 1846–7. The same number of churches (four) rendered able to support the gospel. But no diminutions. It has been all increase. Since the formation of the Society 1,294 ministers of the gospel have been aided; who have jointly performed 1,057 1-2 years of labor, baptized 16,600 persons, organized 628 churches, and ordained 285 ministers.

American and Foreign Bible Society.

This Society held its Annual Meeting on sixth-day last. Dr. Cone, the President, made some introductory remarks, in which he stated that the Society had recently become a body corporate, having organized under the provisions of the general law of the State of New York for the incorporation of religious, literary, and benevolent societies. Abstracts of the Annual Report and the Treasurer's Report were read, from which the following statistics are taken:—

Balance from last year, [illegible]2,013 66; receipts, $31,521 14; disbursements, $34,421 92; treasury overdrawn, $887 12. The publications of the year amount to 17,018 Bibles and 33,877 Testaments; total, 50,895. The whole number of volumes of sacred Scripture, published at the expense of the Society in foreign lands, previously to May 1, 1846, is 300,000. The number published at the Depository is 262,734. Total of Scriptures published at the expense of the American and Foreign Bible Society, 562,734. The Society is stereotyping in Germany a portable German Testament, and is adding to its stock of stereotype plates at the Depository a set for a nonpareil 12mo. Bible, and another for a duodecimo Reference Bible. It has Bibles and Testaments on hand, of every variety needed by auxiliaries. The French Testament is nearly printed; the Italian is undergoing preparations for the press. The receipts and operations of the Society are evidently on the increase. The fiscal year just closed was shorter than any of its predecessors, consisting of only eleven months and six days. In this time a larger amount of money has been received than in any period of the same length since the Society was organized. It exceeds the amount received during the same period last year, by more than $3,300, while the expense of agencies has been less by nearly $1,200. The Society maintains six colporteurs in Germany, exclusively engaged in Scripture distribution.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions held a meeting at the Tabernacle on sixth-day last, at which the various reports were read, and the usual amount of speeches made. The following summary of the doings of this organization will interest our readers:—

Since May, 1847, eight of the missions have been reinforced—the South African, Syrian, Nestorian, Bombay, Madura, China, Sandwich Islands, and Choctaw—by fourteen ordained missionaries, and sixteen assistant missionaries; thirty in all.

Nineteen clerical missionaries are under appointment, from seven Theological Seminaries, with two missionary physicians and other assistant missionaries. These are all much needed in the Missions, and are expected to go during the year to come; nearly all of them in the Autumn. Two have been set apart for a mission to the Jews of Salonica, (anciently Thessalonica,) in European Turkey. Several applications for appointments as missionaries are now before the Prudential Committee.

The system under the care of the Board contains 26 missions, about 100 stations, 150 ordained missionaries, 4 licensed preachers, 32 lay helpers, and 204 female assistant missionaries; in all 390 sent from this country. Associated with these are 25 native preachers, and about 100 other native helpers; making 515 laborers among the heathen, who are dependent on the treasury of the Board for their means of support. In these missions are 75 churches, containing upward of 26,000 members; 33 seminaries and boarding-schools, containing 1,358 boarding-scholars; 367 free schools, containing about 12,000 pupils; and 11 printing establishments, at which about 600,000,000 of pages have been printed, from the beginning, in 30 languages. The common schools at the Sandwich Islands, containing 18,000 pupils, are now wholly supported by the native Government. The number of converts admitted to the churches of those Islands during the past year, is reported at more than 1,500! And that was the tenth year since the great ingathering to the Christian Church in those Islands commenced.

Though so many missionaries have been sent forth, the Prudential Committee have felt the necessity of keeping down the expenses in the Missions; and the estimated expenditure of the financial year ending with July next, does not exceed that of the last year by more than $6,000. It could not have been made less, without violence. This will make the year's expenditure $270,000. Add the debt of last year, amounting to $31,000, and the proper expenditure of the year would be $301,000. And what are likely to be the receipts? These have been $178,000 for the first nine months, or $33,000 (nearly 25 per cent.) more than during the same period of time last year. Should there be an equal advance upon the receipts in the three remaining months—May, June, July—the receipts of the current year will be $260,000; and the indebtedness of the Board will be about $41,000; it is at present about $60,000.

The New York Colonization Society held its Annual Meeting last week. The Annual Report gave a flattering account of the present condition of Liberia, the important effects produced by implanting free principles of Government on the soil of Africa, and referred at some length to the proposition to annex the Republic of Liberia to this country. The Report stated, that unless $50,000 be raised the coming year, the enterprise will be impeded on account of debt, so urgent are the calls for expeditions. All the Liberians ask and need, is increase of numbers. Many families are now waiting to go, and the Society would gladly send out an expedition next fall, were the means furnished. Only $5,650 had been received for the past year. The Board appeals to the Colonizationists of New York for their proportion of the amount called for; and should this sum of $15,000 be raised among them, it pledges itself to pay for the passage and six months' support of 300 emigrants.

The New York State Vigilance Committee held a meeting last week, at which its plans and operations were set forth. This Society, which is composed mostly of colored people, was instituted expressly for the management of the underground railroad, and to judge by the results, keeps its business in constant activity. It employs an agent, whose time is occupied in collecting monies, providing for fugitive slaves, and forwarding them to places of safety, and in all possible ways promoting the interests of the Society. According to the report of this agent, read at the meeting, since October last the Society has afforded aid to 166 fugitives, who they have sent to various places of safety, mostly in the United States.

Rights of Subscribers to a Newspaper.—A subscriber to the Tribune asks its editor if he has not an interest in the paper to the extent of his subscription, and therefore a right (to a certain extent) to say what shall or shall not be published in that paper. Mr. Greeley says:—

"We have never understood that a man, by the mere fact of subscribing to a paper, becomes one of its editors, any more than by riding on a steamboat he becomes associate captain, pilot, mate, or engineer—any more than by boarding at a hotel he becomes associate landlord, waiter, or boots. An editor must judge (since it is impossible that a general vote should in each case be taken) whether a majority of his hundred thousand readers would probably agree with that one who insists that his article—perhaps a puff of some musical gridiron or steam schoolmaster he has just invented—should be inserted, or would rather prefer a letter from Paris, or part of a debate in Congress. And whenever it shall be settled that a correspondent has a right to demand the full insertion of what he sends us, we think most editors will black their faces and get some kind friend to sell them to the cultivator of a Carolina rice-swamp, if nothing else offers in the way of earning an honest livelihood beside editing."

A True Minister.—The Rev. E. M. Johnson, the founder and for many years pastor of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, resigned its rectorship last winter, that he might devote himself to missionary labor in a poorer part of that city. He has just organized a parish in the scene of his new labors. Mr. Johnson is a man of superior mind, the possessor of a considerable fortune, and while rector of St. John's Church, gave away, we are informed, his whole salary—a liberal one—and is now devoting his time, without money and without price, to the preaching of the gospel to the poor. Instances of disinterestedness and benevolence, like this, unostentatiously pursued for many years, are as worthy of record as they are of imitation. So says the Buffalo Commercial.

Letters and Parcels for our Missionaries.—The new ship Samuel Russell, Capt. Palmer, sails from New York for Canton about the 25th of May, and by her we intend to forward letters and parcels to our missionaries. Persons desirious of sending to them will not soon find a better opportunity.

☞ Four numbers more will complete the fourth volume of the Recorder. Those indebted to us, who expect to avail themselves of our offer to square up old accounts by the payment of two dollars per year previous to the close of the volume, will see that they have not much time to spare.

General Intelligence.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, there were two subjects which occupied a good deal of time, but no definite action was taken upon either. The first was a bill in favor of aiding Yucatan against the Indians by a temporary military occupation of the country. The second was a resolution calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate the names of officers serving in the army whose nominations have not been sent in for the approval of the Senate; in discussing which, the danger of allowing the Executive to transcend its constitutional rights, was forcibly urged. Besides this, we do not find much to report in the doings of the Senate last week, except that a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Vermont in favor of Whitney's railroad, was presented and ordered printed.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union was passed, after considerable discussion. The land bounty bill, in favor of officers promoted from the private ranks of the army, was passed. The bill for paying the regiment of Texas six-months volunteers, was also passed.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Cambria, which sailed from Liverpool on the 29th ult., arrived at this port on Sunday last, bringing intelligence one week later.

All was quiet in England. From Ireland the reports of destitution and death are most appalling, particularly in the Western counties. At Greenock, Scotland, there was a chartist meeting and procession on the 22d of April, but no serious disturbance, and only a few wounds were inflicted by the police.

FRANCE.

From France we learn that the elections passed off with perfect order, in all parts of the country, as far as heard from, and uniformly in favor of the moderate party. There was little or no excitement in Paris on the occasion, and it is said that no one would have supposed, from the appearance of the city, that anything of general importance was going forward. At the same time, there are charges against Ledru Rollin, Louis Blanc, &c., for corrupting the voters, but this is scarcely borne out by the fact of general apathy in regard to the matter. The election was followed by a considerable rise in the funds.

At a council of the Provisional Government, held on the 23d, a decree was adopted definitively abolishing slavery in all the colonies and possessions of the French Republic. The decree is to take effect two months after its publication in the colonies. An indemnity is to be granted to the slave-owners, the amount and form of which will be fixed by the National Assembly. All traffic in slaves between proprietors in the colonies is interdicted from the day of the publication of the decree. All introduction, by hire or otherwise, of negroes into the colonies, is also forbidden.

A lady of Geneva, who is a friend of the Duchess of Orleans, received a few days ago, from the Duchess, a letter which contains, among other things, the following words: 'I deplored at first the unexpected Revolution of February, and wept over the terrible fall of those who were dear to me; I regretted at first for my son the loss of the finest crown in the world; but now I had rather see my son dead than hope for him an early return to France, or dream that he might one day sit upon a throne which is forever impossible.'

The Presse announces that in Paris there have been established workshops, in which the shoemakers and tailors, among the unemployed operatives, are engaged in making shoes and wearing apparel for their comrades. They are hereafter to be employed in working for the army.

PRUSSIA.

An affair took place at Berlin on the 20th of April not unlike that at Paris on the 16th. The workmen dissatisfied with the state of things, had arranged a great procession for them, on that day to proceed to the castle and petition the minister of the interior for a change in the electoral law, so that the people might vote directly instead of choosing electors to vote for them. The procession was forbidden, and the King called out the burgher guard, authorizing them to fire on the multitude in case, after being twice summoned to disperse, they should refuse to do so. But the procession was postponed, after seeing what a counter movement there would be.

In the province of Posen a large camp of Poles, established at Xyons, a town about ten miles south of Schuda, has been broken up after a good deal of hostile demonstration. The Jewish inhabitants are now marked out as the objects of popular fury, and at Plashen great excesses have been committed. The Prussians interfered to protect the Jews, and thirteen soldiers were killed in a conflict in the streets. General Colomb has sent a dispatch to General Von Willesen, stating that if these excesses were not put an end to, he would declare the convention or armistice at an end, and attack the Poles with all his forces. General Steinachre is scouring the country with a large body of cavalry, but he finds it almost impossible to put an end to the guerilla warfare that is being carried on. Brutz, on the high road from Posen to Frankfort-on-the-Oder, has been invaded by two thousand scythe men, who destroyed the houses of all the Jews who were said to be usurers. They then left the town. In Kostrel the same scenes were repeated.

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES.

A sharp action took place on the 21st, between the "Free Corps," consisting of Hamburghers, Berliners, &c., and some Danish infantry, about 800 men in all, supported by a small body of cavalry and a couple of field pieces. These poor deluded young men supposed that they could easily regain their reputation lost in the action of Bau by surprising a Danish outpost, but after trying their courage for a few hours against their better disciplined and organized adversaries, and really fighting with considerable courage and enthusiasm for some time, at a long range of shot, they attempted to charge them with the bayonet, when they were received by a party of Schleswig volunteers, the regular Danish troops making way for them, and completely defeated, with the loss of 20 men killed and 50 wounded, according to the version given by the Holsteiners, but more likely with double that number.

ALTONA, Monday, April 24.—The train from Rendsburg has brought intelligence of the taking of the town of Schleswig by the troops of the Confederation, after an engagement which lasted from 3 o'clock in the afternoon of Easter Sunday until 11 at night. The fortification called the Dannevirk, on which the Danish artillery was placed, was taken by the Prussians at the point of the bayonet, after the battery had been silenced by the field pieces of the Hanoverian contingent. Schleswig then fell into the hands of the Confederation. The conflict was a bloody one, the Danes having a strong position, and doing great execution with their artillery and riflemen before it was carried. The Danes had from 10,000 to 12,000; the force of the Confederation was the greatest, but it was not all engaged; four Prussian regiments of the guard and line formed the bulk of the attacking army. The loss of the Prussians, so far as can be gathered from the unauthenticated accounts, is about 300 men killed and wounded.

GREAT HAIL STORM IN THE SEMINOLE COUNTRY—DESTRUCTION OF WILD FOWL, &c.—The Fort Smith (Ark.) Herald, of April 12, says that Marcellus Duval, Seminole Agent, arrived in that place from the Seminole country, on Wednesday. From him we learn that on the 26th of March last, the valley of the Canadian, about 150 miles west of this, was visited with one of the severest storms of hail that ever fell—the hail stones being about the size of hens' eggs, and some even larger. Where Mr. Duval was, the hail stones were not so large, he being on a ridge, but on either side, on the river and in the prairie, the storm was terrific.

The wild geese and brants, a species of the wild goose, appeared to be on the wing that day, migrating in great numbers from the south to the north, and were killed by hundreds with the hail, while flying. Thirty were counted in one place, lying dead, by some person who passed the spot shortly after the storm. Some fell dead in the yard of a Seminole Chief, named Micanopy, who picked them up, had them cooked, and ate them. He told the agent afterwards that he thought the Great Spirit had sent them to the Indians, knowing they were getting short of provisions. Some of the Indians were afraid to eat them, supposing the destruction of so great a quantity of these birds portended some evil to their country. Others carried them home by horse loads. The Agent says he never heard of any thing of the like before in his life, and when he left, the Indians were still bringing in from the prairies wild geese and brants by horse loads. Several of the Indian cabins were blown down and others unroofed by the storm, but fortunately no person was killed.

SIC TRANSIT GLORIA.—Mr. Ashley of the U. S. Senate, lately deceased, says the Boston Traveler, was the rival and successful candidate, against the late Col. Yell, for the U. S. senatorship, from Arkansas. Col. Yell, after his unsuccessful canvass for senatorial honors, sought military glory by volunteering for the Mexican war, and was killed in the terrible battle of Buena Vista. Mr. Ashley entered Congress at the opening of the present session, and after a few months of enjoyment of his hard-won honors, sickened and died, and now lies as low as his unsuccessful rival. Thus these eager competitors for earthly honors have gone down to untimely graves, and their hopes, their glory and their pride, have perished in an hour; other men will soon fill the places which they occupied, and, except in the memory of a few loving hearts, the existence of such men as Senator Ashley, and Col. Yell, will soon cease to be remembered.

RAPID TRAVELING.—The distance from Paddington to Didcot, in England, was recently run by an eight-wheeled locomotive engine, with eight feet driving-wheels, in 51 minutes and 38 seconds. The distance is 53 miles. The time marked was from a state of rest to a state of rest. The highest speed was between 75 and 76 miles an hour, and many miles were performed at an average velocity of between 67 and 68 miles an hour. The weight carried was 60 tons.

The freight train, consisting of 15 carriages, weighing 115 tons, performed on the same road, 77 miles in 2 hours and 26 minutes, including 17 minutes lost in six stoppages. The engine had seven feet driving-wheels, sixteen-inch cylinder, twenty-inch stroke.

The Buffalo Commercial of Saturday, May 6, says: A rumor is quite current here to-day that the Erie (Pa.) Bank has at last gone by the board. The report is no doubt correct, as the institution has been tottering for months past, and the banks and community generally had lost all confidence in its stability. The agent for redeeming the notes in this city ceased receiving any more of its notes on yesterday afternoon. The amount of the issues of the bank in circulation must be very large, as the charter was one of that class that gave all manner of privileges to those who had the control of the affairs. Such of our brokers as have been victimized are offering the notes of the bank at 50 cents on the dollar.

According to the Erie Observer, the cashier of the Erie Bank says he has means, but not at present available, to redeem all the bills in circulation.

The Directors of the Erie Bank have published a card stating their belief that the Bank will pay every dollar of its liabilities. The resources of the Bank are $445,931, and the liabilities to the public $331,088. The circulation is $286,130. Gen. Reed appends a card, pledging all his property to secure the debts of the Bank.

In Western Virginia, it is advertised that a man of family, who will move on, can have 60 acres of land for nothing. The settler to have the privilege of buying from the owner one hundred or more acres adjoining at one dollar per acre, payable in two, three and four years.

SUMMARY.

Recent accounts from Honduras state that the Indians continue their depredations. They have destroyed the town of Valcalla by burning it to the ground. Five hundred of its defenders have retired into forts, while the women and children were taking care of themselves as they best could, and were flying in all directions without money or food. Even the inhabitants of Balize were threatened with an attack, and had prepared to meet it.

A Pittsburg paper of May 8th, says that a terrible accident occurred on the previous day on the Monongahela, opposite Birmingham. A wedding party, consisting of seven persons, among whom was one lady, the bride, were crossing the river above the dam, when the boat passed over the dam, and four of the men were drowned. The bridegroom was lost, but the lady was saved.

A new hotel is being erected in the city of New York, which will have a front on Chatham street of 93 feet, and 136 on Frankfort. In the rear, the building will be 107 feet wide,—thus giving it the form of an L, the northeasterly limb of which, will be 75 feet in width. It will be seven stories high, of the Corinthian order of architecture. It will probably be completed by the 1st of January next, at an outlay (including $96,000 for the purchase of the lots) of not far from $170,000. The first story will be faced with iron and will compose a range of fine stores.

The Wilmington (Del.) Gazette announces the suicide of Warren Jefferson, Esq., a prominent and highly respected citizen of Sussex Co., which occurred on Thursday last. Mr. Jefferson was a member of the last State Senate, and in 1840 was the candidate of the Democratic party of that State for Governor. He shot himself through the heart with a horse pistol, in the rear of his own house, where he was afterwards found dead. He suffered for some time past under deep depression of spirits, consequent upon various family afflictions.

A dispatch from St. Louis, of May 8, 1848, announces the destruction by fire of four steamboats that morning, viz: the Mary, the Mail, the Missouri Mail, and the Lightfoot. The fire originated in the Mail, which was without insurance. All the rest were insured. The entire loss is estimatad at $30,000. The Mary is not quite a total loss. The boats were all empty.

There is a good prospect that a new railroad will be built from Rochester to Syracuse. We learn from the Rochester Democrat, that the capital stock of this association, one million and a half of dollars, has been all taken up, and the articles of association submitted and approved, at the meeting held at Palmyra on Thursday last. A meeting of the stockholders is to be held at Rochester on the 13th inst. for the purpose of electing officers and completing the organization of the company.

We have eighteen hundred ships engaged in foreign trade, constantly on the ocean. The value of these vessels and cargoes may be safely set down at $250,000 each, producing $450,000,000 as the total value of American shipping on the seas at all times. Besides this there are at least fifteen hundred vessels constantly loading and unloading.

The National Intelligencer says, "Letters from Yucatan to the 14th of April, state that the Indians have elected a King, under the name of Tutulxia, which was the name of their King or Chief before the conquest of the Spaniards. He was crowned in the famous ruins of Chichen Itza on the 9th of April.

It is said that the largest corn grower in America is Wm. Polk, Esq., of Arkansas, a brother of the President. His crop last year was estimated at 100,000 bushels. The following is the estimate of the fruits of his plantation: corn $70,000; cotton, $16,000; pork, $4,000; total produce of the year $90,000.

Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro', N. Y., has sent to the editor of the Chronotype $500 toward a fund for the defense of the captain and two men of the New Jersey sloop that carried off the slaves from Washington, and says he will pay more if necessary.

The largest steam engine ever made in Ireland, was recently shipped at Belfast for the Pacha of Egypt. It is one of a number to be erected on the banks of the Nile for pumping water to irrigate the land. The cylinder is 62 inches in diameter, with a ten foot stroke; and the pump will throw up 10,000 gallons of water every minute.

There was a great fire at Detroit, Mich., on the 9th inst., supposed to have caught from a spark of a propeller. Three hundred families were burnt out, and about two hundred thousand dollars worth of property destroyed. Barney's Temperance House and Wales' Hotel were among the buildings burnt.

A correspondent of the Rochester Democrat, writing from Matamoros, says:—At the head of Brazos Island we found an old hut, inhabited by an old man, singular in appearance as the manner in which he lives, almost entirely secluded from the world. Inquiring into his history, we found that he belonged to Utica, and that his name was Parker. He had also resided in Rochester about 20 years ago, but could remember no one except Joseph Medbury, whom he seemed to know quite well.

Mrs. Sweeny was killed at Little Falls, May 12, by a stone thrown out by a sand-blast. Two stones, about 30 pounds each, were dashed into her house, one of which struck Mrs. S. just above the right breast as she sat in her chair with her infant, ten days old. She was killed instantly, and her babe was found, slightly wounded, laying in the blood of its dead mother.

In the United States Court, Chief Justice Taney and Judge Halyburton, sitting at Richmond, in the case of the United States vs. James H. Plunkett, a prisoner brought from Rio Janeiro, charged with piracy, (slave trading,) came up on the 4th inst. After a full examination of testimony, and argument by counsel, the jury brought in a verdict of 'not guilty.'

A strange accident has occurred at Cardiff, Scotland. A schooner lying in one of the docks was blown almost to pieces by her cargo of coals having generated a gas which ignited from a candle which one of the crew was using. Several men were killed.

IMPORTANT WORK!

Forty Thousand Copeis sold in England.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

A Selection of the choicest productions of English Authors, from the earliest to the present time, connected by a Critical and Biographical History, edited by Robert Chambers, assisted by Robert Carruthers, and other eminent gentlemen. Complete in two imperial octavo volumes, of more than fourteen hundred pages of double column letter-press: and upwards of three hundred elegant illustrations. Price $5 00

The Cyclopædia of English Literature now presented to the American public, originated in a desire to supply the great body of people with a fund of reading derived from the productions of the most talented and most elegant writers in the English language. It is hoped hereby to supplant, in a measure, the frivolous and corrupting productions with which the community is flooded, and to substitute for them the pith and marrow of substantial English literature; something that shall prove food for the intellect, shall cultivate the taste, and stimulate the moral sense.

The design has been admirably executed, by the selection and concentration of the most exquisite productions of English intellect from the earliest Anglo-Saxon writers down to those of the present day. The series of authors commences with Langland and Chaucer, and is continuous down to our day. We have had specimens of their best writings headed in the several departments, by Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton—by More, Bacon, Locke—by Hooker, Taylor, Barrow—by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith—by Hume, Robertson, Gibbon—set in a biographical and critical history of the Literature itself. The whole is embellished with splendid wood engravings, of the heads of the principal authors, and of interesting events connected with their history and writings. No one can give a glance at the work without being struck with its beauty and cheapness. It is in fact A WHOLE ENGLISH LIBRARY FUSED DOWN INTO ONE CHEAP BOOK.

The editor, Robert Chambers, is distinguished as the author of several historical works connected with Scotland, and as joint editor of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

As an evidence of the great popularity of the work in England, it may be stated that more than forty thousand copies have been sold in less than three years; and this almost without advertising or being indebted to any notice from literary Reviews.

In addition to the great number of pictorial illustrations in the English edition, the American publishers have greatly enriched the work by the addition of fine steel and mezzotint engravings of the heads of Shakspeare, Addison, Byron, a full length portrait of Dr. Johnson, and a beautiful scenic representation of Oliver Goldsmith and Dr. Johnson.

These important additions to the American edition, together with a better paper and binding than the English, must give this a decided preference with the American reader.

SPRING.

BY JOHN SWAIN.

Spring, spring, beautiful spring,
Hitherward cometh, like hope on the wing—
Pleasantly looketh on streamlet and flood,
Raiseth a chorus of Joy in the wood;
Toucheth the bud and it bursts into bloom;
Biddeth the beautiful rise from the tomb;
Blesseth the heart like a heavenly thing!
Spring, spring, beautiful spring.

Song—sweetly saluteth the morn!
The Robin awaketh, and sits on the thorn,
Timidly warbles, while yet in the east
Twilight from duty has not been released;
Calleth the lark that ascendeth on high
Greeting the sun in the depths of the sky,
Telleth the talented blackbird to sing—
Welcome! oh, welcome! beautiful spring!

Life! love! in gladness serene,
Wander in innocence over the green;
Dwell in the garden, and meadow, and wood,
Sing on the mountain, and shine in the flood;
Smile on the bud as it bursts into bloom,
Welcome the beautiful fresh from the tomb;—
How the earth blesseth each fair living thing!
Spring! spring! beautiful spring!

LAST SCENE IN THE TUILLERIES.

It appears that the King, ever since the death of Madame Adelaide, has lost much of his energy, given up in some degree his early habits, and the punctuality in business for which he had always been distinguished. On the morning of Thursday, he had risen somewhat later than usual; he said that he had passed a restless night, and that he was weary, both in mind and body, with the petitioning of the two royal dukes (Nemours and Montpensier) for that which they knew he could not grant. He had been writing all the preceding evening, in his own bedroom, and a sealed letter to the Queen of Belgium was amongst the papers found upon his writing-desk. I understand that the seal was respected, and that the letter was religiously dispatched to its destination. So little apprehension was felt as to the result of the day's debate, that the royal children were brought as usual to the King; and it being Thursday, his majesty had examined, as was his wont on that day, all the copy-books of the Count de Paris, and expressed his satisfaction at the progress evinced by the royal pupil in his various studies. At ten o'clock the children were dismissed, and at that hour the strife began by the announcement of M. Emilie de Girardin. "Nay, but I received him yesterday," exclaimed the King, much irritated, to the aid-de-camp in waiting. "Pardon me, sire, he says that his business is urgent, and that the safety of the empire depends upon your majesty's reception of his message." The King, now interested, but not yet alarmed, gave the order to admit the visitor. It appears by M. de Girardin's own account, that he was so overcome with emotion, that for an instant he could not speak, and the King said abruptly, and in no measured tone of voice, "What more is required by you and your fellows? Have we not made enough concessions in all conscience?" "There is yet another one, your majesty, which is become more necessary than all the rest." "Then it cannot be granted," returned the King, peevishly; "indeed I have regret for that which is already done." "And so have I, your majesty, for it is not yet enough." "Qu'est ce a-dire?" exclaimed the King, interrupting him with great vehemence. The haughtiness of the expression, which is untranslatable—the abruptness of the tone in which it was uttered, roused the fiery temper of Girardin, and he answered almost coarsely: "The one concession more which is demanded by the people, is your majesty's abdication—on the instant, too, and without any reservation." The King started to his feet with such a sudden movement, that he upset the inkstand which he had just been using, and the broad black stain may yet be seen upon the carpet. He rushed to the window, whither Girardin followed him, and pointing to the crowd, exclaimed: "Six battalions of the National Guard surround the palace—all are of one mind, and those who sent me here are strong in their unanimity—blood has been shed, and now there is no retreat." Louis Philippe grew deadly pale, and his hand shook violently, as he took that of M. de Girardin, but his voice faltered not as he answered: "You are perhaps in the right, Monsieur; I will go down to the Chambers, not to plead for myself, but to protect my dynasty." At this moment, the Queen, who had been watching and hovering about the apartment in the greatest alarm, appeared upon the door-sill—she spoke not—she evidently did not wish to be observed, for she did not advance one step into the room. She was attired in the deepest mourning, and her silver hair escaped from beneath a cap of black crape—her face was so pale and ghastly, that she seemed about to faint—her tall form bent not—but the agitation of the moment was so great, that she was seized with that palsied shaking of the knees to which she has been subject ever since the death of the Duke of Orleans. She drew back as the King passed out. So great was his own preöccupation, that he perceived her not, and she followed him thus in silence and with noiseless step, little heeding whither he was leading her, so that he was not lost to sight. It was thus that she found herself in the midst of the gardens of the Tuilleries, surrounded by a countless multitude, exposed to all the rigors of a stormy sky, without shawl or bonnet, or any of the appurtenances either of her age or rank. It was a touching sight to behold this eager solicitude, this tender love, stronger than the fear of death, which actuated the Queen in this desertion of all beside her husband. And I know of many, who, wound up to the fierce excitement then, cannot, now that all is over, think of that scene without tears. It was not till Louis Philippe had reached the Pont Tournant that he even became aware of the presence of the Queen. It is said that his smile of recognition was a strange and fearful one; he would have turned; perhaps his memory carried him back to another crowd which he had seen before upon that self-same spot, and he dreaded to advance. Just then a squadron of cavalry meeting the crowd issuing from the gate of the Tuilleries, bore down upon the mass. A gentleman seized the arm of the Queen to preserve her from the danger. She turned in frenzy upon him, deeming it an attack. "Laissez moi, Monsieur," exclaimed she, in a loud and angry voice, and, seizing the hand of the King, dragged him with undaunted courage towards a one-horse citadine which stood upon the quay, and, forcing his majesty into it, took her seat beside him, while Marshal Gourgaud, who, by this time had pierced the dense mass of people and joined his majesty, spoke in a low voice to the coachman. In an instant the little vehicle set off at a furious gallop along the quay in the direction of St. Cloud—and the monarchy of July was no more!

This is the true history of the flight from the Tuilleries, of Louis Philippe, King of the French.

ESCAPE OF THE DUKE DE NEMOURS.

On the morning of the 24th of February, when the Duchess of Orleans and her two sons quitted the Tuilleries to go to the Chamber of Deputies, she was accompanied by the Duke de Nemours, dressed in the uniform of a lieutenant general. In the midst of the tumult which terminated the session, the prince jumped from a window which overlooks the passage into the garden of the presidency, and gained the street. Here two of the combatants, who from the square of the Palais Royal had gone towards the chamber after the skirmish of the Chateau d'Eau, enabled him to dress himself in the uniform of a National Guard, which one of them took off and gave him. The Duke, in undressing, gave to one of these citizens several valuable articles which he had about him, among others a watch of great price, a dagger knife, a chevalier ring, a purse containing several gold pieces, and a neck and vest chain. He then ran off in the direction of the Rue de Bourgogne, where he afterwards entered a hired cabriolet.

Since that time the Duke de Nemours has gone over to England, and the preceding details would have remained unknown, if the police, in the active efforts they are making to recover property which was abstracted on the 24th of February, had not got trace of the jewelry of the Duke de Nemours. The police obtained information that it was a young journeyman clockmaker of the quarter Chausse d'Antin, who had possession of these articles, and the prefect of police, M. Caussidiere, issued a warrant which has resulted in finding almost all the articles.

The holder of them, who has the reputation of being an honest and laborious workman, protested that he had always intended to send them to the Duke de Nemours. "I did not consider myself," he declared, "as the lawful owner, though I think it was his intention to make me a present of them, when he placed them in my hands. He told me in the midst of his trouble, to take them, and keep them, as there was no pocket in the uniform he had just put on, which would hold them, and he feared they might lead to his discovery, if he should meet any one in his flight."

The young clockmaker, who has been left at liberty, and whose declarations have been accepted, and the articles put under seal, adds that the 25th of February he related to his master the facts as above stated, and that having the intention to write to Queen Maria Amelia, he had prepared a sketch of a letter which he had not written out, not knowing where or how to send it, but in the letter he had told the Queen that he held at the disposition of the Duke de Nemours, the articles the Prince had left with him in his flight, except a few louis which he found in the purse, which want of work had compelled him to appropriate, but that he would refund those as soon as he resumed work.

FACTS STRANGER THAN FICTION.

A rather fashionable young man of about thirty, was noticed one afternoon last week promenading between the Park and the Hospital, in Broadway. He was attired in somewhat sailor fashion, and presented evident marks of the rum dissipation. His dark hair was long and matted, and his toilet apparently had not been attended to for many days. At one of his many turns he met two ladies. One was tall, strikingly handsome, and dressed in deep mourning; the other was short and fair, and bedecked in light fancy colors. When the sailor and the lady in mourning met, the latter wildly screamed, and would have fallen on the side-walk but for the impulsive effort of the strange looking man to catch her in his arms. "Good heavens, Edward," convulsively gasped the female, and "Eliza, my own loved one," was hoarsely whispered by the sailor. He bore the fainting form in his arms gently into Mr. ——'s store, where every attention was paid to her distressed situation.

Quite a gaping crowd was collected, deeply interested by the scene. The lady is an actress of great promise and some European fame, now sojourning at one of our fashionable hotels. She was to have appeared at one of our theatres in the course of next week. Having heard of the death of her husband, she left England about two months past. The history of her early marriage was one of woe and misfortune. Her husband was a midshipman on board an English war steamer, was dismissed for drunkenness, and joined a cruiser of suspicious character. In one of his fits of intoxication this man fell overboard in the Gulf stream in a gale of wind. A spar was thrown to him, by which he was miraculously saved. He was picked up by one of our packets and landed at Peck Slip a few weeks since. Edward T——n is the husband for whose rumored death his young, beautiful, and accomplished wife went into mourning; and thus, as we have described, did she, in a singular manner, fall in with her lost one. Heaven pity the afflicted trial-stricken wife, and restore her erring husband to society. [N. Y. Sun.

PUNCTUATION.—Caxton had the merit of introducing the Roman pointing, as used in Italy; and his successor, Prison, triumphed by domiciliating the Roman letter. The dash, or perpendicular line, thus | was the only punctuation they used. It was, however, discovered that the "craft of pointing, well-used, makes the sentence very light." The more elegant comma supplanted the long uncouth |; the colon was a refinement, "showing that there is more to come;" but the semicolon was a Latin delicacy, which the obtuse English typographer resisted. The Bible of 1592, though printed with appropriate accuracy, is without a semicolon; but in 1633 its full rights are established by Charles Butler's English Grammar. In this chronology of the four points of punctuation, it is evident that Shakspeare could never have used a semicolon; a circumstance which the profound George Chalmers mourns over, opining that semicolons would often have saved the poet from his commentators. SUPERSTITION IN THE REIGN OF JAMES THE FIRST.

The reign of James was abundant in schemes for the discovery of gold and of hidden treasure by charms; and the general prevalence of such belief may be imagined, when we find that David Ramsay, known to our readers as the King's watchmaker, in the Fortunes of Nigel, having been told that a large quantity of treasure was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, begged permission of Williams, then Dean, to search for it. Williams, with the proviso that the church should have a share, gave his consent. Now, David Ramsay did not go to work in a common manner, but, under the direction of a cunning man, named John Scott, he, with "several others," entered the cloisters with hazel rods, and "played them." On the west side the rods "turned the one over the other;" so, thinking that the treasure was there, they began to dig, but found only a coffin. Again and again they tried, but were disappointed, until David and his company, with "half-quartern sack, to put the treasure in," were compelled to return no richer than they came. As John Scott had prophesied success, a sufficient excuse must be found, so, as a very "blustering wind" arose before they had finished, the demons, who were unwilling the treasure should be discovered, determined their search should be in vain. These cunning men, who used the hazel rod, and crystal, were most indignant at being confounded with wizards, and "such slaves of the devil;" for they pretended "to acquaintance with angels." Such was old Mr. William Hodges, under whom the aforesaid John Scott studied. John Scott at length took his leave of his master, "being to return to London," to get married. Probably anxious to test the skill of old Mr. William Hodges, he requested him to show him his lady in the crystal. Hodges complied, and bade him say what he saw. "A ruddy-complexioned wench, in a red waist-coat, drawing a can of beer," was the reply. "She must be your wife," said the owner of the crystal. "Never," replied Scott; "I am to marry a tall gentlewoman in the Old Bailey." "You must marry the red waist-coat," was the oracular decision. Away went Scott, fully determined to take his own way; but when he arrived at the Old Bailey, he found the tall gentlewoman already married. Two years passed; and then, on a journey, going into an inn at Canterbury, John Scott went by mistake into the kitchen instead of the sitting-room, and behold there was a maiden in a red waist-coat, drawing a can of beer! The stars had certainly led him thither; and who, in the seventeenth century, could resist their influence? So John Scott "became a suitor" to red waist-coat, married her, and lived very happy ever after, as the old stories say. In this case the prediction undoubtedly wrought its own fulfillment, and this was often the case when so much faith was joined to so much credulity. The belief in the power of the crystal to foreshadow future events was held, however, by many a grave divine at this period. The bold and ambitious mother of James' last favorite was believed, when a mere humble dependent in a noble family, to have seen herself in this magic mirror, blazing with gold and gems, just as she appeared at Whitehill, when courted by the proudest nobles, and complimented by the King himself. "MR. & MRS. THIEF."—An extensive dry goods dealer on Washington-st. has for a long time been in the practice of charging articles missing from the counter, to the firm of "Mr. & Mrs. Thief." Their account had amounted to about $100—when, a few days since, he detected a young lady belonging to the "upper ten" in the act of secreting a pair of hose, whereupon he politely informed her that he had an unsettled account on his books headed by her name, and if she would wait a few minutes he would add the hose she had just taken to the bill and receipt it for her. The affrighted damsel fell upon her knees and begged, implored him not to expose her. She would leave her gold watch, jewelry, anything, to prevent discovery, and would immediately obtain the money and settle the bill. On these conditions she was allowed to depart. In a short time, however, true to her pledge, she returned—having made a "raise" probably from "Papa" or "Mamma"—and canceled the bill, after which she departed apparently highly gratified at her lucky escape. We understand that quite a number of the dry goods merchants on Washington and Hanover streets have devoted a page in their ledgers to the firm of "Mr. & Mrs. Thief;"—so that the luckless sinners who first happen to get caught will have to "fork over" for all delinquencies recorded, if they would save themselves from public disgrace; otherwise, sentences at the discretion of the presiding Judges of the Criminal Courts will be their inevitable doom. OPENING OF THE ERIE CANAL.—SOUND vs. LIHGTNING.—It is announced that the water is to be let into the Erie Canal to-day, and the intelligence is instantly communicated by Telegraph. This recalls to mind the ceremonies of the celebration at the time this Canal was completed, and the means resorted to, to convey speedily as was then possible, from Buffalo to the seaboard, the news that the waters of Lake Erie had been let into the Canal, and the first boat had commenced its trips to New York. The Canal was completed October 20, 1825, and on Wednesday, at 10 A. M., the waters of the Lake were let in, and a boat commenced its voyage. The announcement of this joyful event was made to the citizens of the State by the sound of cannon placed in a continued line along the Canal and the Hudson, at intervals of eight miles, extending from Buffalo to Sandy Hook, a distance of 545 miles. The moment the boat entered the Canal at Buffalo, the firing was commenced, and was continued in succession till the intelligence reached the City, which was at 20 minutes past 11 o'clock, occupying one hour and twenty minutes. The acknowledgment of the receipt of this intelligence was returned in the same manner. This velocity averaging about half the velocity of sound. The intelligence is to-day communicated by lightning—instantaneously. [Evening Post, May 1.

PARIS WIT.—At a meeting of one of the clubs of Paris an ardent republican in addressing the meeting, with more than ordinary violence, worked himself up to such a pitch of rage against aristocrats, monarchists, and conspirators against the Republic, that he at length exclaimed, 'The Republic will not be safe till at least 300,000 heads have fallen.' This proposition was received with loud murmurs, and cries of 'Turn him out!' but at length one of the members rose and said, 'The sentiment is a noble and patriotic one. I should like to have a lock of that citizen's hair.' Loud applause followed, and the lock of hair was promptly in the hands of the demander. Presently another admirer of patriotism expressed his wish for a portion of the citizen's locks, and hundreds followed. The end of it was, that the ardent Democrat, who was so anxious for 300,000 aristocratic heads, was turned out of the meeting without a single hair on his own.

"HOWEVER BOUNDED."—Hon. Rufus Choate has given the clearest idea of the "however" boundaries of a county, that we have yet seen. A few days since, while arguing before a legislative committee upon the disputed boundary question between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, he alluded to the absurdity of relying upon the loose and indefinite boundaries marked out by the Commissioners a century ago, and gave a sweep at them all in the following sentence which we find in the Barre Gazette:—

"I would as soon," said he in nervous tones and with startling action, "think of bounding a sovereign State on the north, by a dandelion, on the west, by a blue jay, on the south, by a hive of bees in swarming time, and on the east, by three hundred foxes with fire brands tied to their tales!"

ANECDOTE OF JOHNSON.—As soon as Johnson had completed the last sheet of his Dictionary, the delay of which had quite exhausted the patience of Miller, the bookseller, the latter acknowledged the receipt of it in the following rude terms:—"Andrew Miller sends his compliments to Mr. Samuel Johnson, with the money for the last sheet of the Dictionary, and thanks God he has done with him." To which uncourteous intimation the Doctor replied in the following bitter retort:—"Samuel Johnson returns his compliments to Mr. Andrew Miller, and is very glad to find, (as he does by his note) that Andrew Miller has the grace to thank God for anything."

VARIETY.

It is not perhaps generally known, that common beets, roasted in embers or baked in a stove, in the same manner you would potatoes, are much sweeter and dryer than when prepared for the table in the ordinary way by boiling. Such, nevertheless, is the fact. When they are perfectly done, peel and serve them in the ordinary way. It is better, when beets are required for this purpose, to select such as are of medium size, smooth, and perfectly round, as large roots do not cook so readily or so well, on account of their size.

In the next Presidential election, the whole number of electoral votes will be 290 with, or 286 without Wisconsin. It is very probable that Wisconsin will be enabled to choose four Electors, and if so, 146 votes will be required to elect a President by the people. The South will cast 121 Electoral votes; and of these, upward of twenty are allowed on account of her property in human beings; and the North, 169, giving the free States a majority of 48.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce announces a new telegraph, the invention of Mr. Bain of England, where the patent has been sold for £12,000. This telegraph, says the correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, is capable of transmitting one thousand words per minute, and could telegraph the President's message in an hour. The inventor has taken measures to secure a patent in this country.

In New York, a few days ago, it is said, a man hung himself very curiously. He rigged the rope so that after passing round his neck it was fixed to his feet, and so that by straightening out his legs, he could help the process he had in view! He also arranged a looking glass, so that he could see his own face during the operation, and study the contortions it might undergo!

At a late meeting of the New York City Temperance Society, Rev. Dr. Tyng stated that fifty millions of dollars were directly spent in this city annually for liquor; a sum sufficient to send six thousand Christian missionaries to any quarter of the globe; and that the sum expended for liquors equaled all that was raised in the city for the objects of benevolence.

The library of the King and Queen of the French, at Neuilly amounted, it is said, to 14,000 volumes, and about 12,000 of these have escaped the devastation of the chateau. Many of these books are very rare and valuable; and the whole will be placed in the National Library, as the Royal Library of Paris is styled since the revolution.

At a recent examination of the mutes of the Ohio Asylum at Columbus, the following question was proposed to a deaf and dumb teacher in the institution.

"Would it be wrong for a white man to marry a black wife?"

The mute replied by writing—

"I do not know that it would be a sin. Who wants one?"

A good many hundred years ago Anacharsis said to Solon, "Give me leave to tell you, that these written laws are just like spiders' webs; the weak and small may be caught and entangled in them; but the rich and powerful will break through and despise them." Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	" "	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third	" "	April 5,	"	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

MY MOTHER'S GOLD RING.

BY L. M. SARGENT.

I have one of the kindest husbands; he is a carpenter by trade, and our flock of little children has one of the kindest fathers in the country. I was thought the luckiest girl in the parish, when G—— T—— made me his wife. I thought so myself. Our wedding day, and it was a happy one—was but an indifferent sample of those days of rational happiness and uninterrupted harmony, which we were permitted to enjoy together for the space of six years. And although for the last three years of our lives we have been as happy as we were at the beginning, it makes my heart sick to think of those long dark days and sad nights, that came between, for two years of our union were years of misery. I well recollect the first glass of ardent spirits that my husband ever drank. He had been at a grocery to purchase a little tea and sugar for the family; there were three cents coming to him in change; and unluckily the deacon, who keeps the shop, had nothing but silver in the till; and, as it was a sharp frosty morning, he persuaded my good man to take his money's worth of rum, for it was just the price of a glass. He came home in wonderful spirits, and told me he meant to have me and the children better dressed, and as neighbor Barton talked of selling his horse and chaise, he thought of buying them both; and, when I said to him, "George, we are dressed as well as we can afford, and I hope you will not think of a horse and chaise until we have paid off the Squire's mortgage;" he gave me a harsh look and a bitter word.

I never shall forget them, for they were the first he ever gave me in his life. When he saw me shedding tears, and holding my apron to my face, he said he was sorry, and came to kiss me, and I discovered he had been drinking, and it grieved me to the heart. In a short time after, while I was washing up the breakfast things, I heard our little Robert, who was only five years old, crying bitterly; and, going to learn the cause, I met him running towards me with his face covered with blood.

He said his father had taken him on his knee, and was playing with him, but had given him a blow in the face, only because he had said, when he kissed him, "Dear papa, you smell like old Isaac, the drunken fiddler." My husband was very cross to us all, through the whole of that day; but the next morning, though he said but little, he was evidently ashamed and humbled, and he went about his work very industriously, and was particularly kind to little Robert. I prayed constantly for my good man, and that God would be pleased to guide his heart aright; and, more than a week having gone by, without a similar occurrence, I flattered myself that he would never do so again. But in a very short time, either the Deacon was short of change, as before, or some tempting occasion presented itself, which my husband could not resist, and he returned home once more under the influence of liquor. I never shall forget the expression of his countenance when he came in that night. We had waited supper a full hour for his return; the tea-pot was standing at the fire, and the bannocks were untouched upon the hearth, and the smaller children were beginning to murmur for their supper. There was an indescribable expression of defiance on his countenance, as though he was conscious of having done wrong, and resolved to brave it out. We sat down silently to supper, and he scarcely raised his eyes upon any of us, during this unhappy repast. He soon went to bed and fell asleep; and after I had laid our little ones to rest, I knelt at the foot of the bed, on which my poor misguided husband was sleeping, and poured out my very soul to God, while my eyes were scalded with the bitterest tears I had ever shed. For I then foresaw, that unless some remedy could be employed, my best earthly friend, the father of my little children, would become a drunkard. The next morning, after breakfast, I ventured to speak with him upon the subject, in a mild way; and, though I could not restrain my tears, neither my words nor my weeping appeared to have any effect, and I saw he was becoming hardened, and careless of us all. How many nights have I waited, weeping alone at my once happy fireside, listening for the lifting latch, and wishing, yet dreading, to hear his steps at the door!

After this state of things had continued, or rather grown worse, for nearly three months, I put on my bonnet one morning, after my husband had gone to his work, and went to the Deacon's store; and, finding him alone, I stated my husband's case, and begged him earnestly to sell him no more. He told me it would do no good, for, if he did not sell it, some other person would sell it; and he doubted whether my husband took more than was good for him. He quoted Scripture to show that it was the wife's duty to keep at home, and submit herself to her husband, and not meddle with things that did not belong to her province. At this time, two or three customers called for rum, and the Deacon civilly advised me to go home and look after my children.

I went out with a heavy heart. It seemed as if the tide of evil was setting against me. As I was passing farmer Johnson's on my way home, they called me in. I sat down and rested myself for a few minutes in their neat cottage. Farmer Johnson was just returning from the field, and when I saw the little ones running to meet him at the stile, and the kind looks that passed between the good man and his wife, and when I remembered we were married on the same day, and compared my own fortune with theirs, my poor heart burst forth in a flood of tears. They all knew what I was weeping for, and farmer Johnson, in a kind manner, bade me cheer up, and put my trust in God's mercy, and remember that it was often darkest before daylight. The farmer and his wife were members of the temperance society, and had signed the pledge; and I have often heard him say, that he believed it had saved him from destruction. He had, before his marriage, and for a year after, been in the habit of taking a little every day. He was an industrious, thriving man; but shortly after his marriage he became bound for a neighbor, who ran off, and he was obliged to pay the debt. I have heard him declare, that, when the sheriff took away all his property, and stripped his little cottage, and scarcely left him those trifles secured to the poor man by law; and when he considered how ill his poor wife was at the time, in consequence of the loss of their child, that died only a month before, he was restrained from resorting to the bottle, in his moments of despair, by nothing but a recollection of the pledge he had signed. Farmer Johnson's minister was in favor of the pledge, and had often told him that affliction might weaken his judgment and his moral sense, and the pledge might save him at last, as the plank saves the life of a mariner; who is tossed upon the waves.

Our good clergyman was unfortunataly of a different opinion. He had often disapproved of pledges. The Deacon was of the same opinion; he thought very ill of pledges.

Month after month passed away, and our happiness was utterly destroyed. My husband neglected his business, and poverty began to stare us in the face. Notwithstanding my best exertions, it was hard work to keep my little ones decently clothed and sufficiently fed. If my husband earned a shilling, the dram-seller was as sure of it, as if it were already in his till. I some times thought I had lost all my affection for one who had proved so entirely regardless of those whom it was his duty to protect and sustain; but when I looked in the faces of our little children, the recollection of our early marriage days, and all his kind words and deeds soon taught me the strength of the principle that had brought us together.

I shall never cease to remember the anguish I felt when the constable took him to jail, upon a dram-seller's execution. Till that moment, I did not believe my affection could have survived, under the pressure of that misery, which he had brought upon us all. I put up such things of the little that remained to us, as I thought might be of use, and turned my back upon the spot where I had been very happy and very wretched. Our five little children followed, weeping bitterly. The jail was situated in the next town. "Oh, George," said I, "if you had only signed the pledge, it would not have come to this." He sighed and said nothing; and we walked nearly a mile in perfect silence. As we were leaving this village, we encountered our clergyman, going forth upon his morning ride. When I reflected that a few words from him would have induced my poor husband to sign the pledge, and that if he had done so he might have been the kind father and the affectionate husband that he once was, I own it cost me considerable effort to suppress my emotion. "Whither are you all going?" said the holy man. My husband, who always appeared extremely humble in presence of the minister, and replied to all his inquiries in a subdued tone of voice, answered, with unusual firmness, "To jail, reverend sir." "To jail!" said he, "ah, I see how it is; you have wasted your substance in riotous living, and are going to pay for your improvidence and folly. You have had the advantage of my precept and example, and you turned a deaf ear to the one, and neglected the other."

"Reverend sir," my husband replied, galled by this reproof, which appeared to him at that particular moment an unnecessary aggravation of his misery, "reverend sir, your precept and your example have been my ruin; I followed them both—you, who had no experience of the temptations to which your weaker brethren are liable, who are already addicted to the temperate and daily use of ardent spirits, advised me never to sign a pledge. You admitted that extraordinary occasions might justify the use of ardent spirits, and that on such occasions you might use it yourself. I followed your example, but it has been my misfortune never to drink spirituous liquors without finding that my occasions were more extraordinary than ever. Had I followed the example of neighbor Johnson, I should not have made a good wife miserable, nor my children beggars." While he uttered these last words, my poor husband looked upon his little ones, and burst into tears; and the minister rode slowly away without uttering a word.

I rejoiced even in the midst of our misery, to see that the heart of my poor George was tenderly affected; for it is not more needful that the hardness of wax should be subdued by fire, than that the heart of man should be softened by affliction, before a deep, lasting impression can be made. "Dear husband," said I, "we are young; it is not too late; let us trust in God, and all may be well." He made no reply, but continued to walk on, and weep in silence. Shortly after, the Deacon appeared, at some distance, coming towards us on the road; but as soon as he discovered who we were, he turned away into a private path. Even the constable seemed somewhat touched with compassion at our situation, and urged us to keep a good heart, for he thought some one might help us, when we least expected it. My husband, whose vein of humor would often display itself, even in hours of sadness, instantly replied, that the good Samaritan could not be far off, for the priest and the Levite had already passed by on the other side. But he little thought, poor man, that even the conclusion cf this beautiful parable was likely to be verified. A one horse waggon, at this moment, appeared to be coming down the hill behind us, at an unusually rapid rate, and the constable advised us, as the road was narrow, to stand aside and let it pass. It was soon up with us; and when the dust had cleared away, it turned out as little Robert had said, when it first appeared on the top of the hill, to be farmer Johnson's gray mare and yellow waggon. The kind-hearted farmer was out in an instant, and, without saying a word, was putting the children into it, one after another. A word from farmer Johnson was enough for any constable in the village. It was all the work of a moment. He shook my husband by the hand; and then he began, "Neighbor Johnson, you are the same kind friend"—"Get in," said he; "let us have no words about it. I must be at home in a trice; for," turning to me, "your old schoolmate, Susan, my wife, will sit crying at the window till she sees you safe home again." Saying this, he whipped the gray mare, who, regardless of the additional load, went up the hill faster than she came down, as though she entered into the spirit of the whole transaction.

It was not long before we reached the door of our cottage. Farmer Johnson took out the children; and while I was trying to find words to thank him for all his kindness, he was up in his wagon and off, before I could utter a syllable. Robert screamed after him, to tell Tim Johnson to come over, and that he should have all his pinks and marigolds. When we entered the cottage, there were bread and meat and milk upon the table, which Susan, the farmer's wife, had brought over for the children. I could not help sobbing aloud, for my heart was full. "Dear George," said I, turning to my husband, "you used to pray; let us thank God for this great deliverance from evil." "Dear Jenny," said he, "I fear God will scarcely listen to my poor prayers, after all my offences; but I will try."

We closed the cottage door, and he prayed with so much humility of heart, and so much earnestness of feeling, that I felt almost sure that God's grace would be lighted up, in the bosom of this unhappy man, if sighs, and tears, and prayers, could find their way to heaven. He was very grave, and said little or nothing that night. The next morning, when I woke up, I was surprised, as the sun had not risen, to find that he had already gone down. At first I felt alarmed, as such a thing had become unusual with him of late years; but my anxious feelings were agreeably relieved, when the children told me their father had been hoeing for an hour in the potato field, and was mending the garden fence. With our scanty materials, I got ready the best breakfast I could, and he sat down to it, with a good appetite, but said little; and now and then I saw the tears starting in his eyes.

I had many fears that he would fall back into his former habits whenever he should meet his old companions, or stop in again at the Deacon's store, and I was about urging him to move into another village. After breakfast, he took me aside, and asked me if I had not a gold ring. "George," said I, "that ring was my mother's; she took it from her finger and gave it to me the day that she died. I would not part with that ring unless it were to save life. Besides, if we are industrious and honest, we shall not be forsaken." "Dear Jenny," said he, "I know how you prize that gold ring; I never loved you more than when you wept over it, while you first told me the story of your mother's death; it was just a month before we were married, the last Sabbath evening in May, Jenny, that we were walking by the river. I wish you would bring that ring." Memory hurried me back in an instant, to the scene, the bank upon the river's side where we sat together and agreed upon a wedding day. I brought down the ring, and he asked me, with such an earnestness of manner, to put it on his finger, that I did so; not however, without a trembling hand and a misgiving heart. "And now, Jenny," said he, as he rose up to go out, "pray that God will support me."

My mind was not in a happy state, for I felt some doubts of his intentions. From a little hill at the back of our cottage we had a fair view of the Deacon's store. I went up to the top of it, and while I watched my husband's steps, no one can tell how fervently I prayed to God to guide them aright. I saw two of his old companions standing in the store door, with glasses in their hands; and, as he came in front of the shop, I saw them beckon him in. It was a sad moment for me. "Oh, George," said I, though I knew he could not hear me, "go on; remember your poor wife and starving children!" My heart sank within me, when I saw him stop and turn towards the door. He shook hands with his old friends; they appeared to offer him their glasses; I saw him shake his head and pass on. "Thank God," said I, and ran down the hill with a light step, and seizing my baby at the cottage door, I literally covered it with kisses, and bathed it in tears of joy.

About ten o'clock, Richard Lane, the Squire's office boy, brought in a piece of meat and some meal, saying my husband sent word, that he could not be home till night, as he was at work on the Squire's barn. Richard added, that the Squire had engaged him for two months. He came home early, and the children ran down the hill to meet him. He was grave, but cheerful. "I have prayed for you, dear husband," said I. "And a merciful God has supported me, Jenny," said he. It is not easy to measure the degrees of happiness; but take it altogether, this, I think, was the happiest evening of my life. If there is great joy in heaven over a sinner that repenteth, there is no less joy in the heart of a faithful wife, over a husband that was lost, and is found. In this manner the two months went away. In addition to the common labor, he found time to cultivate the garden, and make and mend a variety of useful articles about the house.

It was soon understood that my husband had reformed, and it was more generally believed, because he was a subject of sneers of a large number of the Deacon's customers. My husband used to say, "Let those laugh that are wise and win. He was an excellent workman, and business came to him from all quarters. He was soon able to repay neighbor Johnson, and our families lived in the closest friendship of each other.

One evening farmer Johnson said to my husband that he thought it would be well for him to sign the temperance pledge, that he did not advise it, when he first began to leave off spirits, for he feared his strength might fail him. "But now," said he, "you have continued five months, without touching a drop, and it would be well for the cause that you should sign the pledge." "Friend Johnson," said my husband, "when a year has gone safely by, I will sign the pledge. For five months, instead of the pledge, I have in every trial or temptation—and a drinking man knows well the force and meaning of these words—I have relied on this gold ring, to renew my strength, and remind me of my duty to God, to my wife, to my children, and to society. Whenever the struggle of appetite has commenced, I have often looked upon this ring, I have remembered that it was given, with the last words and dying counsels of an excellent mother, to my wife, who placed it there; and under the blessing of Almighty God, it has proved thus far the life-boat of a drowning man."

The year soon passed away, and on the very day twelvemonth, on which I had put that ring on my husband's finger, farmer Johnson brought over the temperance book. We all sat down to the tea-table together. After supper was done, little Robert climbed up and kissed his father, and turned to farmer Johnson, "Father," said he, "has not smelt like old Isaac, the drunken fiddler, once since we rode home in your yellow waggon." The farmer opened his book, my husband signed the pledge of the Society, and with tears in his eyes, gave me back —ten thousand times more precious than ever —MY MOTHER'S GOLD RING.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES—THE JEWS.

At the recent anniversary of the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, the Rev. Dr. Tyng submitted and remarked upon the following resolution :—

Resolved, That the signs of the times are such as should rouse all who love the Lord Jesus Christ and wait for his salvation to renewed earnestness and enlarged effort in this holy enterprise.

Dr. T. said there was no cause in the whole circle of Christian effort he esteemed before the one in advocacy of which he rose. As the signs of the times are brought before the view, we see the necessity of the conversion of the Jews. Some thought the conversion of the world was to be like a gradual dawning of light to the fullness of day. He did not see this; he was one who looked for another dispensation—that this great work was to be instant, not gradual, as if the noonday sun should start suddenly from the darkened midnight sky. He looked for the coming of Christ for a second time, and in that Jerusalem shall take her promised place as the head of the nations. She is to be established as the metropolis of an empire such as present monarchies in vain attempt to typify. There comes a day when Jewish hands are to unlock the doors of spiritual consolation, and hordes of Gentiles are to seek for admission. When I see the whole history of prophecy coming to a conclusion—when I behold the present upheaving of the ten parts of the old Roman Empire—when these kingdoms are destroyed, what then? Does prophecy stop at nothing? No, it stops with a returning heavenly monarch to gather His people—it stops where a mighty Conquerer comes forth and sets up His throne in His long suffering Jerusalem. Does any one doubt this result? The signs of the times urge us to advance this very thing—the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him. He then read the following poem of Charlotte Elizabeth—"The Signs of the Times,"—as expressing all he could desire to say, had he even time at his command.

There, said he is a beautiful list of the signs of the times in which we live. Well has it been said, that the redemption of the ancient people of God was an object nearest her heart, her dearest wish on earth. Well has it been said, that when He shall come to perfect this redemption, she will be with Him!

WAR ON CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES.

One of the conditions of the treaty with Mexico, it is said, is that any future war which may break out between the two countries shall be conducted on Christian principles. Now we all know this is an age of progress, and that all sorts of improvements are constantly going on in all sorts of matters, but war on Christian principles is certainly the latest, and if it be carried out, we think it will prove the greatest of all.

Just imagine it; we think we can see the two armies drawn out in battle array. A fair field is before them; the ranks are formed, the positions are taken, the great guns are unlimbered. Gen. Scott is just about to give the orders to fire, when an aid comes and respectfully reminds him that "the war is to be conducted on Christian principles," and that it will not do to fire. "Very true, very true," says the commander-in-chief, "but what are they? I have read Vauban, Scheiter, and Turenne, and Cockburn. I have read the lives of old conquerors, and have studied the campaigns of the soldiers; but I never happened to come across these principles in any work upon the military art. Do you know any thing about them, Colonel?"

"No."

"Nor you, Major?"

"No."

"Nor I, either."

"I really don't know how to begin; I suppose it would not do to shoot. Suppose we send for the Chaplain?"

The Chaplain arrives,—"Do you know any thing about this fighting on Christian principles?"

"Oh yes; it is the easiest thing in the world."

"Where are the books?"

"Here;" and the Chaplain takes out the "Bible."

"Really," says the General, "we ought to have thought of this before. It is a bad time to commence the study of tactics when the enemy is right before us; but I suppose we are bound by the treaty. What is the first thing, Mr. Chaplain?"

"Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

"But these are not neighbors. They are Mexicans."

"The same book tells us a little farther on, that the opportunity to do good to a man makes him our neighbor."

"Will you go on, Mr. Chaplain?"

"Love your enemies. Do good to them that hate you. Pray for them that despitefully use you. If a man smite you on one cheek, turn to him the other."

"But while we are praying for the Mexicans, they will be firing into us."

"No: they are bound by the treaty, also. It works both ways."

"Then what is the use of our arms?"

"This is also provided for in the same book. Beat your swords into ploughshares, and your spears into pruning hooks."

"Then I don't see as there is anything for us to do here."

"Nothing, unless you send over and ask Santa Anna if he needs any thing in the way of medicine, or provisions, or clothing. I rather think the treaty requires this of us. And I don't know but we ought to send them a few schoolmasters, for I understand they are a shocking ignorant people."

"But how do you know which party conquers in this fighting on Christian principles?"

"That is the great beauty of it. Both sides conquer, and there are never any killed and wounded."

Now this is all the way that we know of conducting war on Christian principles. In any demand which may be made on this State for men to carry on a war with Mexico, we think the Governor will best consult the conditions of the treaty by directing that the recruits shall all come from the peace society. He should appoint Thomas Anthony, Colonel of the regiment, and John Meader, Major, and he should go down to Newport on the first seventh day after the second sixth day in the sixth month, and quietly walk into the Yearly Meeting and ask the clerk to draw up a plan of the campaign. That is the way to fight on Christian principles.

HISTORY OF AN ENGLISH MINISTER.

The history of the elevation Mr. Labouchere, now a member of the British Cabinet, presents a curious combination of impudence and good fortune.

In 1822, Mr. Labouchere, then a clerk in the house of the banker, M. Hope, at Amsterdam, was sent by his employer to Lord Baring, the celebrated London banker, in order to negotiate a loan. He displayed in this affair great ability, and gained the esteem of the English banker.

"Zounds!" said Labouchere, one day, "Lord Baring, your daughter is charming, and you ought to give me her hand."

"Young man! no pleasantry," said the astonished banker, in a tone of severity. "I like you much, but be assured that my daughter shall never become the wife of a clerk."

"But," said Labouchere, "suppose I was associated with Mr. Hope?"

"Oh! that would be a different affair, and would materially lessen the difference of rank."

On his return to Amsterdam, Labouchere said to his employer, "I wish to associate myself with your house."

"My friend, you are not serious," exclaimed Mr. Hope. "You are without fortune, and ——."

"But suppose I was the son-in-law of Lord Baring."

"In that case you should have my consent on the spot."

Fortified by these two promises, Labouchere, returned to England, and two months after he espoused the daughter of Lord Baring, because Mr. Hope had promised to associate him in his banking house, and he became one of the partners in the house of Hope, because he was the son-in-law of Lord Baring.

MORE ABOUT THE ANTI-SABBATH CONVENTION.

It is not popular, we know, to say much about this movement, except in the way of condemnation and denunciation. Still we cannot withhold our approval from some things connected with it, nor can we misrepresent and caricature other things which we disapprove, even though such a course may be necessary to keep company with our orthodox cotemporaries. Several of the speeches delivered on the occasion, by influential members of the Convention, have recently fallen into our hands. The view which they give of the opinions and motives of the principal actors, differs widely from that given by the various newspaper reporters. The Convention has often been represented as aiming to do away with the observance of Sunday, so as to make it a day of business or amusement. But this representation is not sustained either by the speeches or by the resolutions. Indeed, we see not how any one who has candidly heard or read these documents could entertain such a notion for a moment, since it is repeatedly and distinctly repudiated. If we may judge from the speeches before us, we should say that the abuse, or rather the refusal to make a good use of the Sunday, was the principal occasion of calling the Convention. Most of those who signed the Call, it is well known, have long been engaged in promoting the various reforms of the day—anti-slavery, temperance, peace, prison-discipline, and the like. In laboring for these objects, they have found it more difficult to get the ears of the people on the first day of the week than on any other, although that day is professedly devoted to moral and religious purposes. When they have applied to ministers of the Gospel for the privilege of addressing their congregations upon these subjects on Sunday, they have often been put off, and refused a hearing, because that day was too holy for such a purpose. Of course these refusals have led them to examine into the character and claims of the Sunday. In many cases their examination has resulted in a conviction that the day has no claim to be regarded as the Sabbath; and that even if it had, the assertion of our Saviour that 'it is right to do good on the Sabbath day,' would justify its use for the purposes which they have proposed. This point is presented at length, in two speeches before us, one by Rev. John M. Spear, and the other by Rev. Samuel May, Jr. The latter gentleman, who is a Unitarian preacher of considerable notoriety, concluded his speech as follows:—

"The essential views which have been declared in this Convention are in harmony with those put forth, in times past, by the Unitarian body. I grew up in that body. I never was instructed from their pulpits to hold the first day of the week as the Sabbath of God's command. When, at a subsequent period, I entered upon the study of my profession, I did not find the Sunday held or inculcated as the Sabbath, but as the Lord's day, a day commemorative of the resurrection and the gospel of Jesus Christ. It certainly was a day set apart, among Unitarians, as other sects, for religious, or it may be sectarian purposes; but not as time holier in itself than any other time, nor was it called the Sabbath. And I contend that it is little better than a fraud to give the name of Sabbath, in any case, to the first day of the week. 'The seventh day,' said the Jewish law, the only law which ever established a Sabbath, 'the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.' What right has any man, or body of men, to alter this, and say, 'The first day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God?' The Seventh-day Baptists are the only consistent Sabbatarians among the Christian sects of this country. Looking into the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, they find no other day prescribed as a Sabbath, but the seventh, and to that they adhere, and are consistent in doing so. All others, who profess to hold sacred the authority of the Scriptures, are inconsistent with themselves, and undermine their own position, by maintaining that the first day of the week is the Sabbath."

The following extracts are from a speech of Rev. Theodore Parker, which we find reported in the Liberator. They will help the reader to form some correct idea of the views and spirit of the men who took part in this movement which is every where spoken against:—

"For considerably more than three centuries, [after the introduction of Christianity,] there was not any claim made for any divine command for keeping the first day of the week; and the Catholic notion of the Sunday, at the present day, is this—that it is a day set apart by the church, for the purpose of honoring God. The Catholic maintains that the church is superior to the Bible, to all books and all laws, to every thing on earth. In its creed, the Catholic church had power to separate one day from the rest for religious observances. It had the power, and it exercised the power by separating the first day of the week. It regarded as equally holy the Passover, (Easter,) and the whole period of eight days, formerly observed by the Jews, commemorative of the 'Resurrection' of Jesus. Then it set apart the day of Pentecost, and a week then, because that was the anniversary of the 'Ascension,' and 'Inspiration' of the Christians. Then there is a third series—the day when Jesus first showed himself to the people—the Epiphany. A fourth period was the anniversary of Christ's birth, or Christmas. All these days are regarded by the Catholic church, at this very time, as equally holy with the Sunday. In addition to these, are the anniversaries of the birth of several important saints, which are regarded in the Catholic church in the same light as the Sunday—days separated from the common purposes of life; not fast days, not work days, not days of sanctimonious longfacedness, but days peculiarly devoted to religion, to society, and to joy."

"It is commonly supposed that our New England notion respecting Sunday, is a very old notion; but it seems to me that that is a very great mistake. I know it is a mistake, and experience, I think, has shown that it is a sad mistake. I do not find that any considerable number of persons ever entertained our New England notions, until less than 300 years ago. About the year 1595, Mr. Bound, an English Puritan, wrote a book respecting the Sabbath, in which he claimed that the Hebrew Sabbath was of divine origin, but maintained that, after the resurrection, the Sabbath, and all the laws respecting the Sabbath, were miraculously transferred to the first day of the week. Therefore, all Christians were bound to observe the first day of the week, just as the Jews were bound to observe their Sabbath. That was regarded by intelligent churchmen—as it was—as a very great heresy in the church. Religious men said it was a heresy, and they said right, because it was an innovation, and there was nothing to warrant it. Political men said it was an absurdity, and it was an absurdity. The book was written in the days of fanaticism, when the public were rising against the abominations, and frivolity, and wickedness of the Roman church." * * * *

"It is sometimes said that the present prevalent notions respecting Sunday, notwithstanding they are untrue, superstitious, and unchristian, are yet 'safe,' and therefore it is very improper to come forward and oppose them. Therefore this Convention is likely to be a very wicked Convention, although it should say nothing but what is true. I heard a man say, that if he had the whole of God Almighty's truth shut up in his left hand, he would not allow a man to unlock his little finger. That is not my creed at all. I do not believe mankind is in the least danger of being ruined by an excess of truth. I have that confidence in truth, that I fear it not under any circumstances; but I do fear error, whether coming from churches, states, or majorities, or minorities, in the world."

A METHODIST MUSEUM.

Under this head the editor of Zion's Herald places the following curiosities. If he supposes they are found among Methodists alone, he is greatly mistaken, for there is scarcely any denomination in which some specimens may not be found:—

1. A professor of religion, praying with great fervor that God would convert the world, yet never giving a cent for missions.
2. A man getting shouting-happy and telling how much he loves the cause of God, and how much he is willing to deny self, yet fretting and scolding if any one asks for a little money.
3. A professor, too poor to take a religious newspaper, yet taking three or four political ones.
4. A Christian brother, very much hurt in his feelings to hear his minister refer to politics on the Sabbath, yet spending the whole Sabbath noon conversing on doings in Congress, and the probability of Taylor or Calhoun being the next President.
5. Another one, who thinks it very wrong to desecrate the Sabbath by holding temperance meetings on the evening of that day, yet spends the same in visiting his neighbors, or going to see his hired man about the work for Monday morning.
6. A Christian brother, very much opposed to anything like ornamenting our churches, such as furnishing them with blinds, carpeting the aisles, or cushioning the pulpit, yet furnishing his own dwelling with rich carpets, astral lamps, and splendid sofas.
7. A follower of the Prince of Peace, with his heart running over with the war-spirit, and rejoicing at the destruction of his fellow men.

CURIOUS NAMES.

A correspondent of the Boston Investigator enumerates some of the curious Christian names by which individuals were designated in Boston about the year 1640, and also presents an extract, on the same subject, from Hume's "History of England." The following list of odd names to christen children with, is copied from the records of the town of Boston in the year above mentioned:—

"Deliverance Beck; Strange Beck; Free-Grace Bendall; Reform Bendall; Hoped-for Bendall; Seaborne Cotton; Fathergone Dinely; Return Gridley; Believe Gridley; Tremble Gridley; Hope Hawkins; Constance Milan; Patience Rice; Hopestill Vicall; Waitstill Winthrop; Posthumus Dutchfield; Honor Mahone; Faith Munt; Joyliffe Rudock; Temperance Sweet; New-grace Wilson; Satisfaction Belcher; Exercise Shattuck; Redemption Scott; Christian Stoddard; Remembrance Amery; Desire-the-Truth Akers; Purchase Gibson; Zwzishaddai Browne; Pedajah Pormort."

The following, from Hume's "History of England," is the extract alluded to. It relates to the Christian names of the Puritans during the time of the eccentric Cromwell:—

"It was usual (says the historian) for the pretended saints of this time to change their names from Henry, Edward, Anthony, William, which they regarded as heathenish, into others more sanctified and holy; even the New Testament names, James, Andrew, John, Peter, were not held in such regard as those which were borrowed from the Old Testament—Hezekiah, Habakkuk, Zerubbabel. Sometimes a whole godly sentence was adopted as a name. Here are the Christian names of a Jury, empannelled in the county of Sussex about that time:—

"'Accepted, Redeemed, Faint Not, Make Peace, God Reward, Stand Fast on High, Earth, Called, Kill Sin, Return, Be Faithful, Fly Debate, Fight the Good Fight, Hope For, Graceful, Weep Not, Meek.'"

"Cromwell," says Cleveland, "hath beat up his drums clear through the Old Testament. You may learn the genealogy of our Saviour, by the names of his regiments. The muster master has no other list than the first chapter of St. Matthew. The brother of Praise-God Barebone had for a name, If Christ had not died for you, you would have been damned Barebone. But the people, tired of this long name, retained only the last words, and commonly gave him the appellation of Damned Barebone."

Education among the Indians.—The documents accompanying the Message of the President of the United States to Congress, shows that several Indian tribes have appropriated large sums for the establishment and support of institutions of learning. The Cherokees have appropriated $35,000 for two seminaries, one for males, and one for females, at Tahlequa. The erection of the necessary buildings has been commenced. Besides neighborhood schools, the Choctaws have three academies for boys, and five female seminaries, which cost them $30,000 a year. The Chickasaws have appropriated $5,000 for buildings, and $6,000 annually, for the support of a manual labor school, to be conducted by Methodist missionaries. The Creeks have appropriated $12,000 for buildings and improvements, and $8,000 annually, for the support of two schools, one Methodist, and the other Presbyterian. The U. S. Government will make efforts to induce other tribes having large annuities, to make similar appropriations.

Temperance and Intelligence in the Sandwich Islands.—A Sandwich Island paper of Dec. 25, 1847, says that a public celebration and Temperance Feast was held by the pupils of the Native Schools at Honolulu on the 12th of November, in the vicinity of the town, in which the King and Chiefs participated. About 800 scholars, nearly 500 parents, and a large number of spectators were present. Upward of 500 tables were arranged for the repast, at which some 153 pigs, 469 fowls, 215 geese, together with ducks, turkeys, fish, vegetables, fruit, &c. &c., in like quantities were demolished. These celebrations are held under the auspices of the missionaries, and are becoming deservedly popular.

The same paper says that a large invoice of standard books from the establishment of the Harpers in New York, was received at Honolulu, Oct. 20, and in less than six weeks about $1,000 worth had been retailed among the townpeople and foreign residents. The foreign residents of East Maui, had ordered an entire set of Harper's Family Library, consistsng of 172 volumes.

Protestantism in France.—It is stated that in 1836 there were but 50 evangelical ministers, and less than 40 colporteurs, employed in France. There are now employed over 300 ministers, near 80 evangelists, and between 200 and 300 colporteurs. Rev. Dr. Cheever of New York, in a discourse delivered April 30, said: "It is a remarkable providence, that so many are ready to enter the field for diffusing religious knowledge, if they could only be sustained. Some that had been banished are returning with increased knowledge and zeal. The Seminary at Paris had numbers already prepared to preach the pure gospel; the Waldenses also, had their mission institution for pouring light upon Italy; and it was a most interesting fact, that the reformed college at Malta, composed in part of such as had been classically educated at Rome, had now about fifty in training for the sacred ministry."

The Lutherans.—The N. Y. Journal of Commerce, of May 19, says that the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the United States, has been holding its triennial meeting for the last five days in this city. Many facts of interest have been elicited, serving to show the rapid growth of the denomination among us. The clergy, now numbering about 650, stand high in the scale of respectability and intelligence. They have under their charge 1,650 congregations, to which are attached 200,000 members. Their yearly increase by immigration is about 20,000, and by membership 8,000. They also possess three incorporated colleges and five theological seminaries, in which about 150 young men are in course of preparation for the ministry.

The Home and Foreign Missions of the Lutherans are yet in their incipiency, but are on a firm basis. The former has supported 17 missionaries, in whole or in part, during the last three years, has built 12 houses of worship, and organized 30 congregations. The latter mission consists of two laborers, who are located in Guntoor, India. A speedy enlargement is contemplated. There is at present a considerable surplus of funds in their treasuries;—the only difficulty is in procuring suitable men.

Aid to Ireland.—The Irish Relief Committee of this City have published a full report of the important transactions with which they were entrusted. It appears that the total cash donations for Ireland amounted to $171,374 24, and the donations in breadstuffs, provision, and clothing, to $70,650 45;—total, $262,042 99. The largest single gift was that of Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs, the Washington bankers—$5,000; a lady also gave $1,000 by the hands of Wm. Wood, Esq; James L. Wadsworth, Esq., of Genesee, $1,000. On the 2d of February last there was a balance of $600 in the hands of the Treasurer. The following is a list of the various articles sent out:

4,570 bbls. wheat flour, 33,075 bbls. Indian corn meal, 234 half bbls. do, 2,520 bbls. Indian corn, 7,293 bags do, 191 bbls. rye flour, 57 bbls. rye, 29 bags do., 78 bbls. buckwheat, 283 bbls. peas and beans, 13 bbls. oat meal, 135 bbls. barley, 6 bbls. barley meal, 69 bbls. beef and pork, 184 packages clothing, 2 boxes arrow root, 2 bales hops, 2 bbls fish, 4 bbls. potatoes, 2 bbls. oats, 2 packages cheese, 3 packages bacon, 1 ham, 1 roll leather, 1 bbl. vinegar.

By a statement annexed to the report, it appears that the amount of freights paid by the British Government on articles sent from this country for the relief of Ireland and Scotland, was £42,673 17s. or upward of $210,000.

The American Sunday-School Union.—This Society held its 24th Anniversary in Philadelphia on the 15th inst. From the reports presented, it appears that the receipts of the Society during the past year have been $137,468, of which 41,092 was from donations and legacies, $103,010 from sales, and $2,365 loans and balances for last year. The total expenditures have been $137,296. The Society is now indebted for paper, binding, &c., $14,198 25, which with the overdraft of the donation account ($8,017 99,) makes a present debt of $22,216 24, which added to the amount of loans bearing interest $44,960 29, exhibits an indebtedness of $67,176 53. Forty-three Sunday School Missionary Colporteurs have been employed for various periods of time in 17 different States and Territories. These colporteurs have established 770 new schools, or 251 more than were established by the same means last year; and have visited and revived over 1000 other schools, embracing 11,004 teachers and 81,808 scholars. They have distributed by sale and donation near $15,000 worth of religious books for children and youth. Their salaries and expenses were $11,894 04. Eighty-three new publications have been issued during the last year, amounting to a fraction short of 10,000 pages, 18mo. new reading matter. Of the whole number of publications the past year 53 were written for the Society. Not more than one in ten of the works offered for publication during the year, have been approved for the Society's purposes. The circulation of the Sunday School Journal and Youth's Penny Gazette has increased; of the latter over 150,000 numbers have been published per month, or more than 2,000,000 numbers in the year. This is not attended with profit to the Society, the price merely covering the outlay for paper and printing. The total value of publications distributed during the year is $125,873 33; a larger amount than has ever been circulated by the Society in any one year since its organization.

Steam Communication with China.—This subject is now eliciting considerable attention at Washington. Hon. T. Butler King, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has presented an able report upon the plan. It proposes a monthly line of steamers from Monterey or San Francisco to Shanghai and Canton, by way of the Alentian or Fox Islands, together with a branch line from one of the former ports to the Sandwich Islands. By communicating with the line of steamships which will soon commence running from New York to Panama and Oregon, a monthly mail will be thus established between the United States and China, through which intelligence can be transmitted in the short space of thirty days. Should a railroad to the Pacific be hereafter constructed, the time will be shortened to twenty days, rendering this route by far the most direct communication between England China. The following is the statement of the distance, given in the report, which is about half that of the present sailing routes by the Cape of Good Hope or Cape Horn.

From New York to Chagres	miles 2,500
From thence to Panama	50
From Panama to Monterey or San Francisco	3,000
From Francisco to Shanghai	5,400
Total distance from New York to Shanghai	10,950

Russian Version of the French Revolution.—When the news of the French Revolution first reached St. Petersburg, the Emperor Nicholas gave proof of his fears that a knowledge of the glorious fact might excite rebellion among his own subjects, by suppressing for a time the publication of the only daily journal in the city. We have yet another evidence of these fears in the following article, which was published under the sanction of the Russian censorship of the press at Warsaw:

"At Paris, there was a riot, which was promptly put down. His Majesty, Louis Philippe, is seriously indisposed, and by the advice of his physicians, he has resolved to abstain for some time from the affairs of Government, and go to take the sea baths at Brighton. On the King's departure there was a slight commotion, which was repressed, and which resulted in the retreat of M. Guizot. During his absence, the King has confided the direction of affairs to Count Mole."

Methodist General Conference.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church commenced its session at Pittsburgh, on the 1st inst. We understand that strong resolutions against slavery were adopted, and a strong feeling manifested for the heathen in this Christian land. A correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser says:—

"The present Conference may be styled an anti-slavery body. Every Northern man who voted with the South four years ago, has been left at home; many who could not then be elected, on accconnt of their abolitionism, are now here; and many who removed from the South, refusing to join in the secession, have been rewarded for so doing by a seat in this body. It would seem, therefore, that there is little reason to hope that any considerable concessions will be made to the South by this General Conference."

Plain Talk.—In a sermon preached by the late Rev. Dr. Chalmers, there occurs the following pointed paragraph, which we recommend to the attention of those people who dare not dissent from the doctrines of their minister, lest he should find them out and lecture them for their confidence in their own opinions:—

"Do you ever dare to bring your favorite minister to the tribunal of the world, or would you tremble at the presumption of such an attempt? —Now this want of daring, this trembling at the idea of a dissent from your minister, and this indolent acquiescence in his doctrine, is just 'calling' another man 'master;' it is putting the authority of man over the authority of God; it is throwing yourself into a prostrate attitude at the footstool of infallibility; it is, without the name of Popery, infecting your soul with its substantial poison, and weighing down your conscience by the shackles of Popery."

Correction.—Some weeks ago we published a letter written by Hon. John I. Singerland to the editor of the Albany Evening Journal, giving an acconnt of the departure from Washington, by railroad, of about fifty of the colored people who failed in their attempt to escape from slavery in the schooner Pearl. In that letter it was stated that Hope H. Slatter, the notorious stave-trader, who had just bought these men and women, was a member of the Methodist Church. It is now said, that Slatter is not a member of the Methodist Church, and that the Methodist Church does not countenance the slave-trade in the hands of its members. The error probably arose from the fact that several members of Mr. Slatter's family belong to the Methodist Church, in which he is a pew-holder.

Newspapers among Mahomedans.—Rev. Mr. Calhoun, of the Syrian Mission, says that the first news paper in all the Turkish dominions was started by an American Missionary some seventeen years since, and printed in the English language, for foreign residents, who explained it to others, and thus afforded a sample to the government and nation. The only newspaper now printed in the Turkish language was originated and conducted chiefly by an Englishman.

Fourth of July Celebrations.—The New York City Temperance Society, and the American Temperance Union, have issued a circular, recommending that temperance meetings should be held simultaneously in every city and town in the Union, on the Fourth of July next, as a peculiarly appropriate mode of celebrating that day.

Religious Liberty in France.—The editor of the Missionary Chronicle has received a letter from the Committee of the Evangelical Missionary Society of France, dated Paris, March 17, in which it is stated that the work of evangelization was never in a more prosperous state. The letter says:—

"There is entire liberty of conscience, complete equality of churches, the liberty of holding meetings. We have no more fetters to fear in the prosecution of our evangelizing labors, no more suits at law for holding religious meetings; our efforts now will meet with no obstacles, except the limited amount of our pecuniary means. Our work has but commenced; an immense field is now open before us; it is completely free, and if we have sufficient resources, we may send our evangelists, teachers, and colporteurs everywhere."

THOUGHTS FOR EMIGRATING CHRISTIANS.

A correspondent of the New York Baptist Register, writing from Wisconsin, makes the following appropriate suggestion on exhortation to Christians at the East who contemplate a removal to the far West:—

"In the first place, seriously inquire if your religion will bear transportation. You may think it a difficult problem to solve till the trial is made. If I mistake not, your past experience furnishes elements for a correct conclusion in the case. Have you, since entering the church, depended upon the deacons and influential brethren to feel all the interest in the cause and perform all the labor? Your seat in the sanctuary may have been filled on pleasant days, and your name may have counted one on the church records. But how has it been with the Sabbath-school and prayer-meeting; have you never had time or strength to perform the labor they require? In your pilgrimage have you been borne forward by the good brethren that love Zion? This being your character, should you be taken away from the precious privileges and influences enjoyed by the mass of Christians in the Empire State, and be placed in the wilds of Wisconsin, among strangers of every grade of sentiment and character, twenty miles from a place of worship, with no kind pastor to take you by the hand and lead you on to heaven, what would you do then? Give your heart to the world, of course, and neglect the duties of religion, as facts prove with a painful certainty.

Though we greatly need the assistance of faithful Christians in this new country, we do not wish for such till converted. With emotions that only a Western man can fully understand, I am compelled to say, that we are sorely afflicted with such Christians already. Land owners may rejoice in your coming, but be assured the steadfast friends of Jesus will not."

SOCIAL HABITS OF THE CHINESE.

A missionary in China writes:—"The social character of the people invites the labors of oral instructors. In no heathen country do we find such attention paid to friendly intercourse. The people of all classes love to talk, and hours may be spent in social visits and pleasant converse. The scholar will often leave his books, the farmer his plough, the workman his tools, and the merchant his trade, to sit down and have a friendly interchange of thoughts and opinions, to learn the news of the day, or to discuss matters of dress, of custom, of foreign manners, and of idle gossip. Formal visits are received and returned with the utmost politeness and ceremony, and opportunities for seeing and talking with men, women, and children, are to be met with at all hours of the day. It need not be feared that the complaisance which Chinese show towards each other, will not be manifested towards foreigners. On the contrary the people love to be noticed and spoken to by us. A kind and gentle mien, a pleasant word, a friendly salutation, will ever meet with a corresponding return from the most menial Chinaman. In this respect, missionaries to China have a peculiar advantage over those who, in countries less civilized or wholly barbarous, are looked upon as beings of another order, or coming from some unknown corner of creation. Here our lives and property are not only secure, but we can form part of the social circle, and talk to the people of peace and pardon through the blood of the Lamb. Common politeness will lead our hearers to listen. What an opening this for those who are gifted with conversational powers, and grace to employ them in God's service!"

General Intelligence.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

The SENATE had under consideration, and finally passed, the bill previously passed by the House, for the admission of Wisconsin as a State into the Federal Union. Besides this, the only subject of general interest under discussion, was the bill in favor of extending aid to Yucatan by the military occupation of the country. There has been plenty of speech-making, but no definite action, upon this bill. The Senate resolved to adjourn from Monday to Thursday of this week, on account of the National Convention at Baltimore, as is generally believed, although it is nominally to allow of putting their room in summer dress.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, a bill was passed granting farther pensions to revolutionary soldiers; also a bill creating additional examiners in the patent office, and a bill to refund moneys advanced to volunteers in fitting them out for Mexico. The House, like the Senate, adjourned from Monday morning to Thursday of this week.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston on Sunday last, bringing Liverpool dates to May 6. The state of Europe generally had been more settled for a week previous to the steamer's leaving, but the long continuance of that state of things was not very confidently counted upon. The leading items of intelligence will be found below.

Wilber & Smith's Times, of May 6, says that the return of the French Election are now completed, and notwithstanding the utmost exertion of the Ultra Republicans and Communists, who left neither fair or foul means untried to effect their purpose, the lists exhibit a triumphant testimony to the popularity of the principles propounded and acted upon by Lamartine, and the moderate party. Indeed so clearly and prominently has this expression of popular feeling been manifested, that some fears are entertained of the minority resorting to ulterior measures in order to render the past proceedings nugatory.

The opening of the French Chambers took place on the 4th inst., when every thing passed eff satisfactorily. The President of the Republic was not to be declared until the following day.

A serious affair has taken place between the moral-force and physical-force repealers in Limerick, Ireland. Mitchell and Meagher, it is said, came near being killed, and had to flee in disguise.

Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, have formed a treaty offensive and defensive. The difficulties in Boden still continue, but the republicans have been generally defeated.

Herwegh, with his battalion of German workmen from France, has been defeated near Friburgh.

There are violent dissensions in Behemia, between the Sclavonian and German people.

There has been a strike of all the printers of Berlin.

A conspiracy has been discovered and suppressed at Warsaw among the Russian soldiers.

The Danes are retreating from Holstein. No more battles had taken place.

All quiet at Vienna.

At Pesth, Hungary, there has been a serious riot, so that it was necessary to send to Vienna for troops. 24 persons were killed.

An amicable settlement between Austria and Italy is said to be in prospect.

There have been no serious battles in Italy, but in several skirmishes the Austrians have gained the advantage.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE AT NEWBERN, N. C.—On Sunday, 23d ult., Mr. Wilson Chance, having previously discovered a bee tree, took his son Henry, a lad about ten years old, and three half-brothers, Stanley, Isaiah, and James Mabley, and proceeded to cut it down, for the purpose of hiving the bees. While taking out the honey, Isaiah, James, and Henry ate of it. After securing the bees and the honey, Mr. Chance and the boys returned to the house and on the way his son Henry became blind and sick. On reaching home, salt and water was administered to him, which caused vomiting, and gave him relief. Two of the young men, Isaiah and James Mabley, then proceeded on toward their father's house, and on the way Isaiah was taken in a similar way, and in his blindness wandered out of the path; James having eaten a small piece of bread, as it is called, on his way homeward, was discovered to be blind, and soon became helpless; he comcomplained of a pain in his back, and continued to grow worse; after all that could be done, he expired in half an hour after eating the last piece of bee-bread. Search was then made for Isaiah, whom a neighbor had found, and was met carrying him home, blind and helpless. By the frequent use of salt and water, Isaiah and Henry recovered the next day, but not until their lives had been despaired of. This is a melancholy and most afflictive case, and should serve as a warning to all persons to be careful in eating honey taken from bee trees.

HORRIBLE TRAGEDY.—In Edgecomb, Me., on Thursday night, a man named Pinkham, a ship carpenter, cut off the heads of his wife and four children!—two boys and two girls, the oldest 12 years of age—and then cut his own throat with a razor! The deed was not discovered until Friday morning. Pinkham's own mother was the first who discovered it. A paper was found, signed by both father and mother, stating that they had become tired of life, and mutually agreed on the destruction of themselves and children. Both had been subjects of the Miller delusion.

The Bath Times is informed by Elder Stevens, that G. W. Pinkham, the man who murdered his whole family, set out to kill his wife about four years ago. He declared that God had commanded him to do it, and his wife consented to the act. But just as he had lifted the knife to cut her throat, he received another revelation, he said, commanding him to desist for that time.

A MURDERED MAN COME TO LIFE.—It is generally known, we presume, that a man calling himself Harrison has been arrested at Matamoros, in Mexico, on suspicion of having been concerned in the robbery of the Chester County Bank, (of Pennsylvania,) the suspicion arising from the fact that he had in his possession a large amount of money in notes of that Bank. It will probably be remembered also, by some, that about six or eight months ago, a Mr. Hitchcock, a cattle drover living in Pennsylvania, mysteriously disappeared from the city of Philadelphia, whither he had gone to sell cattle. He was known to have received a considerable amount of money, and therefore it was feared that he had been murdered for the sake of robbery. It is now alledged that a connection between these two events has been established by the confession of Harrison, at Matamoros, that he is no other than the missing Mr. Hitchcock; this confession being rendered necessary to account for his possession of the Chester County Bank notes, which he received, it appears, in payment for his cattle. His disappearance, it seems, was only a flight to defraud his creditors. Such is the substance of a long account in the West Chester (Pa.) Record.

A COSTLY BLOW.—Our readers will remember the sad occurrence at New Haven, the past winter, by which Tutor Goodrich, of Yale College, came very near losing his life by a blow from an unruly student, which felled him senseless to the ground. As a consequence of the outrage, two of the students were arrested and held to bail in the sum of $10,000. After an investigation, one of the students was liberated —the other, when the trial came on a few days since, forfeited his bail, rather than run the risk of a trial and a residence in the penitentiary. Ten thousand dollars is rather a dear purchase for the privilege of striking a single blow upon an amiable and unoffending officer of a college. Mr. Goodrich, a young gentleman of very promising talents and piety, esteemed and beloved by a wide circle of friends, has been compelled to relinquish his duties in college, disabled from mental labor by the dreadful blow. He sailed for Europe on Monday last, in the Yorkshire, for the recovery of his health. All this loss of time and expenditure of money, and mental and physical suffering, are the fruits of one act of wantonness on the part of those, perhaps, excited and maddened by strong drinks. Who can foresee the end of a wrong deed, or to what extremities of suffering and disgrace a single sin may lead him? [Evang.

DOUBLE SUICIDE.—Mr. E. L. Andrews, a respectable merchant in Mobile, recently committed suicide by drowning, and by a mysterious and melancholy coincidence, his brother, Z. Andrews, of New Orleans, a partner in the house of E. L. Andrews & Co., of Mobile, disappeared about the same time, under such circumstances as leave no doubt but he has also committed suicide. The house was largely engaged in the cotton trade, and the great depression of prices affected their credit. The N. O. Bee says that Mr. Z. Andrews sent a letter to a friend through the Post Office, covering one addressed to his distressed lady, informing her of his suicidal intentions, and requesting that his body, if recovered, should be interred with decency and according to the ritual of the Hebrew faith. There is little doubt that the two brothers have shared the same fate, and their self-destruction is attributable to a feeling of overwhelming despair, occasioned by the certainty of having incurred enormous losses through the fall of cotton, and by the prospect of an early and hopeless bankruptcy.

SHIPWRECK AND CANNIBALISM.—The whaling ship James Maury, at New Bedford, from Honolulu, Dec. 25, brings an account of one of the most horrible occurrences in the annals of nautical suffering. The whale-ship Frances Henrietta, Capt. Poole, of Honolulu, fell in with, at sea, last May, lat 42° N. long. 150° E., a Japanese junk, of 200 tons, dismasted, rudder gone, and otherwise injured in a typhoon seven months previous. The original number of the crew was seventeen, but when Capt. Poole discovered them they were reduced to four, and in a famishing condition. The crew had drawn lots for some time past as to who should be killed and eaten; the one upon whom the lot fell, if able, fighting for his life, and in some instances succeeding in killing one of the others, in which case the murdered man was first eaten. The survivors were shockingly scarred with dirk and knife wounds, as if their lives had been often attempted by their companions. Capt. Poole kept them on board his ship for thirty days, and then put them on board some fishing boats, close in shore, about lat. 40° N. They were exceedingly grateful, and manifested much emotion on leaving the whaler. [Boston Tran.

IRON AND IRON WORKS IN N. J.—There are twelve Iron Furnaces in New Jersey, producing equal to 120,000 tons annually. Four of them are located in Sussex county, viz: the Franklin, Wywayonda, Hamburg, and Stanhope works, producing equally one-third of the whole amount above named annually. The two former companies produce equal to 100 tons of pig iron weekly, and are probably the largest furnaces engaged in making charcoal pigs in the United States. Some estimate of the extensive mining operations in Essex county, may be derived from the fact that about eighty teams are daily engaged in hauling ore to the Morris Canal. The Trenton Iron Company pays out alone $1,000 weekly for transportation and mining.

INDIAN BATTLE—BABAARITY.—The following is an extract of a letter from Fort Snelling, published in the St. Louis Reveille:

"We had a battle north of us, about one month ago, between the Chippeways and Sioux. A war party of Sioux attacked the Chippeways; three were killed on each side, but the Chippeways being the more numerous, drove the Sioux from the field, and got possession of the bodies. These they scalped, and one of them they skinned entirely, and hung it on some poles for the Sioux to witness. It so irritated the latter that they have assembled a very large war party and gone again to attack them. We shall soon hear the result."

To get rid of flies, set several plates of parcels of lime in different parts of the store or house. In a day or two you will find yourself rid of these troublesome insects almost altogether. It ought to be set constantly, and renewed when the lime loses its strength.

SUMMARY.

Mr. David Isham, a machinist of Hartford, Conn., it is stated, has recently invented a process by which cast iron can be converted almost instantly, and with but slight expense and labor, into steel. Twenty minutes only is necessary to convert a ton of iron into steel of the best quality, a process ordinarily requiring from six to ten days. The inventor has been offered $12,000 for the patent right for the State of Pennsylvania alone.

The state of the crops on the Brazos, in Texas, is very promising, being more forward this year than any season for the last twenty years. A great deal of cane is planted as high up as Auston Co. The Galveston News says, on the the authority of a Louisiana planter, that the cane in Texas is four weeks in advance of any in Louisiana, and is double the size at the present time.

It appears that Gen. Reed has declined to give the guarantee he first intended for the payment of the Erie Bank liabilities. The Erie Observer says: Gen. Reed's card revived confidence somewhat, but we learn that at the time proposed for the execution of the necessary writings, he refused to carry out the proposition —giving as a reason that he had made such arrangements as would enable him to redeem it without pledging his real and personal property.

The Ocean Steamers now on the stocks in New York, as has been ascertained, by personal inspection and calculation, will cost at least five millions three hundred thousand dollars. This is but the first letter of the alphabet in a newly opening career. Already our internal steam navy exceeds that of all Europe, probably of the whole world, and in ten years our ocean steam marine will be the finest in existence.

Since the killing of Davis, in Charleston, Ind., the citizens held a meeting and passed a resolution requesting the keeper of the grocery, where the murder was committed, to refrain from the farther sale of liquor. The citizens then entered the grocery, took the liquor into the street, and emptied it on the ground, agreeing to pay all damages to the vender. They then passed a series of resolutions declaring that thereafter no liquor should be sold within the limits of the town.

Sidney Marsh, John Dickey, and John Donohue were fined each $20 and costs, and Conrad Shearer $40, at Westchester, Penn., at the late session of the court, for trying to make topers of the neighbors by selling them rum.

The School Committee of the town of Bradford, Mass., have recently recommended that a copy of Webster's Dictionary, (Quarto Unabridged) be placed in each of the principal schools for the use of those pupils sufficiently advanced to be benefited by it, and as a book of reference for the teacher.

The N. Y. Mirror says that the popular preacher and radical reformer, Theodore Parker, after attending the anniversary of the American Anti Slavery Society in New York, set out on a foot journey to New Haven. "If all the clergymen who visited New York on anniversary week were to walk home, as Mr. Parker has done, instead of riding, they would, no doubt, find themselves greatly benefited by their visit to the city."

The Chronotype says that a package of money containing $6000 in bills of the Commercial Bank, of Providence, was stolen on Tuesday from the Captain's office of the steamboat Bradford Durfee, in Providence. It was placed in a drawer in the Captain's office, and was probably stolen before the boat left the wharf. A reward of $500 is offered for the recovery of the money.

On the 6th inst., a shanty containing some 265 kegs of powder belonging to some railroad contractors, in Peekskill, N. Y., was fired by an incendiary and the building and several others near it were blown to atoms. One man, Stephen Gainson, was killed, and seven or eight others seriously if not fatally wounded.

A man, apparently about sixty years of age, was found hung on a tree in the woods, near Paoli, Pa., on the 20th ult. There was found in his pocket a slip of paper containing the following words:—"When all is lost, when nothing remains but despair, life is troublesome, and death becomes a duty.—COWEL."

The accounts of the mortality of our army in Mexico, are frightful. It is stated, upon the authority of General Twiggs, that the deaths amount to a regiment a month, and this is only the beginning of the vomito season or rather of the time when its ravages begin to be serious.

A letter from Oregon City, dated October 6, announces the recent arrival of more than 300 wagons, and states that 1,000 were on the road. Several capitalists were among the new comers. A steam-engine and a boat-boiler were greatly needed. Saw mills were in active operation all over the country. Cooking utensils were scarce, and a good foundry man was greatly wanted. An Almanac for 1848 had just appeared.

At a late term of the Court of Common Pleas for Putnam County, Ohio, a Miss Jane Cromley gained a verdict of fourteen hundred dollars against one Joseph Eaton, in a suit to recover damages for a breach of a contract of marriage. The circumstances are said to have appeared especially black against the gay deceiver.

In pulling down an old building at the corner of Bank and State streets, New London, Conn., a few days since, for the purpose of erecting a new structure, there were found stowed away under the floor of the garret a stocking and an old cloth cap, filled with Mexican and Spanish dollars.

Judge James M. Marshall, son of Col. Thomas Marshall, commander of the 3d Virginia Regiment in the War of Independence, and eldest surviving brother of Chief Justice Marshall, died at his residence in Fauquier County, Va., on the 26 ult., aged 85 years.

While a German woman at Pittsburgh, Penn., was mixing lime, it flew into her eyes, putting them both out. The lime was dry, and she poured hot water on it.

An affidavit filed in the Supreme Court in relation to a suit at law, states the profits of one of those floating palaces, the Isaac Newton or Hendrik Hudson, for the last year, to have been $60,000.

On the morning of May 11, everybody in Louisville thought it was snowing. The whole atmosphere of the city seemed densely filled with snow-flakes. These turned out to be the gnats or flies, like black-bodied insects with white wings, which soon settled by millions, billions, trillions, quadrillions, and quintillions, upon all the houses and upon the whole surface of the ground. A portion of the citizens seemed considerably alarmed, some thinking it an omen of the cholera.

The Delavan State Union (North Division) will hold its Third Anniversary at Great Barrington, Mass., on the 7th day of July next. This Union is composed mainly of persons of African descent, who, thrust out from the usual Temperance organizations, are constrained to organize by themselves, and have done so with commendable spirit and with the best results. A great gathering is expected on this occasion.

A severe hail-storm passed over a portion of Orange Co., Va., on the 5th inst. It was very destructive in the village of Gordonsville. The hail-stones varied in size from a partridge's to a hen's egg, covering the ground, breaking over 500 panes of glass in the village, stripping the young leaves and twigs from the trees, and literally covering the ground with them.

A lettor from Capt. Rogers, of ship Acushnet, of Fairhaven, states that on the 22d of December, one of her boats was stove by a whale, and John Taber, third officer, Henry Johnson, boatsteerer, and John Pearce and John Lockett, seaman were either killed or drowned. The Acushnet had lost two boats and had two others badly stove within a month.

Gen. Winfield Scott arrived off the port of New York at an early hour on Sunday morning last in the brig St. Petersburg, and was met, as he had desired and arranged, by a boat from Elizabethtown, N. J., in which he embarked and was landed near his home a little after sunrise. He of course remains with his family, declining all parade of reception.

A farmer in Monroe had a yoke of oxen killed on the Tonawanda Railroad. They had strayed upon the track. The County Court gave the farmer a verdict, but the Supreme Court reversed the decision.

Mr. B. F. Palmer, of Meredith, N. H., receives an average of one application per day for cork legs, the charge for which is $150 each. This is mainly owing to the numerous dismemberments occasioned by the Mexican War. Mr. Palmer has been offered $75,000 for his patent for the United States, which he declined.

In the Municipal Court, Boston, Judge Ward sentenced Samuel Huckins, on two charges of a violation of the license law, to a fine of $200, or ten days imprisonment in the common jail. Mr. Huckins had no hesitation in choosing the latter alternative.

A 'nice young man' has been fined $15 for stealing a kiss from a young married lady in Buffalo. The Rochester Advertiser says the penality in that city for kissing a married woman against her will has been fixed by a decision of Justice Wentworth at $7.

Dr. Wm. A. Newell, Congressional Representative from Pennsylvania, has had a present of a gold ring from Mrs. Adams, for his unremitting attention to her lamented husband from the first of his illness.

The venerable Ashbel Green, Chaplain to the First Congress, died in Philadelphia, Friday, May 19, at a very advanced age.

Rev. Dr. Emory, President of Dickinson College, died at Baltimore, May 19, of disease of the lungs.

Langfeldt has been found guilty of the wilful murder of Mrs. Rademacher, in Philadelphia.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given, that the 13th Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will be held with the Church in Lincklean, Chenango Co., N Y., commencing on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June next, (June 7th,) at 11 o'clock A. M. Eld. James Bailey was appointed to preach the introductory discourse; Eld. Russel G. Burdick his alternate.

It is earnestly hoped, that a full delegation will be in attendance, with great hearts, strong arms, and a firm determination to push forward the car of Bible truth, with a resolution and consistency worthy of the cause. Brethren, ask yourselves before God your duty, and fear and tremble lest ye come short of what the judge requires of you. An eternity of happiness is at stake. Will ye risk it?

REPUBLICATION OF
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"
For all four of the Reviews,	8 00	"
For Blackwood's Magazine,	3 00	"
For Blackwood and three Reviews,	9 00	"
For Blackwood and the four Reviews,	10 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

NEVER MIND.

BY MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER.

Soul, be strong, whate'er betide,
God himself is guard and guide—
With my Father at my side,
Never mind!

Clouds and darkness hover near,
Men's hearts failing them for fear,
But be thou of right good cheer,
Never mind!

Come what may, some work is done,
Praise the Father through the Son,
Goals are gained and prizes won,
Never mind!

And if now the skies look black,
All the past behind thy back
Is a bright and blessed track;
Never mind!

Stand in potent courage still,
Working out thy Master's will,
Compass good, and conquer ill;
Never mind!

Fight, for all their bullying boast,
Dark temptation's evil host,
This is thy predestined post;
Never mind!

Be then tranquil as a dove;
Through these thunder clouds above
Shines afar the heaven of love;
Never mind!

NAPOLEON AND ADAMS.

The conclusion of ex-Governor Seward's eulogy on John Quincy Adams, before the New York Legislature, draws the following eloquent contrast between the close of his life, and that of Napoleon. Let all admirers of mere military greatness read and ponder :—

Only two years after the birth of John Quincy Adams, there appeared on an island in the Mediterranean Sea, a human spirit, newly born, endowed with equal genius, without the regulating qualities of justice and benevolence, which Adams possessed to such an eminent degree. A like career opened to both—born like Adams, a subject of a king—the child of more genial skies, like him, became in early life a patriot and a citizen of a new and great Republic. Like Adams, he lent his service to the State in precocious youth, and in its hour of need, and won its confidence. But unlike Adams, he could not wait the dull delays of slow and laborious, but sure advancement. He sought power by the hasty road that leads through fields of carnage, and he became, like Adams, a supreme magistrate, a Consul. But there were other consuls. He was not content. He thrust them aside, and was consul alone. Consular power was too short. He fought new battles, and was consul for life. But power, confessedly derived from the people, must be exercised in obedience to their will, and must be resigned to them again, at least to death. He was not content. He desolated Europe afresh, subverted the Republic, imprisoned the patriarch who presided over Rome's comprehensive See, and obliged him to pour on his head the sacred oil that made the person of kings divine, and their right to reign indefeasible. He was an emperor. But he saw around him a mother, brothers, and sisters, not ennobled; whose humble state reminded him, and the world, that he was born plebeian; and he had no heir to wait impatient for the Imperial Crown. He scourged the earth again, and again fortune smiled on him even in his wild extravagance. He bestowed kingdoms and principalities on his kindred—put away the devoted wife of his youthful days, and another, a daughter of Hapsburgh's imperial house, joyfully accepted his proud alliance. Offspring gladdened his anxious sight; a diadem was placed on its infant brow, and it received the homage of princes, even in its cradle. Now he was indeed a monarch—a legitimate monarch—a monarch by Divine appointment—the first of an endless succession of monarchs. But there were other monarchs who held sway in the earth. He was not content. He would reign with his kindred alone. He gathered new and greater armies, from his own land—from subjugated lands. He called forth the young and brave—one from every household—from the Pyrenees to the Zuyder Zee—from Jura to the ocean. He marshalled them into long and majestic columns, and went forth to seize that universal dominion which seemed almost within his grasp. But Ambition had tempted Fortune too far. The nations of the earth resisted, repelled, pursued and surrounded him. The pageant was ended. The crown fell from his presumptuous head. The wife who had wedded him in his pride forsook him in the hour when fear came upon him. His child was ravished from his sight. His kinsmen were degraded to their first estate, and he was no longer emperor, nor consul, nor general, nor even a citizen, but an exile and a prisoner, on a lonely island, in the midst of the wild Atlantic. Discontent attended him there. The wayward man fretted out a few long years of his yet unbroken manhood, looking off at the earliest dawn and in evening's latest twilight, towards that distant world that had only just eluded his grasp. His heart corroded. Death came, not unlooked for, though it came even then unwelcome. He was stretched on his bed in the fort which constituted his prison. A few fast and faithful friends stood around, with the guards who rejoiced that the hour of relief from long and wearisome watching was at hand. As his strength wasted away, delirium stirred up the brain from its long and inglorious inactivity. He was again a lieutenant, a general, a consul, an emperor of France. He filled again the throne of Charlemagne. His kindred pressed around him, again reinvested with the pompous pageantry of royalty. The daughter of the long line of kings again stood proudly by his side, and the sunny face of his child shone out from beneath the diadem that encircled its flowing locks. The marshals of the empire awaited his command. The legions of the Old Guard were in the field, their scarred faces rejuvenated, and their ranks, thinned in many battles, replenished. Russia, Prussia, Austria, Denmark, and England, gathered their mighty hosts to give him battle. Once more he mounted his impatient charger, and rushed forth to conquest. He waved his sword aloft and cried—"Tete d'Armee." The feverish vision broke—the mockery was ended. The silver cord was loosed, and the warrior fell back upon his bed a lifeless corpse. This was the End of Earth. The Corsican was not content.

Statesmen and Citizens! The contrast suggests its own impressive moral.

GLASS MILK-PANS.

BY J. SKINNER.

The admitted superiority of the Philadelphia markets over all others in the Union, if not in the world, is in nothing more conspicuous than in the high excellence of much of its butter. The art of butter-making has been greatly improved and extended all over the country within the last twenty-five years. The next best market to Philadelphia is that of Baltimore. But, although the Baltimore butter is as pure, and as skillfully prepared—that is, in some daries—as around Philadelphia, there is in that which comes from the latter, a peculiar and uniform richness and high flavor, which is doubtless to be attributed in a measure to some thing peculiar in the food of the cows, and that some thing, says Dr. Emerson, in the Farmer's Library, is the presence, in their pastures, of the sweet scented vernal grass.

There is, however, room for one obvious improvement in all our dairies, and that is the introduction of glass milk-pans. From Holstein they have been lately brought into use in England, and are likely to supersede all others.

In Holstein, where one woman looks after and milks 18 cows, in dairies to which there are more than 100, each woman has an allowance of one dollar extra, for 'pan money,' and is fined for every one she breaks. Yet all of them save some thing out of their pan money, which shows that the damage by breakage is very small. Doubtless any glass manufacturer would have them made, on its being suggested, and it would be easy to have them so cast as to mark the contents of the pan. The Philadelphia Agricultural Society would do well to offer a premium for the first one exhibited.

One decided advantage in the employment of this material for milk-pans, is in its being a non-conductor of electricity, and therefore better to preserve the milk from acidity in the summer season. The editor of a Scotch agricultural paper says: 'It is only a short time since, that we were shown a glass bottle full of milk that had been preserved in India and China, and when drawn, after eighteen months preservation, was not only found to be perfectly sweet, but to contain, in a solid and cohesive state, a small quantity of excellent butter; while the milk preserved in a tin case, during the same voyage, had gone to acid. It now appears that glass milk-pans produce almost equally remarkable results; and from an analysis we have seen of the cream which was thrown up, on some of Harris' Compressed Register, it appears that the difference is in favor of the glass as compared with the wooden or Wedgware pan, by at least 10 per cent. The pans which are manufactured at the Islington Glass Works, Birmingham, are of compressed, and those by the Messrs. Cookson, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, of blown glass; but according to the analysis of the agricultural chemist, Dr. Piercy, the compressed milk-pans throw up considerably the most milk.' [Model American Courier.

LAW AND LAWYERS IN NORWAY.

The administration of the civil law in Norway is most admirably contrived. In every school district, the freeholders elect a Justice of the Court of Reconciliation. Every lawsuit must first be brought before the Justice, and by the parties in person, as no lawyer or attorney is allowed to practice in this Court. The parties appear in person, and state their mutual complaints and grievances at length, and the Justice carefully notes down all the facts and statements of the plaintiff and defendant, and after due consideration, endeavors to arrange the matter, and proposes for this purpose, what he considers to be perfectly just and fair in the premises. If his judgment is accepted, it is immediately entered in the court above, which is a court of Record; and if it is appealed from, the case goes up to the District Court, upon the evidence already taken in writing, by the Justice of the Court of Reconciliation. No other evidence is admitted. If the terms proposed by the Justice are pronounced to be just and reasonable, the party appealing has to pay the costs and charges of the appeal. This system of minor courts prevents a deal of unnecessary, expensive, and vexatious litegation. The case goes up from court to court upon the same evidence, and the legal argument rests upon the same facts, without trick or circumlocution of any kind from either party. There is no chance for pettifoggers—the banditti of the bar. Poor, or rich, or stupid clients, cannot be deluded, nor Judge or Jury mystified, by the skill of sharp practitioners in the courts of law in Norway. More than two-thirds of the suits commenced are settled in the Court of Reconciliation, and of the remaining third not so settled, not more than one-tenth are ever carried up.

The Judges of the Norwegian courts are responsible for errors of judgment, delay, ignorance, carelessness, partiality or prejudice. They may be summoned, accused, and tried in the Superior Court, and, if convicted, are liable in damages to the party injured. There are, therefore, very few unworthy lawyers in the Norwegian courts. The bench and the bar are distinguished for integrity and learning. They have great influence in the community, and the country appreciate the many benefits which have resulted from their virtue and wisdom. [J. S. Maxwell.

EXPENSE OF DRINKS.

Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper, published in England, states that the victualers pay to Government, yearly, for their licenses, their taxes, and the duties on spirits sold by them, the immense sum of £11,000,000. The cost of the British Army, yearly, is £3,000,000; that of the Navy, £5,000,000; the cost of the metropolitan police force £500,000, and that of the rural police throughout the kingdom £750,000, making a total of £10,750,000. Thus, then, it appears, that the publicans of London pay to Government more than it costs to support the army, navy, and the whole of the police force established throughout the kingdom.

The Rev. T. Spencer, the eloquent advocate of temperance, states that the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland, pay $40,000,000, annually, for tobacco! With a population consisting of about 27,000,000, they can pay annually $35,000,000 in poor rates; $250,000,000 for the support of Government, and $300,000,000 for intoxicating drinks! He states that there were among the 27,000,000 of people 600,000 drunkards, and that 50,000 more form the ranks of moderate drinkers.

DEATH OF PIZARRO.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." By the sword he had risen—by the sword he was to perish; not on some well-fought battle field, with shouts of victory ringing in his ear, but in his palace, hall by the assassin's blade. In his own fair capital of Lima, the City of Kings, the gem of the Pacific, which had sprung up under his auspices with incredible rapidity—for Pizarro seemed to impart his last energy to all about him—a score of conspirators, assembled at the house of Almargo's son, plotted his death. It was Sunday in June, 1541, at the hour of dinner, that they burst into his apartment, with the cry of "Death to the Tyrant!" A number of visitors were with him, but they were imperfectly armed, and deserted him, escaping by the windows, and his half-brother, Martinez de Alcanta, two pages, and as many cavaliers, were all that stood forward in defense of their chief. They soon fell, overpowered by numbers, and covered by wounds. But Pizarro was not the man to meekly meet his death. Alone, without armor, his cloak around one arm, his good sword at his right hand, the old hero kept his cowardly assailants at bay, with a vigor and intrepidity surprising at his advanced age. "What, ho!" he cried, "traitors! have you come to kill me in my house?" and, as he spoke, two of his enemies fell beneath his blows. Rada, the chief of the conspirators, impatient of the delay, called out, "Why are we so long about it? down with the tyrant!" and taking one of his companions, Naverez, in his arms, he thrust him against the Marquis. Pizarro, instantly grappling with his opponent, ran him through with his sword. But at that moment he received a wound in the throat, and reeling, he sank upon the floor, when the swords of Rada, and several of the conspirators were plunged into his body. "Jesu!" exclaimed the dying man, and tracing a cross with his fingers on the bloody floor, he bent his head to kiss it, when a stroke more friendly than the rest, put an end to his existence. [Blackwood.

A PIECE OF FAMILY HISTORY.

The Norwich Courier says: On the 27th day of January, 1848, and in this our goodly, thriving city of Norwich, is living an aged gentleman, the progenitor of five generations, all now living. He was born on Sunday—his wife was born on Sunday—his eldest child on Sunday—and he had a child born on every day of the week, commencing with Sunday morning and ending on Saturday night. All the first born of the five successive generations were born on Sunday—all are males, and all bear the same name, and all are now living. Of these, the last born is the son of the fourth or fifth (we do not know which) child of her parents. The oldest of the five generations is ninety-six years of age—the youngest is between two and three months old, so that the distance which separates the two extremes is little less than a century.

What a world of history, written and unwritten, has been enacted within the period which has thus transpired since the birth of the great-great-grandsire and that of the great-great-grandson? With the latter we have not the pleasure of an acquaintance; but with the former we meet almost daily in our walks through the streets; and there is one place, above all others, (unless we except the house of worship on Sunday) where he is sure to be found as often as the various election days come round, and that is, at the polls. At our last town election, his was the first vote deposited in the ballot-box; and from the time he was a freeman, down to the present, he has never failed to be present at the annual State election, and to give his vote to the men and the measures approved by his judgment.

AMPUTATED LUNG.—When Barnard, a young man in Cincinnati, was stabbed in a fracas not long since, Dr. E. K. Chamberlain was sent for, and upon his arrival and on examination of the wound, he found that a portion of one of the lungs was protruding some two inches from the wound, it having been forced out, probably, by respiration. As the case was a critical one and required immediate operation, the Doctor resorted to a new method of treatment. The end of the protruding lung, which had been injured by the shot, was bound with a silk thread, and the injured end cut entirely off, and the remainder forced back into its natural location. Barnard is now in the enjoyment of good health. The Doctor has the amputated lung now in his possession.

BOYS OUT OF EMPLOYMENT.—An "Old New Yorker" says, in a communication to the Evening Express: "A gentleman in Wall-street advertised a few days since for a clerk. Next morning on reaching the vicinity of his office, he saw a crowd, and supposed his place was on fire, but on inquiry found 150 boys collected, all of whom had assembled in consequence of this advertisement. It is surprising that these boys do not go to sea, or on to farms in the interior, and insure permanent and useful employment. In three years they would get better wages than are obtained by half the workingmen in the city, at twenty-one years of age.

"It will hardly be credited, but there is no doubt of the fact, that there are 8,000 boys in New York and Philadelphia, between sixteen and twenty years of age, without any permanent employment. What will be the fate of these boys?"

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.—Hon. Edward Everett, in his eulogy on Mr. Adams, delivered in this city lately, mentioned the following striking circumstance:—

In November, 1846, while walking with a friend in Boston, Mr. Adams felt a paralytic shock. He at once said it was the shock of death. In his journal, he made the entry—"From this day I date my decease. I consider myself, for every useful purpose to myself and to my fellow-citizens, as dead." His journal, which he had kept for more than fifty years, stopped on that day. Four months afterwards, he resumed it, under the head of "Posthumous Memoirs," and he continued to serve his country another year. The evening previous to the final shock he received in the hall of Representatives, he had read to him Bishop Wilberforce's Sermon on Time. That was the last night he passed under his own roof.

A man ought to have nothing singular or affected in his habit, discourse, or manners. In our opinion, the modest air becomes a man better than that which they call the genteel air.

VARIETY.

Men measure their charity by a peculiar standard. A man who has not a dollar in his pocket would give a penny for almost any purpose. If he had a hundred dollars he might give one; carry it higher, and there comes a falling off. One hundred dollars would be considered too large a sum for him who has ten thousand; while a present of one thousand would be considered almost miraculous for a man worth one hundred thousand—yet the proportion is the same throughout—the poor man's penny and the widow's mite, are more than the rich man's sounded and widely trumpeted benefaction.

India Rubber is now proposed to insulate telegraphic wires. Gutta percha has been tried in the Passaic river with so much success, that the company propose to make an effort to cross from Jersey City to New York by laying insulated wires under water. Mr. Wilson, of the Trenton telegraphic office, has suggested to the company, according to the Gazette, the experiment of insulating their whole line with gutta percha, and burying it some six inches in the ground, instead of supporting it as now upon high poles. At present, the great exposure of the wires subjects them to innumerable and constant interruptions.

A gentleman entered the splended hat store of Genin, Broadway, New York, a few days ago, and while noticing a hat, was seen by his dog, through the large plate glass which forms one of the doors of that extensive establishment. The affectionate animal, a very large Newfoundland dog, stepped back to the curb-stone, and giving a spring, leaped through the glass door, breaking the large plate glass, which was nearly half an inch thick, into a thousand fragments, without doing himself the least apparent harm.

The Express says that Tammany Hall has been the scene of ninety balls during the past season, and it is a small estimate to calculate that at least $30,000 have changed hands in consequence of these festive demonstrations. Not less than a quarter of a million of dollars have been expended in balls during the past season.

Glass bottles are made with great rapidity. A workman, with the assistance of a gatherer and a blower, will begin and finish one hundred and twenty dozen quart bottles in ten hours. This is two and a half per minute. In some establishments, the hands are restricted to two per minute, to prevent slighting the work.

Capt. Josiah Cooledge, of Cambridge, Mass., lately had occasion to descend a well on his premises; getting near to the bottom he retraced his steps for the purpose of obtaining a lamp. While preparing to make a second descent, the well, which was forty feet deep, suddenly caved in, he standing on the platform directly over it; fortunately he escaped without injury.

A suit to recover $25, the amount of a note given for a horse, having been three years before the courts in Wyoming county, N. Y., has just terminated. Verdict was given for the plaintiff in amount claimed, with costs, the latter amounting to about eight hundred dollars! Such is law.

The Manchester American says that Col. Miller, of Richmond, Cheshire County, who has become somewhat noted for "beauty" and his labor in the cause of Temperance, Anti-Slavery, &c., has recently sold 16 acres of land—the location of a bed of Roman ochre, for the sum of "sixty thousand dollars."

Last year 1,419,283 copies of the Bible were issued by the British and Foreign Bible Societies—400,000 more than in any year before, excepting 1845. The amount of money received was greater than ever before, amounting to £117,440, 9s. 3d.

A scorpion, when he finds himself enclosed and no way left to escape, will turn his tail round and sting himself through the head; and it is remarkable, that this is the only animal in creation, man excepted, that can be made to commit suicide.

Out of 3400 miles of British Railroads now opened, only 300 are upon the broad guage. The broad guage is 7 feet wide, the narrow is 4 feet 8 1-2 inches. Some trips have been made on the narrow guages lately which in point of speed have not yet been surpassed on the broad guage.

If any person should be stung by a bee, or any other insect, rub some spirits of turpentine on the place, and the pain will nearly cease in one minute. It is said the pain arising from the bite of a copper-head snake may be arrested in a few minutes, by the continued application of this article.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	"	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third	"	April 5,	"	July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25
EXTRAS PER TERM.
Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

EXECUTION OF THE GIRONDIST DEPUTIES.

The following is a passage from Lamartine's History of the Girondists, recently published in this city. After the condemnation of the Deputies, they were served with a rich supper by some friend, and spent the night in conversation:

Toward the morning the conversation became more solemn. Brissot spoke prophetically of the misfortunes of the Republic, deprived of her most virtuous and eloquent citizens. "How much blood will it require to wash out our own," cried he. They were silent for a moment, and appeared terrified at the phantom of the future evoked by Brissot. "My friends," replied Vergniaud, "we have killed the tree by prunning it. It was too aged; Robespierre cuts it. Will he be more fortunate than ourselves? No; the soil is too weak to nourish the roots of civic liberty; this people is too childish to wield its laws without hurting itself. It will return to its kings, as babes return to their toys. We were deceived as to the age in which we were born, and in which we die for the freedom of the world," continued he. "We deemed ourselves at Rome and we were at Paris. But revolutions are like those crises which blanch in a single night the hair of a man—they soon bring nations to maturity. Our blood is sufficiently warm to fertilize the soil of the Republic. Let us not carry away with us the future; and let us bequeath to the people hope, in exchange for the death we shall receive at their hands."

A long silence followed this speech of Vergniaud's, and the conversation turned from earth to Heaven. "What shall we be doing to-morrow at this time?" said Ducos, who always mingled mirth with the most serious subjects. Each replied, according to his nature. "We shall sleep after the fatigues of the day," replied some. The skepticism of the age corrupted even their last thoughts, and only promised the destruction of the soul to those men who were about to die for the immortality of a human idea. The immortality of the soul, and the sublime conjectures of that future life to which they were so near, offered a more fitting scheme for their last moment. Their voices sank, their accents became more solemn. Fonfrede, Gensome, Cara, Fauchet, and Brissot, spoke in terms which breathed all the divinity of human reason, and all the certainty of conscience on the mysterious problems of the immaterial destiny of the human mind.

Vergniaud, who had hitherto been silent, now appealed to by his friends, joined in the debate. "Never," said the eye-witness whom we have before cited, and who had often admired him in the tribune, "never had his look, his gesture, his language, and his voice, more profoundly affected his hearers."

The words of Vergniaud were lost, their impressions alone remained.

After having united all the moral proofs of the existence of a Being, whom he termed the Supreme Being—after having demonstrated the necessity of a Providence, the consequence of the excellence of this Supreme Being, and the necessity of justice, a divine debt of the Creator, toward his creatures—after having cited from Socrates to Cicero, and from Cicero to all the just who have perished, and the universal belief of all peoples and philosophers, a proof above all others, since there is in Nature an instinct of future existence, as strong as the instinct of a present life—after having carried, even to enthusiasm, the certainty of a continuation of existence, after this present state, which is not destroyed but metamorphosed by death—"But," added he, in more eloquent languge, exalted even to lyricism, and bringing the subject to the condition of his fellow prisoners, to deduce his strongest proof from themselves, "are not we ourselves the best proof of immortality? We, calm, serene, in the presence of the corpse of our friend—of our own corpse—discussing like a peaceful assembly of philosophers, on the light of darkness which shall succeed our last sigh; dying, more happy than Danton, who will live; —than Robespierre, who will triumph. Whence, then arises, this calmness in our discourse, and this serenity in our souls? Is it not in us the result of the feeling that we have performed a great duty toward humanity? Is it this mass of animated dust which is to-day man, to-morrow a heap of clay? No; it is not for this living clod of earth, it is for the spirit of humanity and our fatherland that we die. What are we ourselves but atoms of this collective spirit of the human race? Each of the men who compose our species, has an immortal spirit, imperishable, and confounded with that soul of his country and mankind, for which it is so sweet, so glorious, to devote ourselves—to suffer, and to die. It is for this reason," continued he, "that we are not sublime dupes, but beings who obey their natural instinct; and who, when they have fulfilled their duty, will live, suffer, or enjoy in immortality the destinies of humanity. Let us die, then, not with confidence, but certainty. Our conscience is our guide in this mighty trial; our Judge, the great Eternal, whose name is sought for by ages, and to whose designs we are subservient as tools which he breaks in the work, but whose fragments fall at his feet. Death is but the greatest act of life, since it gives birth to a higher state of existence. Were it not thus," added he, more solemnly, "there would be something greater than God. It would be the just man, immolating himself uselessly and hopelessly for his country. This supposition is a folly of blasphemy, and I repel it with contempt or horror. No! Vergniaud is not greater than God, but God is more just than Vergniaud, and will not, to-morrow suffer him to ascend a scaffold, but to justify and avenge him in future ages."

Fauchet made an eloquent discourse on the Passion, comparing their death to Calvary. They were all much moved, and many wept.

Vergniaud reconciled, in a few words, all different opinions. "Let us believe what we will," said he, "but let us die certain of our life and the price of our death. Let us each sacrifice what we possess, the one his doubt, the other his faith, all of us our blood, for liberty. When man offers himself as a victim to Heaven, what more can he give?"

Daylight began te stream in at the windows. "Let us go to bed," said Ducos; "life is so trifling a thing, that it is not worth the hour of sleep we lose in regretting it." "Let us watch," said Lasource to Sillery and Fauchet; "eternity is so certain and so terrible that a thousand lives would not suffice to prepare for it." They rose from the table, and re-entered their chambers, where most of them threw themselves on their beds.

Thirteen remained in the larger dungeon, some conversed in whispers, others wept, some slept. At eight o'clock they were allowed to walk about the corridors. The Abbe Lambert, the pious friend of Brissot, who had passed the night at the door of their dungeon, was still awaiting permission to communicate with them. Brissot, perceiving him, sprang forward and clasped him in his arms. The priest offered him the assistance of his ministry, to soften or sanctify death; but Brissot gratefully, but firmly refused. "Do you know anything more holy than the death of an honest man, who dies for having refused the blood of his fellow-creatures to wretches?" said he. The Abbe said nothing more.

Lasource, who had witnessed the interview, approached Brissot, "Do you believe," said he to him, "in the immortality of your soul, and the Providence of God?" "I do believe in them," returned Brissot; "and it is because I believe in them that I am about to die." "Well," replied Lasource, "there is but a step from thence to religion. I, the minister of another faith, have never so much admired the ministers of yours, as in these dungeons into which they bring the pardon of Heaven to the condemned. In your place I should confess." Brissot made no reply, but joined Vergniaud, Gensonne, and the younger prisoners, most of whom declined the aid of the priest. Some sat on the stone parapet, others walked about arm in arm; some knelt at the priest's feet, and received absolution after a brief confession of their faults. All awaiting calmly the signal for their departure, and resembling by their attitude a halt previous to the battle.

The Abbe Emery, although a non-juring priest, had obtained permission to see Fauchet at the grating that separated the court from the corridor, and there listened to and absolved the Bishop of Calvados. Fauchet, absolved and penitent, listened to the confession of Sillery, and bestowed on his friend the divine pardon he had just received.

At ten o'clock the executioners came to prepare them for the scaffold. Gensonne, picked up a lock of his black hair, gave it to the Abbe Lambert, and begged him to give it to his wife, whose residence he named. "Tell her it is all I can send her of my remains, and that my last thoughts in death were hers." Vergniaud drew his watch from his pocket, scratched with a pen some initials, and the date of the 30th of October, in the inside of the gold case, and gave it to one of the assistants to transmit to a young girl to whom he was tenderly attached, and whom it is said he had intended to marry.

All had a name, a regret, a friendship; all had some souvenir of themselves to send to those they left on earth. The hope of a remembrance here is the last tie that binds the dying to life.

These mysterious legacies were all duly delivered.

When all was ready, and the last lock of hair had fallen on the stones of the dungeon, the executioners and gens d'armes made the condemned march in a column to the court of the Palace, where five carts, surrounded by an immense crowd, awaited them. The moment they emerged from the Conclergerie, the Girondists burst into the Marseillaise, laying stress on these verses, which contained a double meaning—

> " Contre nous de la tyrannie > L'etendard sanglant est leve."

From this moment they ceased to think of themselves, in order to think of the example of the death of republicans they wished to leave the people. Their voices sank at the end of each verse, only to rise more sonorous at the first line of the next verse. Each cart contained four, with the exception of the last, in which lay the body of Valaze. His head, shaken by the concussion over the stones, swayed to and fro before his friends, who were forced to close their eyes to avoid seeing his livid features, but who still joined in the strain. On their arrival at the scaffold they all embraced, in token of community in liberty, life, and death, and then resumed their funeral chant. All died without weakness. Sillery, with irony, after ascending the platform, walked round, saluting the people as though to thank them for his glory and death. The hymn became feebler at each fall of the ax; one voice still continued it, that of Vergniaud, executed the last. Like his companions, he did not die, but passed away in enthusiasm, and his life, commencing by immortal orations, ended by a hymn to the eternity of the Revolution.

One cart bore away their bodies, and one grave, by the side of that of Louis XVI., received them.

Some years afterward, in searching the archieves of the parish of Madeleine, the bill of the grave digger of the Commune was found, with the order of the President on the National Treasury for its payment. "Twenty-two deputies of Gironde; the coffins, 147 francs; expenses of interment, 53 francs; total 210 francs."

Such was the price of the shovelsful of earth that covered the founders of the Republic. Never did Æschylus or Shakespeare invent a more bitter derision of fate than this bill of a grave-digger, demanding and receiving his pay for having alternately buried all the monarchy and all the republic of a mighty nation.

FAMILY HARMONY.

O, sweet as vernal dews that fill
The closing buds on Zion's hill,
When evening clouds draw thither—
So sweet, so heavenly 'tis to see
The members of one family
Live peacefully together!

The children, like the lily flowers,
On which descend the suns and showers,
Their hues of beauty blending:—
The parents, like the willow boughs
On which the lovely foliage grows,
Their friendly shade extending.

But leaves the greenest will decay—
And flowers the brightest fade away,
When autumn winds are sweeping:
And be the household e'er so fair,
The hand of death will soon be there,
And turn the scene to weeping.

Yet leaves again will clothe the trees,
And lilies wave beneath the breeze,
When spring comes smiling hither;
And friends who parted at the tomb,
May yet renew their loveliest bloom,
And meet in heaven together.

TWELVE INCONSISTENCIES.

1. To hear a Christian man say, he very much desires to know how matters are going on in the religious world, and yet he will not take a religious newspaper.

2. To see a Christian man of a family, with a large plantation, and extensive stock; one of a good trade or a lucrative profession, and not take a religious newspaper.

3. To see a Christian man at every monkey show, or farcical exhibition of every wag who may advertise that he will make people laugh, for the cheap sum of one, two, or even four bits, and yet too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

4. To see a Christian man lay by money, in order to catch a good bargain which may chance to come in his way, and still too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

5. To see a Christian man dress his children in fine or superfine clothing, and still plead too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

6. To see a Christian man take a half dozen, or even one newspaper, filled with all sorts of trash and falsehoods, and yet too poor to take a religious newspaper.

7. To see a Christian man spend time enough in one week in gossiping, and things as bad or worse, if industriously employed to pay for, and yet he can't take a religious newspaper.

8. To see a Christian man of wealth, read regularly a poor man's and which is worse, a minister's paper, and hear him say he is too poor to take a religious newspaper.

9. To see a Christian family, reading novels and miscellanies and attending parties at great (or even no) expense, and have no religious newspapers for them to read.

10. To see a Christian man laying up money and property for his children, and plead too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

11. To see a Christian man exhibiting to his friends and visitors, his fine farm, stock, orchards—his new and splended assortment of goods—his furnished office or shop, as the case may be, and have no religious newspaper to exhibit.

12. I cannot endure to hear a Christian man boasting of his liberality to the church, and the institutions of the church, and not pay for a religious newspaper.

And finally for a "Baker's dozen"—I cannot, above every other inconsistency, endure to see a Christian man take, and regularly receive, but never pay for a religious newspaper.

These things are so obviously inconsistant, that when I approach men, to try and convince them of the wrong, I feel that I almost offer an insult to their intelligence and Christian fidelity. But I must never mind that. I must be faithful to my God and my brethren. [Cum. Pres.

From Bishop Doane's Address at Burlington College.

THE GENTLEMAN.

"When you have found a man you have not far to go to find a gentleman. You cannot make a gold ring out of brass. You cannot change a Cape May crystal to a diamond. You cannot make a gentleman till you have first a man. To be a gentleman, it will not be sufficient to have had a grandfather.

To be a gentleman does not depend upon the tailor or the toilet. Blood will degenerate, good clothes are not good habits. The Prince Lee Boo concluded that the hog, in England, was the only gentleman, as being the only thing that did not labor.

A gentleman is just a gentle-man, no more, no less; a diamond polished that was first a diamond in the rough. A gentleman is gentle. A gentleman is modest. A gentleman is courteous. A gentleman is generous. A gentleman is slow to take offence, as being one that never gives it. A gentleman is slow to surmise evil, as being one that never thinks it. A gentleman goes armed, only in the consciousness of right. A gentleman subjects his appetites. A gentleman controls his speech. A gentleman deems every other better than himself. Sir Philip Sydney was never so much a gentleman—mirror though he was of England's knighthood—as when upon the field of Zutphen, as he lay in his own blood, he waived the draught of cold spring water that was brought to quench his mortal thirst, in favor of a dying soldier. St. Paul described a gentleman, when he exhorted the Philippian Christians, 'Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any praise, think of these things.' And Dr. Isaac Barrow, in his admirable sermon on the calling of a gentleman, pointedly says, 'he should labor and study to be a leader unto virtue and a notable prompter thereof; directing and exciting men thereto by his exemplary conversation; encouraging them by his countenance and authority; rewarding the goodness of meaner people by his bounty and favor; he should be such a gentleman as Noah, who preached righteousness, by his words and works, before a profane world.'"

I'M TOO BUSY.

A merchant sat at his office desk; various letters were spread before him; his whole being absorbed in the intricacies of his business.

A zealous friend of mankind entered the office: "I want to interest you a little in a new effort for the temperance cause," said the good man.

The merchant cut him off, by replying: "Sir, you must excuse me; but really I'm too busy to attend to that subject now."

"But, sir, intemperance is on the increase among us," said his friend.

"Is it? I'm sorry; but I'm too busy at present to do any thing."

"When shall I call again, sir?"

"I cannot tell. I'm very busy. I'm busy every day. Excuse me, sir; I wish you a good morning." Then bowing the intruder out of the office, he resumed the study of his papers.

The merchant had frequently repulsed the friends of humanity in this manner. No matter what was the object, he was always too busy to listen to their claims. He had even told his minister that he was too busy for anything but to make money.

But one morning a disagreeable stranger stepped very softly to his side, laying a cold, moist hand upon his brow, and saying, "Go home with me!"

The merchant laid down his pen; his head grew dizzy; his stomach felt faint and sick; he left the counting-room, went home, and retired to his bed-chamber.

His unwelcome visitor had followed him, and now took his place by the bed-side, whispering, ever and anon, "You must go with me."

A cold chill settled on the merchant's heart, spectres of ships, notes, houses, and lands, flitted before his excited mind. Still his pulse beat slower and slower, his heart heaved heavily, thick films gathered over his eyes, his tongue refused to speak. Then the merchant knew that the name of his visitor was Death!

All other claimants on his attention, except the friends of Mammon, had always found a quick dismissal in the magic phrase, "I'm too busy." Humanity, mercy, religion, had alike begged his influence, means, and attention, in vain; but when death came, the excuse was powerless; he was compelled to have leisure to die.

Let us beware how we make ourselves too busy to secure life's great end. When the excuse rises to our lips, and we are about to say we are too busy to do good, let us remember we cannot be too busy to die.

THE LIGHT OF NATURE.

There lived many years ago, in Philadelphia, a celebrated Indian chief by the name of Tedyuscung. He was sitting one evening by the fireside of a friend, both of them looking silently at the fire, indulging their own reflections.

At length the silence was interrupted by the friend, who said, 'I will tell you what I have been thinking of; I was thinking of a rule delivered by the Author of the Christian religion, which, from its excellence, we call the Golden Rule.'

'Stop,' said Tedyuscung, 'don't praise it to me, but rather tell me what it is, and let me think for myself. I do not wish you to tell me what it is.'

'It is, for one man to do to another as he would the other should do to him.'

'That's impossible! it it cannot be done,' Tedyuscung immediately replied; and taking his pipe, lighted it, and commenced walking about the room. In about a quarter of an hour he came up to his friend with a smiling countenance, and (taking the pipe from his mouth) said, 'Brother, I have been thoughtful on what you told me. If the Great Spirit that made man would give him a new heart, he could do as you say, but not else.'

EZEK. xxxvi., 26.—A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh.

RIGHT IS MIGHT.

As sure as God liveth, as sure as the Holy one of Israel is the Lord of Hosts, the Almighty—right is might, and ever was and ever shall be so. Holiness is might; meekness is might; patience is might; humility is might; self-denial is might; faith is might; love is might; every gift of the spirit is might. The cross was two pieces of dead wood, and a helpless unresisting man was nailed to it; yet it was mightier than the world, and triumphed and will ever triumph over it. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but no pure, holy deed, or word or thought. On the other hand, might, that which the children of earth call so, the strong wind, the earthquake, the fire, perishes through its own violence, self-exhaustion and self consumed; as our age of the world has been allowed to witness in the most signal example. For many of us remember, and they who do not, have heard from their fathers, how the mightiest man on earth, he who had girt himself with all might, except that of right, burst like a tempest-cloud, burnt himself out like a conflagration, and only left the scars of his ravages to mark where he had been. Who among you can look into an infant's face, and not see a power in it mightier than all the armies of Attila or Napoleon.

SEEK RELIGION WHILE YOUNG.—Let no one think, that there is greater difficulty in becoming a Christian in childhood, than there is at a later period in life. There is much less. If any one wanted a tree in front of his house, would he go and dig and transplant a great tree, with a tall heavy trunk, wide-spreading branches, and great roots running deep into the ground? He might possibly do it; but it would be a work of great difficulty, and the tree would not be likely to live. He would rather choose a young tree, which would be easily and safely transplanted. In like manner, the difficulty of becoming religious, increases as one grows older.

A woman of ninety lay on her death-bed, who had been a disciple of Christ for half a century. Conversing with a friend, she said, "Tell all the children that an old woman, who is just on the borders of eternity, is very much grieved that she did not begin to love the Saviour when she was a child. Tell them, youth is the time to serve the Lord." [Cong. Jour.

A BEAUTIFUL ALLEGORY.

When God created man he commanded his angels to visit him on earth, and guide him in his ways, so that he might foretaste the bliss of the life to come. But lustful man sought after sensual joys in preference to those of heaven, and growing greedy of worldly fruits, began to quarrel with his brethren for the possession of them; and the guardian angels wept among themselves. But when the strong oppressed the weak and took from them by force the produce of their soil, justice rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew back to heaven. And when the weak overcame the strong with falsehood and deceit, and got from them by cunning what they feared to take by force, truth rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew back to heaven. And when the injured went forth to slay their injurers, and crimsoned the plain with their brother's blood, peace rose up sorrowing, and leaving earth flew back to heaven. Thus each bad act scared some good angel from the world, until forgiveness—the most beautiful of all—alone remained behind.

And when she heard anger and revenge whisper dark deeds in man's ears, and counsel them to repeat the wrong that had been done to them, she rose up sorrowing, and said, "I will not leave the earth. While my sister angels were here, I might have rested in my Father's bosom, for man needed me not. But now that they have fled, I will seek to make him listen to my voice, telling him that, as he cherishes forgiveness here, so will forgiveness cherish him hereafter." So the lovliest child of heaven remained on earth; and peace and love, repenting, flew back, and followed in her train.

REMEDIES.

For a fit of Passion—Walk out in the open air; you may speak your mind to the winds without hurting any one, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton.

For a fit of Idleness—Count the tickings of a clock. Do this for one hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat the next, and work like a negro.

For a fit of Extravagance and Folly—Go to the work-house, or speak with the ragged and wretched inmates of a jail, and you will be convinced—

> Who makes his bed of brier and thorn,
> Must be content to lie forlorn.

For a fit of Ambition—Go into the church-yard and read the grave stones; they will tell you the end of ambition. The grave will soon be your bed-chamber, the earth your pillow, corruption your father, and the worm your mother and sister.

For a fit of Repining—Look about for the halt and the blind, and visit the bed-ridden, and afflicted, and deranged; and they will make you ashamed of complaining of your lighter afflictions.

For a fit of Despondency—Look on the good things which God has given you in this world, and at those which he has promised to his followers in the next. He who goes into his garden to look for cob-webs and spiders, no doubt will find them; while he who looks for a flower, may return into his house with one blooming in his bosom,

For all fits of Doubt, Perplexity, and Fear—Whether they respect the body or the mind; whether they are a load to the shoulders, the head, or the heart, the following is a radical cure which may be relied on, for I had it from the Great Physician—"Cast thy burden on the Lord, he will sustain thee."

HIGH VIEWS OF THE MINISTRY.—"The moment we permit ourselves," says Robt. Hall, "to think lightly of the Christian ministry, our right arm is withered; nothing but imbecility and relaxation remains. For no man ever excelled in a profession to which he did not feel an attachment bordering on enthusiasm; though what in other professions is enthusiasm, is in ours the dictate of sobriety and truth."

A PREACHER'S EXPERIENCE.—I am arrived at a time of life when my views of early habits particularly in relation to the ministry, are greatly changed. I see many things in a different light from what I once did; such as the beauty of order, of regularity, and the wisdom of seeking to win souls by kindness, rather than to convert them by hastiness, and what I once called fidelity. I admire more the idea which I have of our blessed Lord's spirit and ministry than once I did.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.—It is said, (according to the Presbyterian,) that no small number of the Jesuit priests, who have been shipped from Europe to supply the great west, are ready for a return, in consequence, as they alledge, of the impossibility of conforming themselves to the customs of Western life. It is certainly easier to sun one's self in idleness under a fair Italian sky, than "to rough it" among the wilds of America.

'I never go to church,' said a country tradesman to his parish clergyman; 'I always spend Sunday in settling accounts.' The minister immediately replied, 'You will find, sir, that the day of judgment will be spent in the same manner.'

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 1, 1848.

☞ The Editor of the Recorder expects to attend the meeting of the Central Association at Lincklaen next week, when he will be prepared to transact any business connected with the paper.

THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association held its Tenth Session with the church in Plainfield, N. J., commencing on fifty-day, May 25, 1848. The attendence was unusually large, and the deliberations interesting.—The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. T. B. Brown, from Luke 12 : 48—"For unto whomsover much is given, of him shall much be required." It was designed to show, that the present position of the Seventh-day Baptists is such as to demand and encourage increased exertion on their part to promote the cause of Christ in general, and a knowledge of the truths which distinguish them in particular.

After the discourse, the Association was called to order by Bro. A. D. Titsworth, Chairman of the last Session, who read the Rules of Order. A Committee was then appointed to nominate officers, who in due time made a report, and the following were elected:

Moderator—PELEG CLARKE, of R. I.
Rec. Sec—Samuel Davison, of N. J.
Ass't Rec. Sec.—Paul Stillman, of N. Y.
Cor. Sec.—S. S. Griswold, Hopkinton, R. I.
Treasurer—H. S. Berry, Westerly, R. I.

Letters from the Churches.

The letters to the Association were read by the Recording Secretary, and gave rather a cheering account of the state of the churches. In a few instances, it is true, no additions were reported, while death has been doing its accustomed work. But most of the churches reported an increase in numbers; the whole increase being, we believe, something more than one hundred, or about seven per cent. on the number of members reported last year. Of the additions, a large majority were by baptism, although quite a number were by conversion to our views of the Sabbath. It is gratifying to learn, also, that there is in nearly all of the churches a growing interest in Sabbath Schools, and in the various benevolent enterterprizes of the denomination. Upon the whole, the letters from the churches were such as to encourage the hearts of Christians, and call for gratitude and thanksgiving to God.

Missionary Operations.

At the last annual meeting, an Executive Committee was appointed to take the oversight of missionary operations within the bounds of the Association—to decide upon the fields which ought to be occupied, and obtain suitable persons to occupy them. From a report made by this Committee, it appears that during the year there has been received for this object $325 79, most of which has been paid out for missionary labor at Newport and vicinity, and at South Kingston. Bro. C. M. Lewis has labored at the former place nine months, and Bro. Henry Clark has supplied the church at the latter place for six months. The Report also contained a recommendation that the missions at these two places should be continued during the coming year. This recommendation elicited considera- discussion, in the progress of which the prospects at each place were pretty fully considered. It seems that at Newport there is a good meeting-house, and a congregation of some thirty or forty. There are also three or four places in the neighborhood where Sabbath-keepers reside, and where the labors of a missionary would be welcomed, both by our brethren and their neighbors. Since the mission was commenced there some years ago, although the church has not been constantly supplied, nineteen members have been added, making the present number thirty. In view of these facts, the general opinion seemed to be, that the field ought to be farther occupied. At South Kingston, the church had been for some time distracted and scattered. Since missionary labor was commenced there, however, it has been drawn together, several persons have been baptized, and several others have embraced the Sabbath. After a full consideration of the whole subject, the Association adopted the Report of the Executive Committee, and determined to continue the missions at Newport and South Kingston, so far as the funds contributed by the churches will allow.

Report on the State of Religion.

We give below the Report as presented by the Committee, presuming that our readers would rather have the article entire, than any statement of its substance that we can make:—

Your Committee respectfully report, that on an examination of the letters from the churches, and the reports of the local missionaries of the Association, and the Associational Messengers, they think that the Association has much cause for gratitude to the Father of all mercies for the blessings of salvation bestowed upon many in our midst, for the invigorating of churches that were ready to expire, and for the peace and Christian fellowship of the churches in general. We fear, however, that there is a great want of whole-hearted consecration to the cause of the Redeemer in those things that pertain to the support of the various instrumentalities requisite for a faithful and zealous defense of all the holy truth of the Lord. It has been with much labor, and amidst many embarrassments, that the Executive Missionary Board have carried on the missions confided to their care; and the new Board enter upon the same duties under similar difficulties. Yet it appears from the reports, that these local efforts for the resuscitation and enlargement of the cause of truth in parts of Rhode Island, have been attended with success equal to that of any part of the labors of our churches in any field east or west, and that they are still as full of promise as any other field in which we could expend our labors. We think these local efforts may very properly be commended to the liberal support of the churches for another year; and would earnestly urge upon the churches a ready response to the calls of the Executive Board for the means to carry forward these local missions.

The following extracts from the letters are expressive of the state in which the churches view the cause among themselves:—

Newport, R. I.—"The state of religious feeling among us is far beneath that standard of piety which is our reasonable duty and exalted privilege; but we can truly say, that our desires are large and full that we may be aided in sustaining a minister in this place."

1st Hopkinton, R. I.—"We have great reason to rejoice with you, brethren, that the Lord has been doing a great work around us in pouring out his Spirit, converting sinners, and reclaiming wanderers from the fold of Christ. Although we as a church have not been visited in a special manner, yet the cloud of mercy has been hovering over us, while a few drops have fallen among us."

Piscataway, N. J.—"During the past year, it has been a languishing time with the small branch of God's Zion that we represent." "We have great reason to be thankful that we enjoy peace and Christian fellowship among ourselves. Our Sabbath congregations are every year increasing, and our religious meetings are well attended."

Waterford, Ct.—"We have experienced some of the showers of divine grace; sinners have been converted, prodigals have returned to their Father's house, and saints have been made to rejoice, and there is now a good degree of religious feeling manifested in this church."

Shiloh, N. J.—"We have much reason to make mention of mercies from the Lord towards us, and of painful visitations of his hand in the bereavement of some of our families. On the whole, we are encouraged to believe the Lord will yet bless us and build us up a people for his praise."

Marlboro, N. J.—"Our hearts are filled with mingled emotions of joy and grief, for while we have reason to praise the Lord for his goodness manifested in the conversion of sinners among us, we have to mourn the loss of some of our number by the cold hand of death."

New York.—Nothing of special interest is recorded in this letter, yet we believe that the cause is slowly gaining in this city.

Plainfield, N. J., "bear testimony to the goodness of our heavenly Father, who, notwithstanding our supineness and want of zeal in his cause, has continued to us the influence of his Spirit, and led us to feel our need, and determine to seek a revival of his work in our midst."

Westerly, R. I.—"It has been a cold and dark time with us through the year, but there appears at present to be an increased spirit felt on the part of the church for the advancement of the Redeemer's cause."

3d Hopkinton, R. I.—"Our hearts have recently been cheered by witnessing the outpouring of God's Holy Spirit in our midst, which has resulted in the hopeful conversion of some sinners, and the comforting of the saints."

Richmond, R. I.—"By the long suffering of God and his mercy towards us, not willing that any should perish, we have been enabled to overcome our sins in a measure, and are now enjoying peace and fellowship one with another, and feel resolved to press our way onward."

2d Hopkinton, R. I.—"During the past year our church has to some extent enjoyed a refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Wanderers have been reclaimed, sinners converted, and saints made to rejoice. The bow of promise has again spanned the arch over our heads, and the dove of peace built her nest in our midst."

Pawcatuck, R. I.—"We have much to encourage us to labor in the cause of Christ; the wanderer restored, many converted to Christ, our congregation increased, a number have embraced the Sabbath, and we have union, peace, and brotherly kindness among us."

South Kingston, R. I.—"We have had a long night of adversity as a church;—but we trust that God directed your Missionary Board to send us help in our low estate. We have received additions to our little number, all of whom are converts to the long-despised Sabbath of the Lord, and we are blest with a good degree of union among ourselves, and feel in view of the future to trust in God and move forward."

Associational Messenger.

Bro. S. S. Griswold made a report of his labors as Associational Messenger. In the course of last winter he visited the churches at Plainfield, New Market, Shiloh, and Marlboro N. J., and New York City, laboring in each, both publicly and privately, as much as his time would allow. Bro. D. Clawson has also visited the churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut. In connection with this report a discussion arose as to the expediency of appointing an Associational Messenger for the next year; and after considerable discussion it was decided not to appoint. The general impression seemed to be, that such hasty visits as the Messengers are under the necessity of making, are not as profitable as they are troublesome and expensive.

Resolutions.

At an early stage of the Association's proceedings, a Committee was appointed to arrange the business, and among other things they presented a series of resolutions, of which the following were passed:—

1. Resolved, That the churches of this Association ought to cherish with undiminished interest the objects and labors of the American Sabbath Tract Society.

This resolution was moved by Samuel Davison, and seconded by Samuel B. Crandall, both of whom made remarks upon it. Bro. Davison spoke of the publications of the Society as bearing vitally and favorably upon the validity and immutability of the divine law. He also showed that the results of its past labors, in converting men to the Sabbath and establishing the churches, were such as ought to inspire confidence in the institution and the mode of its operations. Bro. Crandall spoke first of the errors in the world, and the consequent necessity of exertion on the part of those who have the truth. In the course of his remarks, which were listened to with deep interest, he related many incidents calculated to illustrate the influence of such silent messengers as tracts upon the hearts and consciences of men.

2. Resolved, That we consider it the duty of every Christian who sustains the responsible relation of the head of a family, to maintain the regular and daily worship of God in his own house; and that the neglect of this duty is a deplorable feature in the character of those professors of religion who are guilty of neglecting it, calling for the earnest labors of pastors and ministers to correct the evil.

This resolution was moved by Walter B. Gillett, and seconded by Isaac Moore, with appropriate remarks. It was also spoken to by G. H. Perry, I. D. Titsworth, A. B. Burdick, L. Titsworth, Henry Clarke, H. S. Berry, C. M. Lewis, B. F. Chester, and others. Seldom have we seen so deep an interest manifested in the discussion of a resolution of the kind. We cannot doubt that a great majority of the delegates resolved, while listening to the discussion, to carry out the spirit of the resolution themselves, and to endeavor to secure attention to it among others. A resolution was subsequently passed, requesting each minister within the bounds of the Association to present the subject to his congregation on the first Sabbath in July.

3. Resolved, That we feel grateful for that degree of interest manifested in our churches in the cause of Education; and that we recommend to their patronage the DeRuyter Institute and Alfred Academy, as affording to them great advantages for the education of the young.

Remarks were made upon this resolution by Daniel Coon, T. B. Brown, S. S. Griswold, A. B. Burdick, and G. H. Perry, who urged the importance of education, not only to individuals as a means of enabling them to understand and discharge their whole duty to God and man, but to the denomination in order that it may exert an influence proportioned to the present demands. On every hand fields of labor invite us, both at home and abroad. For those who are to labor in the missionary field all admit the importance of education; and there is no reason why it should not be secured to all, since all have responsibilities to meet.

The following resolution was presented by T. B. Brown, who remarked briefly upon it:—

4. Resolved, That the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, in its efforts to propagate the gospel of truth among the heathen, claims the vigorous support of the churches composing this body.

5. Resolved, That this Association would express its continued and growing interest in the Sabbath Recorder, and would urge upon the agents and subscribers of the paper the importance of being prompt in collecting and paying its dues.

The fifth resolution was presented by Lucius Crandall, who advocated it somewhat at length. He thought the paper had proved not only an able auxiliary of our benevolent enterprises, but a valuable record of passing events in every department; on which account there was every reason for expressing our growing interest in it, and no reason why it should not be paid for. If its utility were doubtful, there would be some excuse for delinquencies; but such is not the case, and every man who owes the establishment owes for value received. True, we are sometimes told that larger papers can be had at a lower price. But he believed that those who declined taking this paper on account of its price, and took a cheaper paper half filled with "sarsaparilla," got a hard bargain in the long run. Mr. Crandall then went on to state his opinion, that our denomination needs a Publishing Establishment of its own, at which shall be printed our paper, together with such books, tracts, &c., as we may need, and the profits of which shall go back to the denomination for the support of missionary and other benevolent operations, as the Associations shall direct. He therefore proposed the appointment of a committee of nine to consider and report upon the subject. After various suggestions from different individuals, such a Committee was appointed; who, on the succeeding day, reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the Association:—

Whereas, our experience for years past in the publishing department, has convinced us that in order to meet the growing wants of the denomination, we need a more ample and permanent publishing organization than we have ever had; therefore—

Resolved, That we invite the several sister Associations each to appoint three delegates to meet with the same number appointed by this Association, at New Market, N. J., on the 5th day of September next, (being two days previous to our Anniversaries,) to mature a plan for a Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Establishment.

Resolved, That in order to be prepared to carry out the foregoing proposition, in case the other Associations respond to it, we appoint the following brethren as our delegates:—Lucius Crandall, David Dunn, and Thomas B. Stillman.

The Committee appointed at a previous meeting of the Eastern Association to correspond with the other Associations in relation to a new Hymn Book, reported that they had attended to the business in connection with others, and that the result was a new collection of Hymns entitled "Christian Psalmody." In connection with this report the Association adopted a resolution recommending the new book to the churches as well adapted to meet their wants.

The subject of appointing a delegate to attend the Central and Western Associations, having been brought up, Bro Lucius Crandall was appointed the delegate, and Geo. B. Utter his alternate.

During the session of the Association, sermons were preached and collections taken in behalf of the Tract and Missionary Societies. We did not learn what the collection for tract purposes amounted to, but that for missionary purposes amounted to between fifty and sixty dollars.

The Association adjourned on first-day, May 28, to meet next year at Pawcatuck, R. I.

THE PRIMEVAL SABBATH.

BY REV. WM. H. BLACK.

When the great Maker had fulfill'd His plan
  Of this vast world, and fill'd earth, sea and air;
Had planted Eden for His creature Man,
  And, to enjoy it, plac'd our Parents there;
    God saw His works, pronounc'd them good and blest,
    And the Sev'nth Day became His Day of Rest.

Angels of light beheld his works, and sung
  How great their Maker was, how good and wise;
His praise resounded on each heav'nly tongue,
  And strains of rapture swept along the skies.
    O happy day! that saw God's works complete,
    And Man first bow in worship at His feet.

God lov'd the happy day of His own Rest,
  And for himself He claim'd th' auspicious time;
For His own worship hallow'd it, and bless'd,
  To be observed in ev'ry age and clime.
    Six days He wrought, and so His creatures may;
    The sev'nth He calls His holy Sabbath day.

All glory be to Thee, Almighty Lord!
  And endless honors to Thy holy name!
The world came into being at Thy word;
  By Thy command rose nature's wondrous frame.
    Thine are we, not our own, and Thy just praise,
    This day, our joyful hearts and tongues shall raise.

Millyard, London, 28th 4th mo.

Statistics of Benevolence.—It is said that the contributions of the last year to the various benevolent societies, as appeared from their reports at the recent Anniversaries, have been considerably in advance of any previous year. The amount of the American Tract, Bible, Board of Missions, Home Missions, Seaman's Friend, Colonization, Anti-Slavery, Protestant, Foreign Evangelical, Jews, Institution for the Blind at New York, and General Assembly's Board of Missions, is $1,120,818. To which, if the three great Baptist Societies be added—the American and Foreign Bible, Union Missionary, and Home Missionary—the aggregate will be $1,276,951.

Noble Sentiment.—The new Archbishop of Canterbury, on being introduced at the recent meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by its venerable President, Lord Bexly, says a correspondent of the Evangelist, very gracefully rebuked the noisy applause with which he was greeted, by stating, as his opinion, that the cause of the Bible could confer honor on any man, but could receive honor from no man.

Newspaper Union.—The Christian Reflector and the Christian Watchman, two Baptist papers published in Boston, have joined interests, and come to us now as one large paper, under the title of "Christian Reflector and Christian Watchman." By this union the Baptists will no doubt secure a better paper than either of the old ones alone could have been. The new paper is edited by Rev. J. W. Olmstead and Rev. Wm. Hague.

Glance at the Life of a Colporteur.—The following dark picture of the life of a tract distributor in Ohio, is given by a correspondent of the New York Recorder, and shows this to be a field demanding energy and enterprise in those who would labor in it:—

"My field is a very difficult one. It is a swampy country, and hard to get over, especially where poverty and ignorance so extensively prevail. I have traveled for days when my horse would go to his knee joints in mud, and I could only dismount on the door steps of the cabins. The people have no enterprise, and they seem to have lost all disposition to do anything. Wickedness seems to abound. Some of the log houses are wholly destitute of chairs, beds, and tables; in one cabin, with the parents and seven children, there was not the first evidence of a bed, but they slept in the corners of the room upon the bare floor! The father could read; he said he was once a preacher, but could not maintain his family and gave up the work in despair. They were totally destitute of books, but gratefully received the volumes and tracts I gave them."

Colored Sailors' Home, N. Y.—This boarding-house for colored seamen has been open eight years and six months, May 1, 1848. Average annual number of boarders, 450. Whole number in eight and a half years, 3,825. Average annual number unable to pay their bills, and true objects of charity, 60. Whole number in eight and a half years, 510. Average amount of aid, say $3 to each, or to the whole number, $1,530. Mr. William P. Powell evidently has the best interests of his colored seafaring brethren at heart, and has manfully breasted the difficulties of sustaining such an establishment. He has, from the beginning, shared the confidence of the Directors of the American Seamen's Friend Society, and has occasionally received some pecuniary aid. A small appropriation has recently been made in his behalf. It was all the Directors, with the numerous demands upon their treasury, felt justified in giving; but is really insufficient for an object so meritorious. Hence we take this method to say to those specially interested in the welfare of the 2,200 colored seamen who sail out of New York, here is an opportunity for you to show whether your interest has any principle or foundation for good fruits. As Mr. Powell contemplates enlarging his house, aid is much needed. Money, or such articles as any boarding-house keeper needs, may be sent either to Mr. P., 61 Cherry-st., or to the office of the American Seamen's Friend Society, 82 Wall-st., New York, and will be duly acknowledged in the Sailors' Magazine.

Prof. Morse has just made a donation to the American Tract Society of 50 shares of the New York and Buffalo Telegraph Company—at the par value, $2,500.

At its late annual examination, Princeton Seminary licensed thirty-four graduates as preachers of the Gospel.

NEWS FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Hibernia arrived at New York on the 27th ult., bringing Liverpool dates to the 13th. The news received by her is thought to indicate that a general war in Europe is inevitable. France, it is said, will assist Italy, Italy will advance against Austria, Russia will march upon Poland and Prussia, Germany, Denmark, and other States, will find a cause for open hostilities with their neighbors. England, at any other time, would interfere, but at present she is weakened by Ireland, and the revolutionary spirit that is at work in her own narrow boundaries.

There is but little of interest to note in the accounts from England. On the 10th of May, a terrible accident took place on the Great Western Railroad. An express train ran into some freight cars, which some of the workmen on the road had negligently left standing on the track. Four persons were instantly killed and thirteen wounded, some of them fatally. The workmen implicated, a porter and assistant porter, have been arrested for manslaughter.

Irish papers say that the number of emigrants to this country at the present time is small, when compared with the thousands who came last year. Still it is stated that the condition of the poor in many parts is most appalling.

Our last advices from France announced the organization of the National Assembly. Since then the Provisional Government has given a full account of its stewardship, and placed all things in the hands of those elected by the people. France, therefore, is now a Republic, with a National Assembly and responsible Ministers, and a Constitution is being framed.

From Italy, the news is important. The Pope having refused to declare war against the Catholic Emperor of Austria, the Roman population arose on the 29th of April, took possession of the gates of the city, declared the Cardinals to be conspirators against the people, and traitors to Italy, and informed the Pope, through a deputation, that he had twenty-four hours' time to make up his mind to declare war against Austria. But should he persist in his refusal, he should be only Bishop of Rome—a Provisional Government would be appointed for civil purposes, and the Roman States would join the Italian League. This energy was effectual. On the evening of May 1, Pius IX. consented. He transferred to the head of the revolutionary party the formation of a Civil Ministry, to whom he gave carte blanche for all temporal affairs. War was declared against Austria, and numerous arrests were made among the reäctionary party. Simultaneously with this, an outbreak took place in Naples on the 29th of April, which overthrew the hesitating, delaying Ministry.

From Spain, we learn that an unsuccessful insurrection had been attempted at Madrid, on the 7th. The conflict was sanguinary, and lasted several hours. Among the killed is General Tologio, brother-in-law to Maria. A considerable number of the insurgents had been taken prisoners, and thirty of them were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death. They were about to be shot when the post left for England.

The Queen of Portugal has issued a decree appointing a commission to carry into effect the abolition of slavery in the Portuguese ultra-marine possessions.

Late accounts represent that the Danish-Holstein question may probably be determined by negotiation, and that in consequence the Danish Government had countermanded an extensive order for the supply of arms. The Prussian troops had entered Jutland, and had occupied the fortress of Fredericia, on the Little Belt, which was surrendered without resistance, as the Danish troops had previously retired into the island of Funen.

The elections had passed quietly in most parts of Rhenish Prussia, though alarming riots broke out at Treves on the 3d inst., and were not quelled until several persons had been killed and wounded. Several barricades were raised in the town, and guns were brought to force them; but tranquility was ultimately restored without the employment of artillery.

The latest accounts from the Duchy of Posen announce nothing but insurrection, anarchy, and bloodshed. At Xionz, a town south-east of Posen, 1,000 insurgents fortified themselves within the place, and bade defiance to the summons of the Prussian General, notwithstanding the overwhelming force under his orders. A sanguinary conflict ensued on the 29th ult.; and the Poles, who had nearly 200 men killed and wounded, and 700 made prisoners, defended themselves with desperate valor, causing a loss of nearly 100 killed and wounded to their assailants. The Prussian troops, after taking possession of the town, which was nearly destroyed by fire, collected and sent their prisoners to Custrin, and then advanced to Newstadt and Miloslaw. A similar fight occurred at Miloslaw, where the Prussians suffered much from the fire of the Polish sharp-shooters, who picked out the officers.

The accounts from Hungary testify to the state of anarchy in which that country is plunged. A rebellious spirit, such as was never known before, seems to animate the peasantry ever since the recent concessions were made to them. The nobles, who feel that they have been trampled on, take part with the peasantry. The new Ministry at Pesth appears paralyzed, and the national guard, far from interfering for the suppression of disturbances, barely maintains a decent neutrality.

At Presburg the Jews have been atrociously treated, their houses ransacked, their household furniture destroyed, and the wares taken from their shops. The plunder lasted 28 hours, when the Jews, numbering 300 families, retired from the town, at the request of the authorities, and encamped in the open air in the Schlossburg. Even the Jewish hospital has been ransacked, and the sick were torn from their beds and badly treated, without difference of age or sex, while even the Jewish tombs have not been respected.

General Intelligence.

Desperation of Slavers.—The following is from the African Luminary, by a recent arrival from Liberia:—

It is reported that a very unpleasant affair took place not long since at Gallenas. An officer of the Penelope, one of Her Majesty's steamers on this station, having gone in a boat near the shore, to ascertain what was going on at that famous slave-mart, and venturing to land on the beach in a canoe, while his boat and crew lay outside the surf, was met by a Spaniard with the air of one intending to exchange salutations of friendship, who was not suspected until he revealed himself to be an assassin by a desperate thrust at the throat of the officer, which, fortunately, took effect upon his face only. The officer was not too severely wounded to retort upon the assassin; accordingly, the fellow was given to understand, by something more than words, that he had encountered one whose spirit was raised instead of being sunken by his desperate thrust. At this exhibition of more than Spanish courage he fled, but was overtaken and killed. In the course of the affair several of the empty baracoons were destroyed by the boat's crew which were subsequently landed.

The Spaniards or slave-dealers on the coast are becoming desperately impudent. Their business is certainly curtailed and unprofitable on this part of the coast. They buy slaves as usual, and are, to some extent, furnished with merchandize by some peddling merchant vessels, but the difficulty is to ship them; they succeed in this sometimes, but so many of their vessels are picked up by the English and American men-of-war, that the business is rendered unprofitable. We feel quite sanguine that this traffic, so inhuman and revolting to the finer feelings of human nature, in a few years at most on this coast will cease through the efficient operations of these squadrons and the influence of this government, now that all that part of the coast, excepting Gallenas, in which it has been carried on, has become the lawful territory of this Republic.

Bloody Tragedy.—The following account, from the Cincinnati Atlas of the 20th ult., shows the horror with which slaves view transportation to the far South, and is a sufficient answer to those who prate of the contentment and happiness of the victims of "the peculiar institution:"—

On Thursday Mr. Mullen sold to a dealer, who was buying slaves for the Southern market, a negro man, his wife, and one child, some fifteen or twenty months old. They were placed in Covington jail for safe keeping during the night, and yesterday morning were found with their throats horribly cut. The woman and child were dead; the man, though dreadfully mangled about the neck, was yet alive, and it is thought may get well. According to the negro's own admission, he and his wife went at this horrid butchery deliberately—preferring death to Southern bondage. The mother killed the child herself, and then offered her own throat to the knife, and urged her husband to kill her. He cut her throat, and then attempted to cut his own, but did not fully succeed. Such facts as these make their own comments. How suggestive of reflection are they, and of what reflection?

The Chinese Junk.—The Boston Times says: "We have before recorded the arrival of Capt. Kellett on the coast of France, after a stormy passage. From the Island of Jersey, the junk was towed by a steamer to London, where she was being repaired for exhibition. In a letter to a friend in this city, Capt. Kellett says, "We had a most awful passage—I lost most of my sails, boats, one man overboard, and was compelled to anchor on the coast of France, near where the Reliance and the Conqueror were lost some years since. The next day I got a pilot who took me to Jersey, from which I started in tow of a steamer for London. I was only 21 days from land to land. We are now located in the India Docks, where we are very sure of doing well, as we are treated very liberally by all concerned. We are at the foot of the Blackwall Railway, and near the terminus of the Eastern Counties Railway, each of which are to pay us a certain portion of their receipts. I am publishing a pamphlet, giving some account of my voyage, &c., in which I shall endeavor to express my gratitude to Capt. R. B. Forbes of your city, whose disinterested kindness to a brother sailor I shall always remember."

Massachusetts Enterprise.—A bill is before the Legislature of Massachusetts to incorporate the Hadley Falls Manufacturing Company. The Company proposes to build a dam 1,200 feet long and from 20 to 30 feet high, and a canal 140 feet wide, varying in depth from 15 to 20 feet, and 3 miles long. This will give a fall of 60 feet, and power enough to drive 1,200,000 spindles, affording labor to 100,000 operatives. There is also another bill, chartering the Troy and Greenfield Railroad, with power to tunnel Hoosick mountain. This tunnel is to be 4 or 5 miles long, requiring five years to make it, at an expense of about $3,000,000. It seems that this tunnel might be avoided by extending the road 19 miles at a 60 foot grade; yet all engineers coucur in preferring the tunnel, costly as it is. This fact serves to illustrate the strength of objections to a high grade.

Indian Difficulties on the Frontier.—The Van Buren Intelligencer says that it is stated by Col. Upshaw, the Chickasaw agent, that difficulties have recently taken place between some of the prairie Indian tribes and the citizens of Texas, near Fort Washita. A party of Wacoes had killed three Texan surveyors, and also four rangers, who came upon the party whilst drying the scalps of the murdered surveyors. A detachment of Capt. Johnson's rangers had been fired upon about the same time, while holding a talk with the Indians. A brisk fire ensued, in which some twelve Indians were killed. Col. Upshaw states, that a short time since, a war party of 120 Kickapoos crossed Red River about eight miles above Fort Washita. Their destination was unknown. There were no dragoons, and scarcely any means of mounting a dozen infantry to interrupt them. Dragoons are much needed at our frontier posts.

Attempt to Kidnap.—A Pittsburgh paper says that a girl, claimed as the property of a man in the South, and who escaped about a year ago, and came to this city on the steamer Cambria, has been residing in Allegany for some time. Her master becoming aware of her locality, employed a negro man to make a tender of affection to her, and propose marriage, which duty he performed. The marriage evening was fixed—Wednesday evening. The lover had his plans laid for cajoling the lady off under pretence of celebrating the ceremonies, but in truth his object was, as above stated, to deliver her up to the man who claimed her. The object leaked out on Wednesday, and the girl's friends informed her of the situation in which she was, and her abduction was prevented. The negro man was most severely handled.

An Old Man.—The Buffalo Commercial says, we chronicle to-day the death of Ezekiel Lane, who lived to the advanced age of 103 years. In 1795 there were only four buildings on the present site of Buffalo—of these the first one was erected by Ezekiel Lane, and his father-in-law, Martin Middaugh. It was a double log house, on or near Exchange-street—a little east of Washington-street. It was jointly occupied by them till 1807 or 1808, when Judge Barker, father of Jacob A. Barker, moved into it. Middaugh was a German who spoke Indian better than English, and lived as men in poor circumstances often do on the frontiers, by raising some corn and potatoes, working a little for the early settlers, hunting, fishing, and trapping. He also died at an extreme old age in the winter of 1822.

Strange Suicide.—A week or two since, a man named Bruce, living near Cincinnati, Ohio, committed suicide in the following manner:—He went to the church-yard and dug his grave beside his wife, who had been buried some sixteen months before. Having procured a coffin under some pretence, he conveyed it to its destination unobserved. He then took off his clothes, except his shirt, put on a night-cap, and laid himself in the coffin, which he had previously placed in the newly made grave, with a loaded pistol in it. He now drew on the cover of the coffin, and then placed the pistol to his right temple, and fired it. It is supposed that he died instantly. There was no doubt that Bruce was crazy, as he had been partially so since his wife's death.

SUMMARY.

There was a destructive fire on Saturday morning last, at the corner of Twentieth-st. and Ninth-avenue, N. Y., which burnt the extensive stables of Messrs. Kipp & Brown. The flames spread so rapidly, that it was with the utmost difficulty that a few horses in the front stable were saved. All the horses in the interior of the building, to the number of 150, were burnt to death. A large quantity of hay, together with the greater part of the stages, were entirely destroyed. The fire made a large blaze, lighting up the heavens in every direction, which, combined with the cries of the horses, presented a scene too dreadful to describe. It is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary. The whole loss by this fire is estimated at about $75,000, on which there was an insurance of $19,000.

Maj. Mark Andrews, a soldier of the Revolution, died in Perry on the morning of the 16th ult., in the 88th year of his age. He was born in Taunton, Mass., July 10, 1760, and entered the Massachusetts militia on the day he was 17 years of age. He served in Cambridge and on Dorchester Heights soon after the battle of Bunker Hill, and was also with the troops in Rhode Island, and in what is now the State of Maine, then a part of Massachusetts; and toward the close of the war, sailed on board a privateer that did efficient service to the American arms along the coast of New England. He afterwards resided successively in Turner, Monmouth, and Winthrop, Me., and in 1831 removed to Perry, where he has since lived.

The Saugerties Telegraph gives the particulars of a shocking accident which occurred at the Iron Rolling Mill in that village, on Wednesday. Francis Rhind, aged about sixteen years, while engaged at one of the small rollers, was struck by a piece of hoop iron in a red-hot state, which entered his clothes near the hip and extended upward, his clothes keeping it close to his body, until it penetrated between the ribs. A physician was immediately called, and every assistance possible rendered the unfortunate lad, but he expired in about six hours.

A most dastardly attempt at poisoning a whole family took place near Twelve Mile Grove, Ill., recently. The whole family, named Bessy, were taken sick after eating smoked ham brought from a neighboring smoke-house. Upon being tested, the ham was found to be strongly impregnated with arsenic. At the last accounts, three had died and the remainder were dangerously sick. A man was suspected of the diabolical act, and is under bonds for trial.

The Kennebec Journal says that Mr. Pinkham, the Edgecombe murderer, has kept his family on bread and water for nearly a year; that he at one time killed a cow and soaked the meat in an infusion of oak bark before salting it. This was the only meat he would allow them to eat; he killed a flock of sheep and offered them up a sacrifice; and occasionally took his family some distance to a spring, where he washed them all in cold water to prepare for the ascension. His insanity became so evident to his neighbors, that they were about taking measures to have him put in the hospital, when he anticipated them by his horrid work.

The body of Major E. Kirby Smith, who fell in one of the late battles, was to be sent home to the United States. The coffin was waited for by the military funeral committee and the desolate hearted wife of the deceased, at Syracuse. But when the coffin arrived, and was opened for one last glance at the face of the dead, it was fouud to be the wrong body!

Among the articles now sent to England from this country, we notice legs of mutton in casks, in a slightly salted and preserved state, to be manufactured there into mutton hams. If only salted they are admitted duty free, but if they have undergone the process of drying or smoking they are subject to a heavy duty.

Dr. Lewis, who has devoted much time and thought to the subject, has finally succeeded in making sweet, light, wholesome bread, without leaven or fermentation of any kind. His process is quite simple, the ingredients perfectly harmless, and the bread made by his method will long remain sweet and palatable, while there is a saving of several per cent. of the flour hitherto wasted by fermentation and evaporation—in other words, a barrel of flour will make several more loaves of bread by his process than the old one.

The emigrant ship Omega, supposed to have foundered after her emigrants, 336 in number had been taken out of her, nearly two hundred of whom subsequently perished by the wreck of the Barbara, has been passed, perfectly sound, eighty miles west of Sicily lights, by the bark Franklin. Not a soul was on board, and the vessel was drifting with the currents of the ocean. Her rudder and stern post were gone, which appeared to be her only injury; leaving little doubt that had the emigrants remained on board every one would have been saved.

A new experiment in street making is about being tried in Philadelphia. The street, 25 feet in width, will be excavated so that the whole can be used for cellar room, while granite blocks 12 feet in width will form the cartway, supported in the center of the street by a wall, and resting on the foundation walls of the stores that are to line either side of the street. The blocks will be slightly inclined towards the center of the street, where the gutter is to be situated. This is a gigantic undertaking, requiring a large quantity of granite, the street being no less than 380 feet in length.

Mr. Eddy is making arrangements in Boston, and in Augusta, and Gardiner, says the Hallowell Gazette, for extending the telegraph from Portland by way of the Kennebec river, to Calais. It will there be connected with the British line to Halifax. The expense of the line from Portland to Calais through to Bangor, is estimated at $50,000. If this amount is raised the line will be finished through to Bangor next August.

The Association of Steamboat and Propeller owners on the Western Lakes have adopted a tariff of prices to continue through the season. The price for passage from Buffalo to Cleveland is $4,50; to Black River, Huron and Sandusky, $5, to Maumee River, Monroe, and Detroit, $6,00. From Buffalo to Mackinaw, $10; to Milwaukie, Racine, Southport, and Chicago, $12. The price of freights from Buffalo to Chicago, and intermediate posts on the Upper Lakes, is 20 cents for heavy and 35 cents for light freight.

A few days since, at a recruiting station near Bloomington, Ind., a soldier was shot down by order of the recruiting sergeant. It seems that the unfortunate victim, named Newmans, had indulged freely in liquor, and was, in consequence, put under guard. Becoming enraged, he succeeded in escaping from his prison, seized a musket, and threatened to kill the sergeant. At this juncture the sergeant ordered two sentinels who had been placed to guard him, to fire on him, which after the second order they did, which caused his death in two hours.

A trial for a "breach of promise" came off lately in Paulding, Miss., and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and $10,000 damages! During the progress of the trial, proof was elicited that the defendant not only refused to comply with his promise, but accompanied his refusal with disrespectful language of the most aggravated description, which was calculated to blast the young lady's reputation for life.

An American in Paris writes:—"I was at a jeweler's this afternoon with a gentleman, and saw the counter covered with silver dishes, complete dinner services, knives, forks, spoons, all of which he told me he had just bought for old silver at its value in weight in bullion, and he offered to sell me any of it at the same rate. Many of the things, he said, he had sold new the last six months. The most magnificent horses you ever saw, can be had for a hundred dollars the pair."

Mr. James Crane, of Shalersville, Ohio, while engaged a short time since in splitting barrel staves from a white oak tree, which was perfectly sound, and after he had worked up twenty or twenty-five feet from the butt end, discovered what he supposed to be a knot, but on opening it found it to contain a middling sized toad, which remained in this space until there had grown eight inches of timber over it.

Dr. Salisbury, of Jamestown, Chautauque County, convicted at Rochester, for counterfeiting, has been sentenced to 7 years imprisonment in the Penitentiary at Auburn. Charles T. Jefferds, an accomplice of Dr. Salisbury, pleaded guilty, and was sent to the State Prison for one year. Two others, who turned State's evidence, were discharged.

The Wheat Crop, throughout Ohio, we feel warranted in saying, says the Ohio Cultivator, never gave a better promise at this season of the year than at present. We took pains to make particular inquiries on this subject, of the Delegates to the State Convention, on the 10th and 11th inst., and from nearly all parts of the State, the answer was: "The Wheat Crop never looked finer."

The good people of Porter, Wisconsin, resolved to exterminate the Gophers in their locality, and determined to have a hunt, to see if they could not annihilate them. Twenty men were chosen on a side, and the party that was beaten was to pay for a supper for the whole party. The result was that killed 3,196 Gophers.

A great number of birds have fallen victims to the light of the dome of the Capital at Washington. On one morning fifty beautiful birds of different sorts, and of various plumage, were found dead. Started up in the night from their resting places in the square, they are probably drawn to the light, and dash themselves to death against the lantern or the wires.

The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Horatio J. Sprague, to be Consul at Gibralter, vice Horatio Sprague, of Massachusetts, deceased, and of John Griswold, of New York, to be Consul at Shanghai, China, vice Caleb Lyon, of New York, resigned.

A man named Daniel Aiken, recently died at Welford, Canada West, at the advanced age of 120 years. He had during his life contracted seven marriages, and left 570 grand children and great grand children, 300 boys and 270 girls.

Mr. W. H. Tappan, a young artist of Boston, who has been connected with Professor Agassiz for the last two years, has gone on a scientific excursion to the Rocky Mountains, to Oregon, and perhaps to California. Mr. Tappan will make accurate drawings of all the natural objects, and preserve specimens of all the curiosities to be found in the extensive region which he designs to explore. He is also engaged to add to the Royal Museum of Paris, the Royal Society of Berlin, and the Museum of Neufchatel, in Switzerland. The enterprise is a hazardous one, but it will not be without gratifying results.

The Canton Creole, of the 12th, says that a few nights before the dwelling house of Gen. Shackelford was entered by a thief, who stole from his family bed-room a box containing between $350 and $400 in doubloons, American gold, sovereigns and Louisiana notes, together with some $12,000 of the notes of the Mississippi Railroad Company of Natchez. The box contained a great number of his bills receivable and other valuable papers.

The London papers state that Louis Philippe is almost continually in the streets of the metropolis. He comes up in the southwestern railway cars. M. Guizot is living in a very unostentatious manner in Pelham Crescent, Brompton, and is almost daily at the Athenæum club.

William G. Clark, of Chelsea, recently rescued a boy from drowning in the water between Tremont road and the Providence railroad; and while he was engaged in the humane act of restoring the boy to his parents, his watch was stolen from his clothing left on the shore.

The Phœnixville (Pa.) Pioneer states that on the 21st inst., a party of a dozen being in a boat upon the dam at that place, some of the men commenced rocking the boat to frighten the women, when it was overturned, and none of the party being able to swim, three young children were drowned before aid could be rendered.

There is a new agitation on foot in Canada, the ostensible object of which is a repeal of the Union between Upper and Lower Canada; but Mr. Papineau's leading supporters do not hesitate to proclaim that their real object is separation, and a junction with the United States.

A new fraud has appeared, being genuine notes of the New Haven County Bank with counterfeit signatures. Nearly $2,000 of these notes were received on Wednesday at the Bank in its regular package of Exchanges from the Suffolk Bank, Boston. These notes are 5s and 10s, are perfectly new, and no explanation can be given of the manner in which they got into circulation.

The brig Howard, of Baltimore, chartered by the Colonization Society, sailed from Savannah for Liberia on the 6th ult., with ninety emigrants, said to be all very respectable people—one third members of some church, one half read, and some of them are good mechanics.

The boundaries assigned to Wisconsin, by the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, gives the State an area of 50,000 square miles, which is greater than that of New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio.

The Montreal Railroad was opened to the stockholders on the 10th inst., from Concord to Sanborton Bridge. This road is now completed 18 miles from Concord, and about 90 from Boston.

The monthly return of the Housatonic, Norwich, and Worcester, Reading, and Miami Railroads, shows a falling off in business and receipts.

A Mr. Freeland, of Charlestown, recently killed a goat, at 5 o'clock in the morning, and by 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, the skin was tanned, and a pair of shoes made therefrom, ready for service.

Ten or fifteen years ago, six young men, one by one, left their native county, (Fayette, Kentucky,) in search of a livelihood abroad. They have all met, it is said, at the present session, as members of Congress.

Three brothers were sent from Rochester last week to the Auburn State Prison; another brother was already there, and a sister is in the House of Refuge.

Much concern prevails among the turpentine producers of North Carolina, on account of the immense number of pine trees that are dying without any perceptible cause.

The Mormons at Salt Lake, are said to be getting along very well. They have erected two saw mills and a grist mill, and have promising crops.

Some ladies of Venice have petitioned the Government to form a battalion of women, who will tend the sick, make cartridges, and help to fight.

The Grand Jury of St. Louis Co., Mo., has presented the Governor of Missouri 'for the reckless manner in which he has seen fit to exercise the pardoning power.'

The Erie (Pa.) Gazette says that the notes of the Erie Bank are freely taken at par by the merchants of that town, and business men generally.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given, that the 13th Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will be held with the Church in Lincklean, Chenango Co., N. Y., commencing on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June next, (June 7th,) at 11 o'clock A. M. Eld. James Bailey was appointed to preach the introductory discourse; Eld. Russel G. Burdick his alternate.

It is earnestly hoped, that a full delegation will be in attendance, with great hearts, strong arms, and a firm determination to push forward the car of Bible truth, with a resolution and consistency worthy of the cause. Brethren, ask yourselves before God your duty, and fear and tremble lest ye come short of what the judge requires of you. An eternity of happiness is at stake. Will ye risk it?

REPUBLICATION OF
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

SONG OF THE SHIP-BUILDERS.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The sky is ruddy in the East,
  The earth is gray below,
And, spectral in the river-mist,
  Our bare, white timbers show.
Up!—let the sounds of measured stroke
  And grating saw begin;
The broad-axe to the gnarled oak,
  The mallet to the pin!

Hark!—roars the bellows, blast on blast,
  The sooty smithy jars,
And fire-sparks rising far and fast
  Are fading with the stars.
All day for us the smith shall stand
  Beside that flashing forge;
All day for us his heavy hand
  The groaning anvil scourge.

Gee up!—Gee ho!—The panting team
  For us is toiling near;
For us the raftsmen down the stream
  Their island-barges steer.
Rings out for us the axe-man's stroke
  In forests old and still—
For us the century.circled oak
  Falls crashing down his hill.

Up!—up!—in nobler toil than ours
  No craftsmen bear a part:
We make of Nature's giant powers
  The slaves of human Art.
Lay rib to rib and beam to beam,
  And drive the treenails free;
Nor faithless joint nor yawning seam
  Shall tempt the searching sea!

Where'er the keel of our good ship
  The sea's rough field shall plow—
Where'er her tossing spars shall drip
  With salt-spray caught below—
That ship must heed her master's beck,
  Her helm obey his hand,
And seamen tread her reeling deck
  As if they trod the land.

Her oaken ribs the vulture-beak
  Of Northern ice may peel—
The sunken rock and coral peak
  May grate along her keel:
And know we well the painted shell
  We give to wind and wave,
Must float, the sailor's citadel,
  Or sink, the sailor's grave!

Ho!—strike away the bars and blocks,
  And set the good ship free!
Why lingers on these dusty rocks
  The young bride of the sea?
Look!—how she moves adown the grooves
  In graceful beauty now!
How lowly on the breast she loves
  Sinks down her virgin prow!

God bless her, wheresoe'er the breeze
  Her snowy wing shall fan,
Aside the frozen Hebrides
  Or sultry Hindostan!—
Where'er, in mart or on the main,
  With peaceful flag unfurled,
She helps to wind the silken chain
  Of Commerce round the world!

Speed on the ship! But let her bear
  No merchandize of sin,
No groaning cargo of despair
  Her roomy hold within.
No Lethean drug for Eastern lands,
  Nor poison draught for ours,
But honest fruits of toiling hands
  And Nature's sun and showers.

Be her's the Prairie's golden grain,
  The Desert's golden sand,
The clustered fruits of sunny Spain,
  The spice of Morning-land!
Her pathway on the open main
  May blessings follow free,
And glad hearts welcome back again
  Her white sails from the sea!

INFLUENCE OF FARMING ON HEALTH.

The following report of observation made at a meeting of the Legislative Agricultural Society is from the Boston Traveler:—

Dr. Jarvis of Dorchester spoke of the business of a farmer as the healthiest that man could follow. This would appear, if we considerered, 1st, the fact that so much of a farmer's life was spent out of doors, where he might have the purest and best air; 2d, that his exercise was of the best kind; not like the mechanic, who exercised chiefly one set of muscles; 3d, that he was, in consequence, blessed with a good appetite and a good digestion; 4th, that a farmer was free from those exhausting and corroding cares and anxieties, to which other professions and pursuits were liable. All these things were manifestly in favor of the farmer. But, there are some disadvantages with which the farmer was compelled to contend, which to some extent counterbalanced these advantages.

1. Farmers are greatly exposed to changes of weather. They were under the necessity of being out in cold and wet; and consequently were especially liable to colds, coughs, and fevers. 2. Another evil to which they were exposed, arose from the excessive amount of labor which they performed. Farmers generally worked too hard and too many hours a day. No man could work more than ten hours a day and follow it habitually. Farmers generally begin to fail at 45 or 50 years of age. If they would labor more moderately they would be able to do more work in the course of their lives than by their present course. 3. Farmers suffered from the quantity and quality of their food. They generally ate too much heavy food and salt provisions. Farmers were often very observant of the effects of different food on their cattle; yet they rarely gave much attention to the effects of food on their own systems. 4. Another thing which militated against the health of farmers was the habit of neglecting the location of their dwelling houses. The farmer was careful about the location of his barn, that it might be convenient, &c.; but few thought of inquiring whether the location of their houses were favorable or unfavorable to health.

Still, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, farmers lived longer than any other class of persons; it being ascertained that the average of a farmer's life was nearly 25 per cent. longer than that of any other class. It was found that the average length of life in the city of Boston was about 22 years; while in our purest agricultural districts the average duration of life was 38 years. In England the advantage in favor of the farmer was even greater than in New England; being 41 years, against 22 years in the cities. It was ascertained that where 100 farmers died of fever and kindred diseases, about 180 died of the same diseases in large cities; and while 100 died of old age in the country 79 only died in the city. Of scrofula, however, the number of farmers who suffered and died was nearly twice as great as city residents.

Dr. Jarvis made some suggestions respecting the influence of elevation on health, and on the effects of stagnant water and flooded lands in producing sickness in certain sections of country.

He thought that God designed that men should live to be three-score years and ten, and if they would but attend to the laws of health they might generally enjoy this boon.

Mr. Brooks, of Boston, knew of no subject so important as physiology to the farmer, and indeed to all classes. In Europe light and air were regarded as all-important to life and health. In Rome there was a proverb to this effect: Where the sun comes the doctor comes not. It was found in the cities, that those persons who occupied the higher portions of a house were the healthiest. It has been noticed that English farmers lived longer than American farmers. He attributed this to the fact that the English farmer lived more simply and on lighter food than was common among American farmers, and especially that the bread which he ate was much superior to what was used among us. Indeed, good bread was almost unknown in this country. He did not believe that there was a country in the world where the bread was so generally bad as it was in this country.

The use of acids, which was very common in most European countries, particularly in the form of mixed salads and pickles, he thought conduced to health. The dyspepsia was scarcely known in countries were these were freely used. There was less anxiety of mind among Europeans generally than among us; and this contributed to health and long life. Here every man is anxious to get above the position in which he was born. In Europe it was otherwise; men were contented and easy with their position in life; and this state of mind greatly contributed to health and longevity. But the most powerful of all causes of ill health and short lives among our population, was to be found in the injudicious treatment of children—the improper food with which they were glutted, and the excessive mental exertions in which they were encouraged.

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

Some of our readers may find some interest in fixing in their minds a few facts respecting these extraordinary descendants of Abraham. It is a common remark, in some circles, when a man is seen gathering property with great activity, shrewdness, and success, probably his posterity of the next generation will scatter it to the four winds. If such is the rule, the exceptions are many—many in this country, and still more numerous, perhaps, in Europe, where society is differently constituted. The Rothschilds furnish an example of at least three generations, pushing forward with increasing rapidity in the road to wealth. Mayer Anslem Rothschild was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in 1740. His immediate ancestors were respectable Jewish pedlars, and nothing more. By extraordinary skill and activity, he rose early to the head of a very large banking establishment in Frankfort. He had five sons, and they all exhibited the enterprise of their father. But one city could not hold five such men. The eldest son, called also Anslem, succeeded his father at Frankfort. The other four settled in four of the principal cities of Europe—Vienna, Naples, Paris, and London. Nathan became the head of the house in London at the age of 21. He died at the age of 59, in 1836, leaving a property of £53,000,000, or more than $200,000,000. He was succeeded by his son, Lionel Rothschild, who has lately been admitted to a seat in the House of Commons by a special act of Parliament; though it is not easy to understand how an act of Parliament could dispense with a provision of the British Constitution requiring an acknowledgment of the truth of Christianity, as a qualification for a seat in Parliament.

Jacob Rothschild, of Paris, is said to exceed in the splendor of his style of living most of the princes of Europe. The five families, though established in distant cities, often act as one company, and together loan immense sums of money. They are reported to have loaned Louis Philippe, recently, 25,000,000 francs. This is probably regarded as part of the public debt of France, to be provided for by the new government. The Rothschilds have established a branch of their house in the city of New York, under the supervision of a relative of the family by the name of Belmonte. We are glad to hear that their loans are not valued in this country as they are among the monarchs of Europe. As they have received very large accessions to their funds from the principal monarchs of Europe, so their funds have done not a little in sustaining tottering monarchies.

What has kept these men true to their Jewish faith? Some will say, a regard to their interest. But would it not seem to their interest to accommodate themselves to the religion of the countries where they reside? And how does it happen that a Jew differs at this point so much from all other people? Where is there another nation, which, dispersed over all the earth, and with no visible government of its own, has preserved its identity for seventeen centuries? Does it not look like the hand of God—the fulfillment of ancient predictions?

EATING AND DRINKING ON BOARD THE TRANS-ATLANTIC STEAMER.—The Glasgow Herald furnishes some curious particulars of the eatables and drinkables supplied for the consumption of the passengers on board Cunard & Co.'s American steamers. Each ship on her outward trip is supplied with 50 dozen of port wine, 100 dozen of sherry, 100 dozen of champagne, 50 dozen of Madeira, 50 dozen of hock, 200 dozen of soda water and lemonade, 300 dozen of Scotch ale and 200 dozen of London porter, beside spirits of all kinds. There are also ample stores of ice and an abundant supply of fresh water. Each ship is victualed for twenty-one days, and carries at least 4,000 lbs. of beef, mutton, and pork, fresh and packed in ice. Then there are 16 dozen of fowls, 4 dozen of geese, 4 dozen of ducks, 4 dozen of turkeys, 6 dozen of pigeons, and 1 dozen of roasting pigs, beside ample store of tongues, calves' heads, &c. Milk is furnished by the cow, though each ship also carries a supply of 40 gallons, which is packed in ice and keeps fresh and sweet till the end of the passage. The baker turns out two hundred loaves or rolls per diem, and the confectioner is never idle. Breakfast begins at half-past 8, and the cloth is removed at 10. There is lunch at 12 and dinner at 4. Tea is served at 7; and then follow snacks, wine, punch, toddy, gin-sling, &c.—that is, for those who want them—till half-past 11, when the steward's bar is closed, and the lights are out by 12. Such is life on board a trans-Atlantic steamer; and in the summer it is said to be becoming quite common for parties to make a pleasure trip to America, in the fashion that people go up the Rhine. There have been occasions in which young married people have spent their honey-moon in a trip to to Halifax, a flying visit to Niagara and New York, and a return voyage to England, and all in six weeks.

A PRODUCTIVE FARM.

James Gowen, Esq., well known as a spirited, and successful farmer near Philadelphia, whose farm (Mt. Airy) is now the seat of an agricultural Institute, under the care of Professor Wilkinson, in a communication to the American Farmers' Cabinet, states that though bred to, and had long been in business in the city, and meeting with many unexpected difficulties, when he commenced farming, and having much to learn, nevertheless, by untiring perseverance in a systematic course of culture, at length brought his farm, of only 150 acres, to produce as follows: "For years past," says he, "I have kept some 40 to 50 head of cattle, during which time I have filled barns with hay, and grain cribs with corn, cellars and pits with potatoes and other roots. In 1846, I mowed of first crop hay, over 130 tons, reaped 500 bushels of grain, 400 bushels of oats, husked 800 bushels of shelled corn, gathered over 1000 bushels of choice sound potatoes, and the usual large crop of other roots. Last year, a bad hay season, I mowed over 100 tons, harvested 800 bushels of grain, husked some 1200 hundred bushels shelled corn, dug 1500 bushels of sound choice potatoes, 500 bushels of carrots, 400 bushels of parsnips, and 1500 bushels of turnips. Sold within the last two years, $1500 worth of cattle and swine, $1000 worth of butter, lard, &c., and have now on hand more than 39 head of superior cattle, and a large stock of the finest swine. There is now on the ground over 30 acres of winter grain. I have hauled out and stacked on the field, barnyard manure, made on the place, sufficient to plant 6 acres of potatoes, this spring, leaving more than enough well rotted for the gardens, and the usual crop of carrots, &c., &c. I seldom apply any manure to the corn crop, and it is wholly out of the question to the oats on my land. Now does not this appear almost incredible on so small a farm? But it is susceptable of belief, when it is known that I soil my cattle during the months of May and June, which permits the cropping and mowing of nearly all the land."

MEMORY AS AFFECTED BY DISEASE.

It is stated in several papers that Mr. Hotchkiss, of Brooklyn, who was waylaid by robbers and almost killed, some months ago, is entirely recovered in his physical health, but his mind seems much shattered. He seems to have forgotten every thing he learned during his life, and is now learning his letters again, as if he were a child. The sounds of his voice, it is said, constitute his principal source of amusement. This is one of the many striking instances of disordered memory. Dr. Beattie relates the case of a gentleman, who, in consequence of a violent blow on the head, lost his knowledge of Greek, but did not appear to have lost any thing else. Dr. Abercrombie also relates an instance not less remarkable, of a lady who, in consequence of a protracted illness, lost the recollection of a period of about ten or twelve years, but spoke with perfect consistency of things as they stood before that time.

A case very similar to that related by Dr. Beattie fell uuder our own observation some ten years ago. It was that of a young man, residing in Northern New York, who, after having made considerable progress in Latin, as well as in the English branches, received a severe kick from a horse over the left eye, which caused it to protrude from the socket, and rendered him senseless for some days. On recovering the use of his faculties, his memory was found to be so much impaired that he had forgotten all his knowledge of Latin, rendering it necessary to commence anew the elements of the language.

In other cases, disease, as fever, causes a quickened mental action. Flint, in his Recollections of the Valley of the Mississippi, says, that during the paroxysms occasioned by a violent fever, his memory was more than ordinarily exact and retentive, and that he repeated whole passages in the different languages which he knew, with entire accuracy. "I recited," says he, "without losing or misplacing a word, a passage of poetry which I could not so repeat after I had recovered my health." The power of reminiscence may indeed slumber, through disease or other causes, but never dies.

"Each fainter trace that memory holds
So darkly of departed years,
In one broad glance the soul beholds,
And all that was at once appears."

'NONE SO DEAF AS THEM THAT WON'T HEAR!'—At York Court, as soon as the Lord Chief Justice had taken his seat, the names of the Jurymen were called over, and several certificates of ill health, &c., were produced to account for the absence of some. One was produced by a Juryman himself, stating his extreme deafness as a cause for being excused from serving, when the following scene took place between the Lord Chief Justice and the Juryman:

The Lord Chief Justice—(in a loud voice)—How old are you, my good man?—No answer. The Lord Chief Justice—(in a louder tongue)—How old are you? No answer.

The Lord Chief Justice—(still louder)—How old are you? No answer.

The Lord Cnief Justice—(in a very low tone)—Well, you are excused serving, can you hear that?

Answer, Yes; and he immediately left the court amidst a roar of laughter.

PARALLEL PASSAGES IN HISTORY.—The following most extraordinary coincidence cannot be passed by the historian without astonishment and wonder, when describing the last two French Revolutions. In 1830, no sooner had the Dey of Algiers arrived in France as prisoner of Charles X., than the King was dethroned and exiled; and in 1848, no sooner had the Emir Abd-el-Kader reached the shores of France as the prisoner of Louis Philippe, than the King of the Barricades was dethroned and exiled! The Dey, at the fall of Charles, exclaimed, 'God is just; he has avenged me!' and who would prevent the Marabout, Abd-el-Kader, from making the same assertion of providential retribution.

CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.—We have been requested to publish the following, said to be a preventative of hydrophobia, as discovered by a French physician:

"Take two tablespoonfuls of fresh chloride of lime, in powder—mix it with half a pint of water, and with this wash keep the wound constantly bathed, and frequently renewed. The chlorine of gas possesses the power of decomposing this tremendous poison, and renders mild and harmless that venom against whose resistless attacks the artillery of medical science has been long directed in vain. It is necessary to add that this wash should be applied as soon as possible after the infliction of the bite. The following are the results of this treatment: From 1810 to 1824, the number of persons admitted into Breslau Hospital was 184; of whom only two died—from 1783 to 1824, the number into the Hospital of Zurich, 223 persons were bitten by different animals, (182 by dogs) of whom only four died."

INCIDENTAL ADVANTAGES OF RAILROADS.—Among the incidental advantages which may result from the opening of railroads into the interior, is the discovery of valuable kinds of stones and minerals. Thus in cutting through the hills of Canterbury, N. H., for the Concord and Montreal Railroad, the workmen have discovered soap-stone of the very best quality, and apparently of considerable extent, which is of ready sale at $20 a ton. Operations in quarrying the stone have already been commenced, and the first freight car which passed over the road last week was freighted with this stone. A correspondent in the Concord Congregational Journal, from which we derive the following facts, estimates the quarry at 2,000,000 cubic feet, or 166,666 tons; which, at $20 a ton would amount to the snug little sum of $3,333,320; sufficient to build and equip some ten or twelve railroads like the road to Sanbornton.

VARIETY.

The Rev. Mr. Pepper, a Presbyterian clergyman of Albany, N. Y., has invented a compound of clay, called Asgillo, which resembles in structure and appearance, the richest, variegated agates. It is to be used for door knobs, pavement, table tops, and other ornamental articles. It surpasses in brilliancy any known variety of marble, and is equally cheap. No one who has not seen it, can form any idea of its beauty and illimitable variety of color. It is so hard as to resist any scratch except that of a crystal or diamond. Already Mr. Calhoun has introduced into the Senate, a resolution, which passed instantly, to the effect, that all the floors of the public offices in the Capital should be made of this beautiful material. $1,000,000 has been offered for the entire patent.

A little house-dog, belonging to Mr. Wait, of Cambridge, Mass., strayed away and was shot at and wounded about a quarter of a mile from home. Nothing was seen of him until some hours afterward, when a large dog, belonging to a neighbor, was found tenderly bringing back the unfortunate wanderer by the teeth. Reaching the fence before Mr. Wait's house he found the gate closed, and the paling of the fence too narrow to admit him with his charge; whereupon he commenced digging under the stringer with a view of effecting a passage into the house.

An attempt was recently made in Mexico by a party of Americans, to ascend the great volcano Popocateptl. After reaching the limits of vegetation, the party was overtaken by a tremendous snow storm, accompanied by hail, thunder and lightning. They, however, persevered, until within a thousand feet of the summit, when they were compelled to give up, having suffered severely from the rarification of the air, and the intense cold. Some of the party were temporarily blind, and had to be carried down the mountain. In the time of Cortez, a party of soldiers succeeded in reaching the summit.

A gentleman expatiated on the justice and propriety of a hereditary nobility. 'Is it not right (says he), in order to hand down to posterity the virtues of those men who have been eminent for their services to the country, that their posterity should enjoy the honors conferred on them as a reward for such services?' 'By the same rule (said a lady) if a man is hanged for his misdeeds, all his posterity should be hanged too.'

A Roman Emperor said one day to Rabbi Joshua, son of Chananay, "Show me your God." "Raise your eyes to the sky," replied the Rabbi, "God is there." The Emperor directed his eyes to the firmament; but at this moment the sun poured its rays to the earth. The dazzling lustre very soon caused the Emperor to cast his eyes downwards, whereupon Rabbi Joshua said to him, "What! wouldst thou see the Master, when thou hast not power to look his satellites in the face!"

Accustom a child as soon as it can speak, to narrate his little experience, his chapter of accidents, his fears, his hopes; to communicate what he has noticed in the world without, and what he feels stsuggling in the world within. Anxious to have something to narrate, he will be induced to give attention to objects around him, and what is passing in the sphere of his instruction, and to observe and note events will become one of his first pleasures; and this is the groundwork of a thoughtful character.

In appearance, Lamartine has something that recalls Byron; the same beauty of feature and expression, the same habits of elegance and dandyism; the rather haughty, and perhaps English, but noble and distinguished carriage. If you add to this, to complete the resemblance, the retinue of a great lord, a sumptuous mansion, full-blooded horses, a magnificent chateau, you will conclude, that, since the epoch of Tasso and Camoens, times have somewhat changed, and that it is possible, now-a-days, to be an eminent poet, without dying in the hospital.

In Wisconsin, houses are built in some districts with a composition of sixteen parts gravel, and one part of lime—the latter being slacked upon the gravel and mixed directly with it. Two planks are placed edgewise eight or twelve inches apart, and the space between filled to the depth of eight inches. This is suffered to stand till the next day, when it is sufficiently hardened to raise the planks and repeat the process.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

JAMES R. IRISH, Principal.
AURELLA F. ROGERS, Preceptress.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trus

ALFRED, June 23, 846.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

THE VALLEY OF THE WEST A MISSIONARY FIELD.

The following is the New York Tribune's report of a speech upon this subject, delivered at the recent Anniversary of the American and Foreign Bible Society, by Rev. Mr. Magoon, of Cincinnati:—

Mr. M. held the audience between smiles and tears for half an hour. He said in substance: This is the grand festival of hobby-horsical reports and nonsensical speeches—every Secretary straining his imagination to make out a case—every Treasurer raking the coffers to make out a balance—every speaker compassing heaven and earth to exalt his peculiar society. He moved that the great Valley of the West is an inviting field which will amply repay cultivation. Eastern character, said he, is wondrously transformed in the West. Let your Yankee start for that promised land, sleep the first night in Albany; the next in Buffalo, which he wound find a dreadful nice village; go to Niagara, in whose awful tones he would hear the first key-note of the great anthem of the West; let him step on board a steamer, and go fifteen hundred and eighty-five miles up to Chicago, and by the time he had arrived there he would get some new ideas; let him go forth to those boundless prairies, spangled with flowers and billowy with the luxuriant grass, over which the voices of a thousand feathered warblers make melody, and through which countless myriads of buffaloes and deers roam—those magnificent prairies, to which the steppes of Asia and the pampas of South America bear no comparison—those limitless prairies, in whose verdure the sun lies down to his evening rest, and over which the horizon closes without a bound—and he might well feel new ideas of grandeur and glory. Let him go down the Mississippi, and behold at New Orleans the ships of every nation under the sun, and see the men and hear the language of every division of our species; let him go back, hugging up to the smoke-stack or the shady side of the wheel house, as the weather may be, whittling and speculating, and pumping every passenger dry with his interminable questions—let him stop at Cincinnati, the heart of the mighty giant, the hem of whose garment only he had seen—let him see this, and he will see a fraction of that valley which might make a corona of States fit to gem the diadem of the world—he will see room for all the exiled Kings of the world to pitch their tents—room, even, for Victoria to give ample farms to all her children, past, present, and prospective, ay, though God should bless her for time to come with the fullness He has vouchsafed to her for the past ten years. Let your Yankee see all this, and his ideas will begin to expand—he becomes a Yankee enlarged. So much for the extent of the Western field. The growth of the West is talked of—always talked of—talked to death. Innumerable myriads are constantly going over the blue summits of the Alleghanies, with the ultimate purpose to scale even the sterile peaks of the Rocky Mountains—to make their homes over all the broad country, from the snows of the North to the balmy breezes and effeminate luxuriousness of the South. No less than one and a half millions of the descendants of the Puritans are now in our West, cultivating their farms and looking after the dimes. According to a statement made by a member of Congress, in 1860 there will be thirty-one millions of souls in this Union, eighteen millions of whom will be in the great Valley of the West. The increase in that region for ten years, 1830 to 1840, was 74 per cent, and in the North-west no less than 108 per cent. At this increase, in less than ten years this valley will possess the power and control the destinies of this Republic. A prominent feature in the West is the diversity of character there found. Many New-Englanders are there—some noble-hearted men, and some the meanest men I ever knew. There is the open-souled and generous Irishman; the keen, cold, crafty Scotchman; the Englishman, stiff as his own sturdy oak, and some of them as sound at the core as the old monarchs of the forest; the fickle and shifting people of Middle Europe; and that wonderful Magician of the North, who will smoke and drink, and living on sour beer will chase a Greek particle through all known literature—the erudite philologist who smokes and thinks, and thinks and writes ponderous folies that would break a common skull. When these amalgamate, as they eventually will, they will form—oh! what a glorious amalgam! destined to revolutionize, to renovate, and bless the world. We must also consider the enterprise of the West. Take Cincinnati, for example. In 1847 her imports and exports amounted to—how much? how much do you think, you who live on the little patch this side of the mountains, and fancy you own all creation? Why one hundred and seven million of dollars. But her education interest is her greatest glory. The best models of Boston school-houses only serve her, the best teachers only are employed by her, 10,170 of her children enjoy access to her higher schools. And at this moment she is leading the world in the purest of the fine arts—Sculpture, and in the strictest of the exact Sciences—Astronomy. Opulence is there to support these enterprises, and has lately opened a Gallery of the Fine Arts, which may safely challenge the continent for its superior. The people of the West are all enterprise. I know a man who worked to the age 40 years to fell himself a breathing place in the woods, and then went with his son and son-in-law and sat by them in Miami University, to attain a classical education. He was successful, for he said, "without intelligence I can never be influential." There are no drones in the West, unless they are imported; in and around Cincinnati there are fewer loafers than in any place I ever knew. Every man, woman, and child, has something to do. Those who can't work—those who can't think, should stay away from the West; for there the people are walking forward with a lock step over the shoals and quicksands of Time to the Judgment seat. In that West, he has the greatest influence who can touch the chords of the human heart and make them thrill to the music of his own soul. But there is a difficulty—a great difficulty, to be removed. Romanism, the everlasting death's-head-and-marrow-bones of discussion—endless discussion, a great portion of which I verily believe constitutes the most perfect humbug of the age. If Catholics are fellow-men on the high-road to ruin, if they are eternity-bound, hell-bound, creatures, why not meet them, quietly meet them, and lead them to Jesus—they are mostly foreigners; and I hold that our abuse of them is at the least ungrateful. Every College in New England has been endowed by foreigners—the first printing press pulled in the Colonies was a donation from Holland—the noblest structure devoted to literature in our nation was erected by a foreigner who never even saw the United States. I know that some of the best citizens of the West are Catholics, and I see no reason why, with the blessing of God in their hearts, they may not be as devout as any men. It seems strange to me that we scrape every cent we can reach to send the Gospel to our very antipodes, and forget those who come to our own land to make them houses. Do the Catholics build schools and colleges. We do the same. Let us meet them in kindness and philanthropy, in discussion, and win them. Should a Catholic build on one corner of my house, an infidel on another, and a Jew in front, when I came from my morning devotions I would say, Good Day, to each, and pray God would bless them all. When another speaker told the persecutions of Baptists by the French King, he might have gone farther—he might have told how a man rose in Paris and battled nobly, and zealously, and successfully for their cause, and that man was a foreigner every where—it was Cremieux, the Jew—subsequently called, in the providence of God, to be a Minister of Justice. It is our privilege to give all men freedom to worship God. If they are in error, we may pity them, but we should never abuse. But the great obstacle to be removed is defunct Protestantism—Evangelism congealed. Some men came to the West who had the odor of sanctify, who had perhaps been active class leaders on this side the mountains, but they had left all the Christian heat they ever had behind them—they were volcanoes burnt out. They would stop in some devout place and settle down, the select wheat of God's harvest, predestined from all eternity to sit in their infernal laziness while the world was perishing around them; the fossil remains of Pharaoh's lean kine; possessed of a vis inertia almost sufficient to stop the wheels of the Almighty's chariot of Mercy, and banish every ray of His glory from man. In the the third place, this field will richly reward all culture bestowed upon it. But men who go there want character; and they want three kinds of sense—common sense, cultivated sense, but most of all a divine sense, learned in the school of Christ and emanating from a broken cross. Some of our young men, I am aware, graduate from a New England College, their ordinary habiliments scarce sufficing to hold their august persons, with great proficiency in the application of Latin terms, armed with the President's diploma and recommendatory letters, all which may be well, but this is not what the West requires—there he would be asked to do, for can do is the only talent there demanded. The education soaked in from the outside, like a Thompsonian bath, is useless there. There is no field for such preachers. Black board knowledge and Latin roots, emptiness in the head, green glasses over the eyes, dyspepsia in the stomach, and a diploma in his hand, does not suit the people—they want what the Scotch call "gumption"—they want to see a man like Ringgold's flying artillery, who know how to load and fire in the hottest of the fight. There is no need to wait for a church to call a pastor in the West; he can call the church himself. With a log cabin for a vestry, he could have around him a cathedral whose arches were wrought and wreathed, whose roof was adorned in a way the temples of Greece never knew—the blue sky is visible through its dome, the setting sun streams in between its pillars, and there, in a garb as simple as the truth he told, he could preach the Word of Life; there is no need of fine linen in double quantity—linen under and linen over his garments—he would not want two shirts. With such men we should do nobly—Oh! that we had them, East, West, North South, every where; with such men the people would turn to God, and put their trust in Him. It is not only for our cotemporaries we desire this, but for the myriads whose fathers are yet unborn—for those who will fix their temple domes on the peaks of the Rocky Mountains, in that golden age of the Anglo-Saxon race, and gaze over an Empire of three hundred millions of Christians, and hear the murmer of the Pacific and the roar of the Atlantic join in the mighty Valley of the West. Then would the present laborers in this field behold the unspeakable glory of which they are now sowing the seed, to come to fullness—

> "When rapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
> And heaven's last thunder shakes the earth below."

THE FLY AND THE SPIDER.

Two children once went with their grandmother to see a spider's web; they thought it very curious, and they talked a good deal about it, though they could not see the use of such things, nor why there should be such creatures as spiders at all. Their grandmother replied, "My dear children, I cannot tell you just now all the reasons why the all-wise God created and sustains the various creatures which we see around us, though we may be sure there is some good end to be served; but I will tell a pretty story, which may at least help us to think upon the subject. A young prince used often to wonder for what purpose God made flies and spiders; as he could not see, he said, what use they were of to men, and, if he had the power, he would kill them all. One day, after a great battle, this prince was obliged to hide himself from his enemies; and wandering about in a wood, he lay down very tired beneath a tree, and fell asleep. A soldier passing by, who belonged to the enemy, was quietly drawing near with his sword to kill the prince, when all of a sudden, a fly stung his lip, and woke him. Seeing his danger, he sprang to his feet, and quickly made the soldier run off. That night the prince again hid himself in a cave in the same wood; and during the night a spider wove her web across the entrance. Two soldiers belonging to the army which had defeated him, and who were looking for the prince, passed the cave in the morning; and the prince heard their conversation: 'Look,' cried one of them, 'he is surely concealed in this cave.' 'No,' replied the other—'that is impossible; for if he had gone in there, he would have brushed down that spider's web at the entrance.' When they had gone away, the prince raised his hands to heaven, and thanked God for such goodness in yesterday saving his life by means of a fly, and now again by a spider, and acknowledged that the ways and works of God are perfectly good and wise."

"WHY SEEK YE THE LIVING AMONG THE DEAD?"

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

Ye lock the vault—ye bar the tomb—
And to their keeper drear
Commit the precious treasures, borne
Upon the sable bier—
But that which made your idol dear,
The essence so refined,
That work the sigh, the smile, the tear,
The Soul, ye may not bind.

Again ye come—the hoarded gem
O'er which ye reared with care
The marble arch, the fretted shrine,
The sculptured column fair,
Where is it? ah, the fearful change!
The flesh hath mocked your trust,
The bone its fellow bone forsook,
And mouldering sank to dust.

Thus o'er the close-sealed tomb, where first
The Lord of glory slept,
The Roman soldiers, still and stern,
Their sleepless vigil kept,
Dawn came—the affrighted watchmen quailed;
The buried form had fled—
And grieved affection vainly sought
The living 'mid the dead.

FRIENDS IN HEAVEN.

It is glorious to have friends in heaven. They seem to add to the attractions of the eternal world. While we think of them as the inhabitants of the star-paved city, we, at the same time, regard them as our companions, and thus we are drawn nearer to the throne by the cords of human love, and become, in some sense, familiarized with the glories which await us in blissful immortality. In one view they appear as our associates, rejoicing in our prosperity, sympathizing in our sorrows, and having sentiments and purposes kindred with our own; in another, we behold them the companions of patriarchs and prophets, listening to the sublime adorations of Paul, and the seraphic melodies of David's celestial lute, and pouring forth their own voices in anthems of praise to the Lamb, forever.

I bless God for the hope I am permitted to entertain, that I have a mother—the heart-enshrined idol of my earlier years—whose spirit wanders in a cloud of glory, through the aromatic gardens, and over the delectable mountains of the blest. She spent, here below, a life of sorrow—wedded to privations, disappointments, and disease; but now she plucks the fragrant flowers and the delicious fruits of paradise—leans her own wearied head upon the bosom of Jesus, and slumbers in a beatific vision of the throne of God. I have often fancied, in hours of darkness and despondent gloom, that her glorified spirit lingered around me, whispering words of consolation and hope. I have imagined that it was the echo of her lute which made sweet music in my heart, the hallowedness of her presence, which drove far from me the tempter, with his doubts, and the rustling of her wings of glory which seemed to pavilion me around with starlight irradiations from the eternal throne.

And to have children in heaven! Are they not golden knobs, which transmit the electric spark of divine love from the throne of the Lamb to the burdened and disconsolate soul? Bereaved parents! could you now behold the babe which has perished like a blossom from your arms, you would scarcely recognize the sickly infant which demanded your unceasing care and unslumbering watchfulness. It has changed its toys for an angelic lute—its sobs for a song of triumph, and its little griefs and acute pains for the sweetness of seraphic joy, and the rapture of undying praise. And then, what astonishing advances has it already made, in all the elements of knowledge and wisdom and love! And yet, what wonder, since it has been instructed by the Great Teacher? It would be no matter of surprise, though it could inform us concerning the mysteries of redemption, and speak in language which it would not be lawful for us to utter.

Glory to God, that we have friends in heaven! Parents, husbands, wives, children, brothers, sisters, and associates have gone before us. Their tears are wiped away; their sighs of sorrow are repressed; their burden of affliction is now removed, and they have proved by their own experience that "life and immortality are brought to light in the gospel." They await our arrival upon those blissful shores. They stoop from the golden battlements of heaven, to lure us on to that glory which shall be eternal. God grant, gentle reader, that you and I may be attracted by the splendor of the unseen world, and admonished by the terrors of hell, that we may "work out our salvation with fear and trembling," and be brought at last to stand high upon the mount of God, encircled with the rainbow splendors, and filled with the unutterable glories of a blissful eternity. TWO DEATH-BED SCENES.

"LOOK FIRST ON THIS PICTURE; THEN ON THAT."

It was a gorgeously furnished apartment in the palace of England's queen. Rare gems of art are scattered in every direction. The windows are hung with crimson velvet; the sofas and draperies are of the same rich material, tastefully arranged. Costly and beautiful paintings, from the ancient masters, in massy frames, decorate the walls. The last rays of the sun, breaking through the crimson curtains, shed a soft and mellow light through the apartment.

Reclining upon a royal couch, a noble queen lies dying. Her countenance is severely stern and expressive of determined resolution. That broad forehead is contracted, as if in pain. She has enjoyed all the honors this world can bestow. How worthless pleasure, wealth, and renown appear, as the vista of futurity opens upon the eye of the soul. The scenes of eternity now unveil themselves to her astonished vision, and her whole preparation for that untried state is crowded into a few brief moments. Now despair is depicted in every feature; the lashings of conscience are terrible. She actually writhes under the excess of mental anguish; there is an expression of awe in the countenance of every beholder, and the profound silence of terror seems to pervade the apartment. With accents faltering in death, the dying Elizabeth exclaims, "Millions of money for a moment of time." Miserable woman; she possesses wealth and fame; she is surrounded with splendor and luxury; and yet she shrieks in vain for a moment of time. There is a groan, a spasm, and all is still; the heart has ceased its throbbings, and that soul stands in the presence of Jehovah. Proudly did she rise above the great and the gifted upon earth;

> "But who would soar the solar height,
> To sit in such a starless night?"

* * * * *

In a lowly cottage, half concealed with the overshadowing foliage, resides the family of the missionary. It is a lovely morning; the birds are pouring forth their rich notes of melody; the air is perfumed with the grateful fragrance of flowers, bending, half concealed with the abundance of dew upon them. The windows of the cottage are thrown open, and the fringed curtains looped far back to admit the fresh breeze. Although everything around seems joyous, yet there is sorrow in that dwelling; the wife and mother, the devoted missionary, is dying. A smile is on her lip; in her countenance there is unearthly beauty. Hers has been a life of sacrifice and self-denial in the cause of her Redeemer,—she had given up the ease, pleasure, and luxury of her early home to serve Christ. Now she is going to reap her reward in heaven. Death has no terror for her; serenity pervades her whole being as she draws near eternity. Her eyes are closed; yet visions of her early home, of childhood's joyous hours, are thronging her mind. Now she joins in the worship of God in the sanctuary, now unites in a hymn of praise; now she beholds the gates of heaven, the river of life, while earth and all its scenery grows dim about her.

Look at her again. Her face is calm, like that of an angel: those lips move not; that heart has ceased its quivering.

> "The gentle air
> Comes through the open window, freighted with
> The savory odors of the early spring—
> She breathes it not; the laugh of passers by
> Jars like a discord in some mournful tune,
> But wakes not her slumbers. She is dead."

Her spirit borne on angels' wings enters the gates of the heavenly city. The mind of man never conceived such glory as now bursts upon her enraptured vision. The ear of mortal never listened to such music as now fills her soul with melody. The imagination never conceived such happiness as now fills her whole being with delight.

> "Before the throne she stands sublime in robes
> Of glory: and now her fingers wake the chords
> To praise; which all in heaven repeat."

ILLUSTRATION OF THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

"See here, I hold a Bible in my hand, and you see the cover, the letters, the words, but you do not see the writers, or the printer, the letter-founder, the ink-maker, the paper maker, or the binder. You never did see them; you never will see them; and yet there is not one of you who will think of disputing or denying the being of these men. I go farther; I affirm that you see the very souls of these men in seeing this book, and you feel yourself obliged to allow that by the contrivance, design, memory, fancy, reason, which is here seen. In the same manner, if you see a picture, you judge there was a painter; if you see a house, you judge there was a builder of it; and if you see one room contrived for this purpose and another for that, a door to enter, a window to admit light, a chimney to hold fire, you conclude that the builder was a person of skill and forecast, who formed the house with a view to accommodate its inhabitants.

RELIGION AN ELEMENT OF EDUCATION.

Religion should be regarded as the most essential element in education, and should hold its due prominence in every institution of learning. The sublime truths of Christianity should be clearly taught, its doctrines explained, and its precepts urged. A religious atmosphere should surround every temple dedicated to science and literature, from the district school-house up to our colleges. I plead not indeed, for the limited religious creed of a single sect. In the present state of things, it would be exceedingly unjust somewhere, if not utterly impracticable, to adopt such a course of instruction in our public institutions of learning if desired. But I plead for religion, its broad spirit is taught and illustrated by its divine Author. Let blind bigotry and narrow minded sectarianism be expelled alike from all our institutions of learning held in common, and be buried in the grave of oblivion. But let religious truth, as presented in the Bible, be brought to bear, with mighty power, upon the heart and conscience of every individual. It is not the presentation of abstract truth merely, cold and lifeless, is called for, but truth exhibited in its practical bearing as applicable to man, and as a creature of God, to whom he is accountable for all his conduct; truth which shall bear salutary effect upon the practice, in all the various walks of life, and in all intercourse of man with man.

RESIGNATION.

> "Amid the various scenes of ills;
> Each stroke some kind design fulfills;
> And shall I murmur at my God,
> When sovereign love directs the rod?"

Resignation is an exalted Christian virtue. It is a plant that grows not up from nature's soil. It is a grace that must be cultivated like the rose-tree, that it may flourish and shed forth its sweet fragrance amid the passing scenes of life. To possess resignation, calm and settled, under all circumstances, is a high attainment. Yet it is attainable; and blessed are they who live under its benign influences. It will shed a holy balm over the moral waste of life, and cheer us amid the darkest hours of our pilgrimage.

Life has its cares and its afflictions, its crosses and its conflicts, its disappointments and its sacrifices. But in every scene of earth, resignation, like the strong and faithful anchor that holds the ship in safety till the storm is past, secures its possessor peace and quietness, till the darkness and danger of the tempest are over, and the sunshine of tranquility and joy again beams upon us. Nothing is ever lost to the just by the exercise of this virtue; but it will secure to the anxious, the impotent, and heavy-laden, much joy, blessedness, and consolation. It will render our afflictions blessings; our crosses pleasure; sour disappointments unexpected good; and our sacrifices either for our own or the well-being of others, acceptable oblations to God. Then

> "Though Heaven afflict, I'll not repine;
> Each heart-felt comfort still is mine—
> Comforts that shall o'er death prevail,
> And journey with me through the vale."

HAPPY INFLUENCE OF DANGERS.

At a meeting held in reference to the establishment of schools in the highlands and islands of Scotland, Dr. M'Leod related the following facts:—

A friend of mine happened to be in a boat, by which a poor simple-hearted man from St. Kilda was advancing, for the first time in his life, from his native rock to visit the world; and as he advanced towards the island of Mull, a world in itself in the estimation of the poor St. Kilda man, the boatman commenced telling him the wonders he was so soon to see. They asked him about St. Kilda; they questioned him regarding all the peculiarities of that wonderful place, and rallied him not a little on his ignorance of all those great and magnificent things that were to be seen in Mull. He parried them off with great coolness and good humor; at length, a person asked him if he ever heard of God, in St. Kilda. Immediately he became grave and collected. "To what land do you belong?" said he; "describe it to me." "I," said the other, "come from a place very different from your barren rock; I come from the land of flood and field, the land of wheat and barley, where nature spreads her bounty in abundance and luxuriance before us." "Is that," said the St. Kilda man, "the kind of land that you come from? Ah, then, you may forget God, but a St. Kilda man never can. Elevated on his rock, suspended over a precipice, tossed on the wild ocean, he never can forget his God—he hangs continually on his arm." All were silent in the boat, and not a word more were asked him regarding his religion. [Arvine.

POLYCARP'S DEATH.

When Polycarp, an ancient bishop of the Church at Smyrna, was brought to the tribunal, the proconsul asked him if he was Polycarp; to which he assented. The proconsul then began to exhort him, saying, "Have pity on thine own great age; swear by the fortune of Cesar; repent; say, take away the atheists," meaning the Christians. Polycarp, casting his eyes solemnly over the multitude, waving his hand to them, and looking up to heaven, said, "Take away these atheists;" meaning the idolaters around him. The proconsul still urging him, and saying, "Swear, and I will release thee; reproach Christ," Polycarp said, "Eighty and six years have I served him, and he hath never wronged me; and how can I blaspheme my King who hath saved me?" "I have wild beasts," said the proconsul, "and will expose you to them unless you repent." "Call them," said the martyr. "I will tame your spirit by fire," said the Roman. "You threaten me," said Polycarp, "with the fire which burns only for a moment, but are yourself ignorant of the fire of eternal punishment, reserved for the ungodly." Soon after, being about to be put to death, he exclaimed, "O Father of thy beloved and blessed Son, Jesus Christ! O God of all principalities and of all creation! I bless thee that thou hast counted me worthy of this day, and this hour, to receive my portion with the martyrs, in the cup of Christ. [Arvine.

Few people understand how deeply and silently a child may suffer; childhood is regarded as the gay, buoyant period of life; and those alone can tell what a world of joy and sorrow, of struggle and suffering, lies in their little hearts. Insignificant as the events of their baby life may seem to the matured mind of man, they are all important in themselves as the means by which the child is trained for the coming duties of life. From this want entering into their feelings, we have seen many a one punished for sullenness, when a word of sympathy in its little grief would have saved its temper from the ordeal of unjust correction.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE HANSERD KNOLLYS SOCIETY.

Some three years ago, we announced the formation, in England, of the Hanserd Knollys Society, for the publication of the works of early Baptist writers. Through the attention of our friend, Rev. Wm. H. Black, Pastor of the Mill-Yard Church, London, we have received copies of the first three volumes issued by the Society, which he designed as a present to the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. An examination of them has served to deepen our interest in the objects of the Society, and to make us desire the extensive circulation of their publications in this country. It is well known, that the Baptists were among the first in England to assert and maintain the right of every man to worship God according to the dictates of conscience, in submission only to the divine commandments. To this doctrine they held fast through good report and through evil report—in times of persecution as well as in times of comparative toleration. It would be natural to expect, that all the writings of men entertaining this sentiment would be characterized by liberality and independence of thought. Such we find to be the case. Throughout their works—which are not confined to any peculiarity of sentiment, but embrace every topic of divine truth—they reject the authority of men in matters of faith, and present the doctrines of Scripture with great simplicity and directness of purpose. The republication of these early writings, appears to us peculiarly appropriate at the present time. Baptists have multiplied greatly in every part of the world, and have ceased to be the sect every where spoken against. In such circumstances, it is well for them to be reminded of the opinions entertained by their predecessors, to whose faithfulness in the midst of persecution the denomination owes its existence, and in whose bonds and death was laid the foundation of the liberty they now enjoy.

Soon after the organization of the Hanserd Knollys Society, the following list was published as comprising the names of some whose works were intended to form part of the series: Bampfield, Blackwood, Bunyan, Canne, Collier, Collins, Cornwall, Danvers, Delaune, Denne, Du Veil, Drapes, Grantham, Griffith, Helwys, How, Jeffrey, Jessey, Keach, Kiffin, King, Knollys, Lawrence, Palmer, Powell, Pandarves, Smyth, Stewart, Tombes, Roger Williams, &c. Only three publications, however, have as yet been issued. Of these we will endeavor to give the reader some idea.

1. The first publication is a volume of over four hundred pages, entitled, "Tracts on Liberty of Conscience and Persecution." It contains the earliest writings extant in the English language upon this subject, embracing the eventful period from 1614 to 1661. The editor, Edward Bean Underhill, has prefaced the volume with an exceedingly valuable historical notice of the condition and progress of liberty of conscience in England during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary. Then come the following Tracts:—"Religious Peace; or A Plea for Liberty of Conscience," by Leonard Busher, first printed in 1614." "Persecution for Religion judged and condemned," 1615. "A humble Supplication to the King's Majesty," 1620. "The Necessity of Toleration in Matters of Religion," by Samuel Richardson, 1647. "An humble Petition and Representation, by the Anabaptists," 1660. "A Plea for Toleration of Opinions and Persuasions in Matters of Religion, differing from the Church of England," by John Sturgion, 1661. "Sion's Groans for her Distressed, or sober endeavors to prevent innocent blood," 1661. These Tracts are all written in an earnest and vigorous style, as might be expected from men who faltered not even when prisons, banishment, and death, stared them in the face. Mr. Underhill has attached to each such introductory notices as are necessary to elucidate the circumstances of the writers.

2. The Society's second publication is "The Records of a Church of Christ, meeting in Broadmead, Bristol, 1640—1687." This volume is also edited by Mr. Underhill, and exhibiis the origin and internal arrangements of a church during a series of years of national commotion and change, when the principles of its formation, and those who upheld them, were exposed to the severest persecution.

3. The third publication of the Society is "The Pilgrim's Progress," corrected from Bunyan's first copy, which is followed literally in the orthography, capitals, italics, and punctuation. Every omission or alteration that the author made during his life is noted, together with the edition in which such alteration first appeared, thus giving the reader a sort of history of John Bunyan's thoughts about his own wonderful work. All the original wood-cuts are likewise accurately copied in this edition. The volume is edited by George Offor, Esq., who furnishes for it a lengthy and valuable Introduction.

The next publication will probably be Roger Williams' "Bloudy Tenent of Persecution," edited by Mr. Underhill; which will doubtless soon be followed by Henry Danvers' Treatise on Baptism, edited by Rev. W. H. Black.

—We have stated thus minutely the contents of these volumes, not only as a matter of information to our readers, but in hope that some may be sufficiently interested in them to become members of the Society; in which case they will be required to pay ten shillings sixpence sterling, or about two dollars and a half, annually, and will be entitled to all the publications of the Society, averaging, probably, two large octavo volumes a year. Should any feel inclined to do so, we will very cheerfully transmit their names and subscriptions to Mr. Black, who is a member of the Council.

American Baptist Missionary Union.—The anniversary of this Society was held at Troy, N. Y., week before last, when the usual reports were presented. It seems that the receipts into the treasury for the year ending March 31, 1848, from all sources, were $98,576 36, while the expenditures were $94,184 53, showing a balance in favor of the treasury of $4,391 83, and reducing the debt of the Union to $29,295-73. Agencies have been prosecuted in the home field, amounting in the aggregate to the services of eight individuals throughout the year. The whole number of missions in connection with the Missionary Union is 16; of stations 52, and out-stations 87; of missionaries and assistants, 105; native preachers and assistants, 158; whole number of laborers, 263; churches 123, with 10,020 members, of whom 689 were baptized the last year; and 44 schools, with 1,472 pupils. Several of the stations have been greatly blessed during the year. At Hong Kong, China, religious meetings have been well attended, and eleven have been added to the church by baptism, of whom two are Chinese women, making the number of native members twenty-five. Similar reports come from other stations, so that the friends of the Union feel encouraged in their arduous work.

LETTER FROM FULTON COUNTY, ILL.

Farmington, Fulton Co., Ill., May 21, 1848.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

For a long time past, I have been inclined to say something about Fulton County, and the facilities it offers for emigrants and others desirous of engaging in agricultural or manufacturing operations. There is no County in the State which contains more valuable farming lands, or a greater amount of water power. As yet the land is hardly more than one-fourth of it in cultivation, and the opportunities of purchasing land and farms at a low price are very great. The County is situated on the Illinois River, which, for a distance of more than fifty miles, washes its eastern border, so that all the land is near to a navigable stream, and must become exceedingly valuable. It contains a large amount of timber, coal, and iron ore. Although it is comparatively but thinly settled, yet there is more business transacted within its borders than is done in any other County in the State. We have endeavored to ascertain as correctly as possible the amount of its annual products, but we are well satisfied that we have only been able to approximate the truth. The following statement includes only a portion of the products of the County:—Of wheat, the annual product is not less than one million of bushels; of corn, two millions; of oats, five hundred thousand. The exports are wheat, corn, oats, pork, beef, flour, barley, hemp, tobacco, flaxseed, tallow, lard, castor beans, white beans, hides, leather, and lumber. The amount of pork exported annually is 30,000 barrels; of beef, 3,000; and of flour, 50,000.

The following is supposed to be a very correct statement of our exports for the last year, (1847,) but they are increased greatly with each revolving year:—

Wheat, 300,000 bushels,	$180,000
Corn, 500,000 "	60,000
Oats, 250,000 "	30,000
Pork, 30,000 barrels,	180,000
Beef, 3,000 "	15,000
Flour, 50,000 "	200,000
All other articles,	100,000
	$765,000

Making the value of our exports for a single year seven hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars. If to this we add the amount produced and consumed in the County, it will show an amount not exceeded by any other County in the State.

The number of stores in this County is sixty, and the sales of these stores annually will average eight or nine thousand dollars each. Some stores in this County sell each fifty thousand dollars worth of goods in a single year. The amount of goods imported yearly is placed at five hundred thousand dollars. There are also in this County sixty flour and saw mills. We do not think there is any other County containing more than thirty. We have also fifty physicians and eighteen lawyers. Still we need mechanics and farmers. Great inducements are offered to those classes. To mechanics an abundance of work and high prices; to farmers an abundance of land and low prices, with ready market for all their produce.

This County is as healthy as any in the West. Will not some of our Sabbath-keeping brethren try it? We need but a few more families in this place to make quite a comfortable beginning. One man has recently embraced the Sabbath in our neighborhood, and it raises quite an excitement on the subject. Some feel alarmed, and think we ought not to work on Sunday; it is setting bad examples before their children. We sustain worship on the Sabbath, although destitute of a preacher, and mean to ever contend for that faith which was once delivered to the saints.

D. SAUNDERS.

☞ The following letter was placed in our hands, with permission to make such use of it as we might deem proper. Thinking it may do good, by showing how the truth operates upon the minds of individuals, we conclude to print it. The writer, we understand, has recently joined the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hounsfield, Jefferson Co., N. Y.

Hounsfield, N. Y., May 28, 1848.

Dear Sir—It has been suggested, by some of my friends, that I should give a short sketch of my conversion from keeping the first day of the week as holy time, to keeping the seventh day, which is "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." I was brought up to keep the first day, and knew no other Sabbath until I became a man, and commenced preaching. On one occasion, I preached on the importance of keeping the Sabbath, and was accused of preaching a Seventh-day Baptist or Sabbatarian discourse. This caused the inquiry to rise in my mind, How came the Sabbath changed, and by what authority was it changed? But I had another difficulty in my way of coming to the light. I was a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was taught not to make or mend any rule, but to be in obedience in all things to those that had rule over me. Thus I went on till I had been 27 years in the ministry, coming and going at the bidding of men. At last the tyranny of some of the ruling men in the church opened my eyes, and I concluded to think and act for myself. Two sermons fell into my hands—one in favor of the first-day Sabbath, and the other an answer by Bro. Bailey. I plainly saw that Bailey had the best ground to work upon, but still I had some doubts. I finally withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and concluded to renounce all creeds and commandments of men, and take God's Holy Word for the man of my counsel. Having placed my feet on this rock, I soon found the seventh day to be the Sabbath. About this time the Sabbath Recorder and some tracts fell into my hands, which did up the work in my mind. Then came the cross, to come out and keep God's holy day, after keeping the Sabbath of man for so many years. The devil said, What will the people think and say about you? And some of my friends have said the same; which shows that they and the devil are agreed to try their skill in bringing me back to error. But, God being my helper, I think I shall live and die an observer of the Sabbath.

ENOCH BARNES.

The American Education Society.—This Society held its thirty-second anniversary in Boston last week, at which the reports of the various officers were read. It is said that the operations of the year have been crowned with prosperity, which has not only been continued but increased in every department of the work. The whole number of young men to whom appropriations have been granted during the year is three hundred and ninety-two. The number assisted by the Parent Society exceeds the number assisted last year by twenty-nine; and the aggregate of the whole field is greater by three than the aggregate last year. The Parent Society has received under its care seventy-four new applicants during the year, and the other Societies above named thirty-two; making a total of one hundred and six; which is two more than was received last year. Fifty-five who have been aided by the Society during the whole or a part of their course, have graduated at the several Theological Seminaries during the year, and have entered, with the discipline and acquirements of a thorough education, upon the work of the Gospel ministry.

Missions and Opium in China.—In New York, on Sunday evening, May 28, Rev. Mr. Williams delivered his farewell address previous to leaving this country for the East. He stated that the present population of the Empire of China, probably exceeded 365,000,000. The cities of Pekin and Canton, contain each about 2,000,000. Among this vast population, there are laboring 67 missionaries, of whom 35 are English, 4 Europeans, and the remainder Americans. About 5,000 Chinese are instructed by them every week. The great obstacle to missionary effort, is the use of opium. Notwithstanding this drug was made a contraband article in 1800, large importations are continued. Since that time no less than 152,000,000 pounds have been imported, at an expense of $600,-000,000, or more than $12,000,000 annually. Its effect upon the health of its victims is most disastrous. He considered those addicted to its use, as among the most degraded of beings.

Emancipation Paper in Virginia.—We learn by the Louisville Examiner, that a new paper, called "The Crisis," has been established at Moundsville, Va. The editor of the Crisis, Anson Berkshire, Esq., says: "The object we have in presenting the public with this weekly visitor is, Emancipation—a theme which is now absorbing both the North and South. We do do not feel at all ashamed to embark in this general crusade against the system of American slavery; as it is a notorious fact, that many of the noblest citizens of the sunny South, have declared in favor of emancipation, as the only means of saving the nation from a premature and disgraceful death. Many, very many, slaveholders in Virginia, are in favor of a well grounded system of emancipation, and will labor efficiently for its attainment.

Revivals in Western New York.—We learn from the N. Y. Baptist Register, that at Mecklenburgh, Tompkins Co., a series of meetings have been held. Eighteen have been baptized, and others are expected soon to follow the Savior's command. From Bath, Steuben Co., the pastor of the church writes, that a number of backsliders have been reclaimed, and fifteen or sixteen sinners hopefully converted to Christ. Twenty-four in all have been added to the church. From the church in Westerlo, the pastor writes:—"Within a few months past the Spirit has wrought many wonders among us, such as are common in the conversion of sinners to God. We have baptized forty-six." In Rushford, Allegany Co., nine have been buried with Christ in baptism. Ten have been added to the church in Amity. In the church in Clinton, Oneida Co., there have been forty or fifty hopeful conversions, and the work is steadily advancing.

Romanism in Sicily—A correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser, after adverting to the fact that the influence of the Reformation was unfelt in Sicily, and that its insular position saved it from the arms of Napoloan, says:—"By reference to the statistics of the Island, it appears that with a population of 1,787,771 inhabitants, three hundred thousand of the number are ecclesiastics, or persons living upon ecclesiastical revenues. The convents which are scattered throughout the country would almost exceed belief, amounting to no less than eleven hundred and seventeen in number, and tenanted in the aggregate by thirty thousand monks and thirty thousand nuns."

Circulation of the Bible.—In 1804, according to the best estimates that can be obtained, there were in existence only about 4,000,000 copies of the Bible. Now there are more than 30,000,000. In 1804, the Bible had been published in only 48 or 49 languages; in 1847, it existed in 136. In 1840, it was accessible in languages spoken by about 200,000,000 of men; in 1847, it existed in tongues spoken by 600,000,-000. During the last year, 1,419,283 copies were issued by the British and Foreign Bible Societies alone—400,000 more than in any year before, except 1845.

General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.—The following statement of the powers and duties of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church accompanies a notice in the Baltimore Sun of the recent meeting of the Assembly in that city:—

"The General Assembly is the highest judiciary of the Presbyterian Church. It represents in one body, all the particular churches of this denomination in the United States. This Church Court receives and issues all appeals and references which may be regularly brought before it from the inferior judicatories. It reviews the records of every synod, and approves or censures them; it gives its advice and instruction in all cases submitted to it in conformity with the Constitution of the Church. To the General Assembly also belongs the power of deciding in all controversies respecting doctrine and discipline; of reproving, warning, or bearing testimony against error in doctrine, or immorality in practice, in any Church, Presbytery, or Synod; of erecting new Synods when it may be judged necessary; of superintending the concerns of the whole Church. The General Assembly consists of an equal delegation of ministers and ruling elders from each Presbytery, in the following proportion, viz: Each Presbytery, consisting of not more than nine ministers, shall send one; for every additional nine ministers in any Presbytery, shall one delegate be sent."

THE FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

This Society held a meeting in Boston last week, at which Dr. Baird made a statement of its labors, and addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Bridell from Paris, Dr. E. Beecher, Rev. Mr. King from Dublin, and Rev. Mr. Kirk. The following report by the Boston Times, of Dr. Baird's remarks, will give our readers some idea of what the Society is doing:—

"During the nine years of this Society's existence, its field of operation, and hold on the sympathies of Christians, had been annually increasing, and it celebrated its present anniversary under peculiarly encouraging auspices. Its Committee had, during the year, aided the French Canadian Society, to a greater extent than in any previous year—had employed an efficient Missionary among the 60,000 French in New Orleans, and made arrangements to bring one or two more from France the coming Autumn, as permanent laborers in that city. The Society had employed an able and pious Spaniard to translate "The History of the Reformation," by D'Aubigne, and some three or four other works, appropriate to the times, for distribution in Mexico and South America; and they sustain a Seaman's Chaplain at Valparaiso.

In France, the chief field of operations, they sustain 80 laborers, colporteurs, and evangelists, beside others in several other papal countries. They had also translated D'Aubigne's History into Italian, and it was now circulating rapidly in Italy. A gentleman in Hartford has engaged to support a missionary there for one year, and he thought others would do the same. Papal countries have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars for sustaining missionaries in the United States, and it is but reasonable that we should do as much for them, in accordance with our convictions of truth and duty, in return. It was an interesting fact, that millions in those countries were now looking to us, not only for the light afforded by our free institutions, but for more knowledge of that Christianity which lies at the foundation of all true freedom as well as future happiness."

Miss Fleaureau, of London, has just presented to the London Missionary Society the noble sum of £5,150 3 per cent. consols, valued at £4,248, for the permanent support of a missionary in China.

Peace with Mexico.—It was rumored in this city last week, that the Treaty of Peace between this country and Mexico had been ratified, but many thought the news too good to be believed. Advices from Washington, of the 4th inst., however, settle the question, that the Treaty was ratified by the Mexican Chamber of Deputies on the 17th ult., by a vote of 57 to 35, and the other branch of Congress will no doubt approve it by a large vote. It is said, also, that orders have been issued calling in the outposts of the army, and they were expected to march for the coast between the 1st and 15th of June.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Since our last, two steamships have arrived from Liverpool, bringing news to May 20. The movements in Europe continue to be of an interesting character, although these arrivals bring nothing particularly startling.

In Ireland, the trials of O'Brien and Meagher were proceeding slowly. Mr. John Mitchell, the proprietor of the United Irishman, has been arrested and imprisoned for publishing articles supposed to endanger the Crown and Government.

Lord Ashburton, formerly Mr. Alexander Baring, died on the 14th of May, at Longleat, Whitshire, at the seat of his grandson, the youthful Marquis of Bath. His Lordship died in his 75th year, surrounded by his family, and thus speedily followed to the grave his two brothers, Sir Thomas Baring, Bart., and Mr. Henry Baring, both of whose deaths were recorded a few weeks ago.

From France, we learn that a conspiracy to overthrow the Republic and establish Terrorism was discovered on the 15th of May, and signally defeated. The members of the various secret clubs got possession of the Chamber of Deputies for a while, declared the Chamber dissolved, and appointed a new Government. In due time, however, some 200 of the conspirators were arrested, and reduced to a condition which will not admit of their doing farther mischief. The allegiance of the troops of the line and National Guards is now confidently relied on, and Lamartine's popularity has been effectually restored.

A battle was fought on the 6th of May, between the Piedmontese and the Austrians, under the walls of Verona. 659 persons were wounded, and about 100 killed. No important advantages were secured to either party.

In Italy, the hostile armies are still approaching nearer each other; several slight engagements have taken place, in which neither side could justly claim a victory, and some decisive battle, whose result shall be an omen of good or ill to the Republicans of the Italian League, is anxiously awaited.

By advices received at Milan, it is learned that a battle had been fought between the Austrians and the Pontifical troops and Italian volunteers, between Cornuda and Molinetto. The Austrians lost four hundred men killed and five hundred prisoners, and many wounded. The body of their troops, to the number of 5,000 men, were surrounded, without having any artillery, at Cornuda and Molinetto, and are placed between two fires by Generals Durando and Ferrari. Another account says that the battle lasted five hours, and that the Roman troops received a check.

BRITISH RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

Wesleyan Missionary Society.—The expenditure during the year was £114,676, the receipts £103,619; and allowing for a balance of £4,934 remaining over from the previous year, there was now due to the treasurer, £5,993.

Sunday School Union.—This Society is also a British and Foreign, extending its operations all the way to New Zealand, and having schools under its patronage in all continents. It made 281 grants last year, amounting to £6,422. The schools thus assisted contain 23,345 scholars, of whom 14,805 can read the Bible. The Sunday Schools within five miles of the London Post Office are 503, teachers 10,209, scholars 100,-065. Average attendance 66,751. The sales of the year amounted to £8,857.

British and Foreign Bible Society.—According to the 44th Annual Report, the entire receipts of the year ending March, 1848, were £90,416. The total sum applicable to the Society was £43,956. The receipts for Bibles and Testaments amounted to £46,189, the issues of the Society for the year amounting to 1,124,067, viz.: from depositories at home, 837,361; from depots abroad, 286,705. The total issues of the Society now amount to 20,865,837. The expenditure during the past year has been £105,-042, being £14,896 beyond the receipts. The liabilities of the Society now extend to £41,800.

Religious Tract Society.—According to the Report, 22,000,000 of publications had been circulated during the past year, being at the rate of 1,800,000 monthly, 427,066 weekly, 60,274 daily, 2,511 hourly, and 42 for every minute of the days and nights throughout the year. The Society's total circulation at home and abroad, since its formation, amounts to nearly 463,000,-000, in about 100 languages. The Society's total receipts this year, including the sales, £55,-736 4s. 4d.

Church Pastoral Aid Society.—Lord Ashley presided at the Annual Meeting of this Society. Its receipts were £25,707, and its expenditures, £25,537.

Sailor's Home Society.—Amiral Bowles, M. P., presided. Receipts, £7076 19s. 1d.

Church Home Society.—The present is the 50th year of its existence. Total annual receipts, £101,292—less than last year by £15,-524.

The Senate of Connecticut has appropriated $10,000 for the establishment of Agricultural Schools.

General Intelligence.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Prompted by a "sense of duty," we have read over the reports of proceedings in Congress last week. But we find them almost barren of interest to the general reader.

In the SENATE, the principal topic of discussion was the bill in favor of establishing a Territorial Government in Oregon. Various amendments were proposed, with a view to the exclusion of slavery from the Territory which gave rise to considerable debate, but no decision was arrived at or approximated to. A joint resolution was introduced in the Senate to bring the present Session of Congress to a close on the first Monday in July, to meet again in an extra session on the first Monday in October next. The consideration of the question was made the order of the day for Monday next. Mr. Jefferson Davis, of Miss., presented in the Senate as an offering from the United States army to Congress, the American flag which was displayed from the halls of the Montezumas on the capture of the City of Mexico.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the bill in favor of the West Point Military Academy was passed. The bill in favor of suppressing Indian hostilities in Oregon was under discussion, and furnished an occasion for several speeches in relation to slavery.

A STANGE STORY.—The Fulton County Republican announces the death of Mr. Norman Bemis, under very distressing circumstances. He was married on Thursday to Miss Fast, living some few miles above Liverpool, on Duck Creek. On the night after the wedding, they rode down to Liverpool, to visit a friend and spend the night. Between 7 and 8 o'clock at night, Mr. Bemis left the house, to visit a connection of his, Mr. Brush, a few rods distant. In approaching Mr. Brush's house he observed a person in female attire, carrying two guns. The person retired as Mr. Bemis approached, and although saluted twice or thrice by Mr. Bemis, no answer was returned. Bemis had partly passed the house, and was approachiug the strange person, when he was shot dead. No persons were in Mr. Brush's house at the time except Mrs. Brush and a little boy, and they heard some one exclaim, "Bemis is shot." Going out, they found the person in female attire, holding Bemis' head in her lap, and Bemis dead or dying. The disguised person was Nehemiah Northrup, who acknowledged that he had shot Bemis, but declared that it was an accident, as he did not know the gun was loaded. A coroner's verdict was to the same effect. Northrup gave himself up, and after the examination was held to bail in the sum of $1,000, to answer the charge of murder. It appeared on the examination, that it was intended to charivari the newly married couple, and that Northrup was to participate in it; that he had left Liverpool, and gone to his home a mile or two distant, after the arrival of Bemis; that he took the two guns without seeing whether they were loaded or not, returned to Liverpool before his associates in the charivari arrived, carelessly snapping the gun at and killed Bemis. Northrup, it is said, knew the gun was empty when he last used it, but it had been borrowed and returned with the load in it, without his knowledge.

THE TRACK-SPRINKLER.—This is the name of a contrivance that has been patented by persons in Providence, Rhode Island, for sprinkling railroad-tracks. The Journal of that city states that it has been applied to the trains of the Stonington Railroad with results favorable far beyond the expectations of the projectors. A tank of 2,000 gallons has been found sufficient to sprinkle the whole track from Providence to Stonington, the train going at the rate of twenty miles an hour. The dust has been laid so effectually as to give no annoyance to passengers; the friction of the wheels on the rails has been greatly diminished; the bearings of the wheels and the journals have been much less worn, and such a thing as a "hot box" to a car has not been known, even at the greatest speed, since the sprinkler has been in use. The labor of cleaning the cars and the wear upon them have also been greatly diminished. The sprinkler is placed just behind the locomotive, so that while the locomotive is constantly traversing a dry and comparatively dusty track, the cars are going over a wet one.

WASHINGTON'S LIBRARY.—The Boston Post says that a collection of books, most of which formerly belonged to Washington, is now for sale by Mr. Henry Stevens, Cambridge. Of the number, 240 contain Washington's autograph, and a few contain Mrs. Washington's. Many have his book plate also. One contains three autographs of his father, Augustine Washington. Other distinguished autographs, as those of Bushrod Washington and of Richard Henry Lee, appear in other volumes. This library, intrinsically valuable, but fifty-fold more so from the hallowed associations connected with it, must receive a final disposition without delay. The price is $4,500; but certain expenses indicate a necessity of raising the sum of $5,000, which it is proposed to raise in one hundred shares of fifty dollars each.

A FISH STORY.—Some fishermen at Hallock's harbor, near New Haven, a few days since drew in at a single haul, two millions of white fish, as nearly as could be estimated, weighing on an average about three-quarters of a pound each. The total weight of the haul, therefore, was about 1,500,000 lbs., or 750 tons! It was the greatest haul of fish ever made in that harbor, and we suspect it will not be easy to match it any where. The farmers from the neighboring country were engaged three or four days in carrying them off in immense cart-loads. They sell at 50 or 75 cents the 1,000. The fishermen are much indebted to a bevy of porpoises, who drove the white fish into the harbor, helping themselves meanwhile, no doubt, to a very large number.

The lead mines of Arkansas are said to yield a larger proportion of silver than any other in the world, being sufficiently large to pay both the expenses of cupellation and raising the ore.

SUMMARY.

The factory of Savage & Co., Berlin, Ct., was carried away by a freshet week before last. The accident was so sudden and unexpected, that the workmen engaged in the building were unable to escape, and six men were carried down the rapid stream among the broken fragments of the mill, but, strange to tell, not one of them was killed. The factory was used for making copper kettles, house boilers, &c., and is a complete mass of ruins. Loss about $2,000. Some of the men were carried nearly a quarter of a mile in the rapid current, surrounded by water-wheels and floating timbers.

At the head of one of the graves in the burial ground at "Old St. Mary's," Maryland, there stands a cedar slab, which, as the inscription upon it indicates, was placed there in the year 1717! Notwithstanding it has been exposed to the weather for so long a period, it is still perfectly sound, and, if unmolested by desecrating hands, it will doubtless be standing when every man, woman, and child that now moves upon the earth shall have gone down to "darkness and the worm."

By a late census of England, the number of horses in England has been found to have diminished from 1,000,000 to 200,000 within the last ten years; in other words, the railroads have dispensed with the use of 800,000 horses, and these animals, as well as oxen, are now scarcely used for transportation, and thus the grain and food of the 800,000 horses formerly consumed have been dispensed with, and the land used for the growth of hay and grass is devoted to the growth of grain alone for the supply of bread.

The process of shortening a river may appear something new under the sun, but it has actually been accomplished in the Mississippi, one of the largest rivers in the United States. During a recent freshet the river made a "bolt" through its banks at Raccourci, where there was a considerable turn, and took a straight course for the nearest point of the stream, cutting off twenty-eight miles in the length of the stream. The largest class of steamboats pass through up and down, without any difficulty. It is about four hundred yards wide, and the banks constantly caving.

Dr. Ure remarks in one of his recent works, "It is computed that a cow which gives eighteen hundred quarts (English) of milk per annum, eats in that time eight thousand pounds of hay, and produces one hundred and forty pounds of butter. Two pounds and a quarter of hay corresponds to one quart of good milk; and a cow which eats sixteen thousand five hundred pounds of hay, will produce three hundred pounds of butter per annum."

By an act of Parliament, passed during the last year, no more breadstuffs can be distilled into alcoholic liquors in Great Britain and Ireland. If the English distiller formerly consumed twenty-five millions of bushels of grain, to supply his distillery under the old state of things, he now requires none of this grain whatever, because he cannot use it, and the twenty-five millions are now on hand to work into bread for the inhabitants of the British Islands.

Queen Victoria, during her hurried visit to the Isle of Wight, ordered his Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury to prepare a form of prayer to Almighty God for the maintenance of peace and tranquillity, and that such form of prayer be used in all the churches of England and Wales, and the town of Berwick-on-Tweed, on Friday, the 21st day of April, and on the four Sundays following.

Prof. Gibbons, of Philadelphia, says an exchange paper, asserted in a public address some time since, that of all the physicians who have received diplomas to practice medicine in the present century, one-half have reeled into the drunkard's grave!

At New Haven, on Sunday afternoon, Mrs. Lydia Swift, widow of the late Rev. Zephania Swift, of Derby, in the same State, committed suicide by hanging herself in the upper part of the house which she occupied, late the residence of Governor Edwards. Mrs. Swift was a daughter of the late David Austin, of New Haven. She was a woman of excellent character, and exemplary deportment. She undoubtedly committed the act under the influence of insanity, to which several members of the family have at times been subject, in a greater or less degree.

The Bridgeport (Ct.) Standard says that the harbor, on Saturday afternoon, was almost one solid mass of white fish, from the beacon to the bridge. So thick were they, that persons on board vessels passing up and down the harbor, and at the docks, could pull up pails full of them for some time. There was a "great commotion" in the harbor, and no mistake. No doubt millions could have been caught with a net.

Jacob Freyberger, a German passenger on board of the boat E. B. Bennett, was crushed to death on Saturday by a canal bridge a short distance above Fort Plain—he being asleep on the deck of the boat at the time. He had paid in full for the passage of four persons to Buffalo, and had left a part of his family at Fultonville affected with the small pox.

We hear, says the Louisville Journal, that the whole face of the country in Indiana, from Corydon to Evansville, a distance of nearly two hundred miles, is covered with pigeons. Every species of grain put in the ground by the farmers is destroyed forthwith. The slaughter is of course terrible. We have heard of wagon loads of pigeons sent in all directions.

Salome Muller, the German woman, whose suit for freedom, on the ground of not being of African blood, excited so much interest some time since, has at last established her freedom in the New Orleans Courts, and is now sueing John F. Miller for the freedom of her children.

The Directors of the Syracuse and Auburn, and of the Syracuse and Utica Railroad Companies, are engaged in the work of relaying the track of their respective roads with heavy rail. A large force is employed on each improvement.

Mr. Andrew Heron, aged 83, a native of Scotland, died at Niagara, Canada, on the 20th inst. He was publisher of the Niagara Gleaner for more than twenty years, having founded that paper.

In five days of last week about fifteen thousand emigrants landed at New York.

Died, at his residence in Pittstown, on Saturday, 27th ult., Gen. Gilbert Eddy, in the 88th year of his age. At the early age of sixteen he participated in the capture of Burgoyne at Bemus Heights, and at a later period of the Revolutionary struggle was captured at sea and carried into Halifax, where he was for a long time incarcerated in an odious prison-ship, subject to all the suffering and disease incident to the barbarous treatment well known to have been extended to the so-called rebellious subjects of his majesty's revolted colonies who were so unfortunate as to fall into their hands as prisoners.

George B. Wilson, who has just returned from the settlement made by several colored families on lands generously given them by Gerrit Smith, informs the editor of the N. Y. Tribune, that Wm. A. Smith, one of the settlers, has already erected a spacious dwelling on Lime Lake, in township No. 9, Franklin County, on the main turnpike from Lake Champlain to Ogdensburg. The site is a beautiful one, and several of the granted locations lie near it in various directions, and settlements may soon be effected thereon by the combined exertions of the grantees, among whom an energetic spirit prevails.

The New Orleans Delta says that San Jacinto Pat, the celebrated Indian Chief, who is carrying such terror into the white settlements of Yucatan, is of Irish descent. His father was an Irishman of great weight and influence with the Yucatecoes, and his mother was an Indian woman. He is possessed of great courage, activity, and firmness, and in many respects strongly resembles Carrera, the Indian President of Guatemala. San Jacinto Pat belongs to the Young Irelanders, and is a strong advocate of the physical force doctrine.

A recent arrival at Charleston, from Buenos Ayres, brings the intelligence that the bark Ceres arrived at Rio Janeiro from the Coast of Africa, is said to have no less than 200 passengers, all of whom had been landed from captured slavers on the coast of Africa. She also brings news that during the last three months 62 slavers have been captured on the coast.

More counterfeit 5's and 10's of the New Haven County Bank, from the genuine plate, have made their appearance in Boston. The Bank have determined to call in all the genuine bills of those denominations, and to issue no more of them until a new plate can be engraved. In the meantime the Bank have offered a reward of $500 for the detection of the villains.

The wife of Deacon David Travis, of Carmel. Putnam Co., aged 70 years, was drowned on the 5th inst. She went to the little pond to shut off the water from the wheel which had been driving a churn, when she fell into the water and was found by her son quite dead.

According to the Courier, Otis Pettee, Esq., of Newton, Upper Falls, some ten years ago made a set of cotton manufacturing machinery for a party of Yankees in Mexico, by which they have cleared $873,017 12. The cost of the machinery is not mentioned.

The Comptroller has given notice that the first dividend of forty-eight per cent. on the Atlas Bank, secured by public stocks and real estrte, will be paid on presentation at his office, and a certificate given for the balance, which will entitle the holder to receive any farther dividend thereon. The mortgage of $65,000 yet remains to be sold.

As the warm season is fast approaching, when meat cannot be kept for more than a day or two in a fresh state, it will be of no inconsiderable benefit to many to be informed, that if fresh meat is rolled up in Indian corn meal, it will keep fresh for four or five days. The steak should be laid down in pieces of from one to three pounds, and each piece covered entirely with the meal.

The Natchitoches Chronicle, of the 13th, learns verbally that W. R. D. Speights, formerly Parish Judge of the Parish of Sabine, was killed at Many, in that Parish, on the 7th inst., by a man named Bonafay.

Great quantities of maple sugar are produced in Canada. In the parishes of St. Joseph and St. François, many farmers have made from 3,000 to 5,000 pounds, and 300,000 pounds have been made in those two parishes.

The tavern-keepers of Syracuse have adopted a very ingenious mode of getting on one side of an ordinance, lately passed by the Common Council, prohibiting the ringing of dinner-bells in the street. One man stands on the sidewalk shaking a bell without a clapper, and another stands within the door ringing one, loud enough to attract the attention of all stragglers, and the pantomime of the fellow outside directs them to the place of eating.

The steamboat Halifax, a small boat running from Waterville to Hallowell, Me., on the Kennebec, with passengers for the larger boats plying between Hallowell and Boston, burst her boiler at 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning, of last week, while passing through the lock at Augusta dam. There were, as near as ascertained, about 20 persons on board, of whom six were killed, and two or three others so badly injured that they are not expected to survive.

A dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Petersburg, Va., June 4, says that steamboat Andrew Kenny, Capt. Miller, exploded on the Tombigbee river, last Sunday. Thirty persons were killed or missing, twelve badly wounded, and two dreadfully scalded. The boat sunk soon after the explosion, and the wounded were conveyed to the Marine Hospital, where the best medical attention was provided.

While the steamer Messenger was at the wharf in Cincinnati, a state room occupied by an Indian chief who was on his way home from Washington, with money in his possession belonging to the tribe, was broken open, and $25 stolen. There was another parcel of $4000 which the thief did not discover.

DIED,

In Petersburg, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., May 1st, Mr. RANDALL MAXSON, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. He had been in a declining state of health for several months, but was not confined to his bed until a few days before his death. The deceased was for many years a member in good standing of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, and evinced in his daily walk and conversation that he sought a better country, an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. As the time of his departure drew near, his hopes brightened, his faith strengthened, and he frequently exhorted those who called to see him with that holy fervor which we trust will not soon be forgotten. Expressing a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and a firm reliance on Him who has said, "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee," he resigned his spirit to Him who gave it, and departed in peace, witnessing the truth of those beautiful lines—

> "Jesus can make a dying bed
>   Feel soft as downy pillows are,
> While on his breast I lean my head,
>   And breathe my life out sweetly there."

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 17th ult., of apoplexy, Mrs. BETSEY BURDICK, widow of the late Mr. Jacob Burdick, aged 59 years. Mrs. B. was a pious member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and a kind and useful member of the community in which she lived. She was much endeared to a large family of children and relatives, by whom her death will be severely felt and lamented. W. B. M.

In Almond, N. Y., May 22, Mrs. LOUISA HALSEY, wife of Edward Halsey, in the 31st year of her age.

At Verona, N. Y., on the 28th of April, of a pulmonary disease, CORDELIA L SHERMAN, daughter of Hiram and Salome Sherman, aged 13 years and 10 months.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will be held with the Church at Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the fourth day of the week before the last Sabbath in June, (24th,) at ten o'clock A. M. Elder Leman Andrus to preach the introductory discourse; N. V. Hull, alternate.

The churches are requested to remember, that the missionaries of the Association were directed to report at that time, and present a statement of their labors, in order that they might receive renumeration for their services, and take action accordingly.

THE SCRIPTURAL CALENDAR, AND CHRONOLOGICAL REFORMER, for the Statute Year 1848, Including a Review of Tracts by Dr. Wardlaw and others on the Sabbath Question. By WILLIAM HENRY BLACK, Elder of the Sabbath-keeping Congregation in Mill-Yard, and one of the Assistant Keepers of the Public Records. London: 1848. A few copies for sale at this office. Price in wrapper 10 cents; in cloth 18 cents.

CHRISTIAN PSALMODY.

THE New Collection of Hymns with this title, prepared by a Committee of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, was published on the 10th day of Sept. last, and is for sale at this office. It contains over one thousand hymns, together with the usual table of first lines, and a complete index of particular subjects, the whole covering 576 pages. The work is neatly printed, on fine paper, and bound in a variety of styles to suit the tastes and means of purchasers. The price in strong leather binding is 75 cents per copy; in imitation morocco, plain, 87½ cents; ditto, gilt edges, $1 00; ditto, full gilt, $1 12½; in morocco, full gilt, $1 37½. Those wishing books will please forward their orders, with particular directions how to send, to GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

GOLD PENS, $1,25.

CAUTION.—In consequence of the unprecedented demand for the "People's Pen," introduced to the public some three months since by the subscribers, at the reduced price of $1,25 for a beautiful Diamond Pointed Gold Pen, with a fine silver pencil case, an attempt is being made to palm upon the public an inferior article at the above price. We would respectfully caution our friends against being deceived, and assure them that we shall continue to sell as good a Pen at $1,25, as can be furnished at any other establishment in Boston for $2. We warrant our Pens in all cases to be what they are represented.

CAUTION.—Beware of Platina, and imitation points. The Diamond Points will resist the touch of all metals, and last with care, many years. WHITE & POTTER, 15 State st., south side Old State House, Boston.

The Pens will be sent by mail when ordered in a letter enclosing $1,25 or more, post paid.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review," Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"
For all four of the Reviews,	8 00	"
For Blackwood's Magazine,	3 00	"
For Blackwood and three Reviews,	9 00	"
For Blackwood and the four Reviews,	10 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

THE SHOWER.

In a valley that I know—
Happy scene!
There are meadows sleeping low,
There the fairest flowers blow,
And the smoothest streamlets flow
All serene;
But the sweetest thing to see,
If you ask the dripping tree,
Or the harvest-hoping swain,
Is the rain!

Ah, the dwellers of the town,
How they sigh!
How ungratefully they frown
When the cloud-king shakes his crown,
And the pearls come pouring down
From the sky!
They deserve no charm at all
When the sparkling jewels fall,
And each moment of the shower
Seems an hour!

Yet there's something very sweet
In the sight,
When the crystal currents meet
In the dry and dusty street,
In their might!
While they seem to hold a talk
With the stones along the walk,
And remind them of the rule.
To "keep cool."

But there in that quiet dell,
Ever fair,
Still the Lord doth all things well,
When His clouds with blessings swell,
And they break a brimming shell
On the air;
There the shower hath its charms,
Sweet and welcome to the farms,
As they listen to its voice
And rejoice!

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE MONKEY.

An impertinent curiosity runs through all their actions; they can never let things alone, but must know what is going forward. If a pot is set on the fire, and the cook turns her back, the monkey whips off the cover to see what she has put into it, even though he cannot get at it without setting his feet on the hot bars of the grate. Mimicry is another of the monkey's qualities. Whatever he sees men do, he must affect to do the like himself. He seems to have no rules of his own, and so is ruled by the actions of men or beasts, as weak people follow the fashion of the world, whether it be good or bad. No monkey has any sense of gratitude, but takes his victuals with a snatch, and then grins in the face of the person who gives it to him, lest he should take it away again; for he supposes that all men will snatch what they lay hold of, as all monkeys do. Through an invincible selfishness, no monkey ever considers any individual but himself, as the poor cat found to her cost when the monkey burned her paws with raking his chestnuts out of the fire. They can never eat together in company without quarreling and plundering one another. Every monkey delights in mischief, and cannot help doing it when it is in his power. If anything he takes hold of can be broken or spoiled he is sure of finding the way of doing it; and he chatters with pleasure when he hears the noise of a China vessel upon the pavement. If he takes up a bottle of ink he is sure to empty it on the floor. He unfolds all your papers, and scatters them about the room, and what he cannot undo he tears to pieces; and it is wonderful to see how much of this work he will do in a few minutes when he happens to get loose. Every body has heard of the monkey whose curiosity led him to the mouth of a cannon to see how it went off, when he paid for his peeping with the loss of his head. In a ship where a relation of mine was an officer, while the men were busy in fetching powder from below and making cartridges, a monkey on board took up a candle and ran down to the powder-room to see what they were about; but happily was overtaken just as he got to the lantern, and thrown out of the port-hole into the sea, with the lighted candle in his hand. Another lost his life by the spirit of mimicry; he had seen his master shaving his own face, and at the first opportunity, took up the razor to shave himself, and made shift to cut his throat. When the wild monkeys have escaped to the tops of the trees, the people below who want to catch them, show them the use of gloves, by putting them on and pulling them off repeatedly; and when the monkeys are supposed to have taken the hint, they leave plenty of gloves on the ground, having first lined them with pitch. The monkeys come down, put on the gloves, but cannot pull them off again, and when they are surprised, betaking themselves to the trees, as usual, they slide backwards and are taken.

A late neighbor of mine in the country, kept a monkey who took to riding his hogs, especially one of them, which he usually singled out as fittest for his use; and leaping upon its back, with the face towards his tail, he whipped it unmercifully, and drove it about till it could run no longer. The hogs lived under such continual terror, that when the monkey first came abroad in the morning, they used to set up a great cry at the sight of him. A well-known nobleman once had a wild horse whom nobody could ride. "I know not what your lordship can do with him," said one, "but set the monkey upon his back." So they put a pad on the horse, and set monkey upon it, with a switch in his hand, which he used upon the horse, and set him into a furious kicking and galloping; but Pug kept his seat and exercised the switch. The horse lay down upon the ground; but, when he threw himself upon one side, the monkey was upon the other; he ran into a wood with him to brush him off; but if a bush or a tree occurred on one side, the monkey slipped to the other side, till at last the horse was so sickened and fatigued and broken spirited, that he ran home to the stable for protection. When the monkey was removed, a boy was put on him who managed the horse with ease, and he never gave any trouble afterwards. [Lon. Mag.

TIMING IT.—A minister in the Highlands of Scotland found one of his parishioners intoxicated. The next day he called to reprove him for for it. 'It is very wrong to get drunk,' said the parson. 'I ken that,' said the guilty person, 'but then I dinna drink as meikle as you do!' 'What, sir! how is that?' 'Why, gin it please ye, dinna ye aye take a glass o' whiskey and water at dinner?' 'Why, yes, Jemmy, surely I take a little whiskey after dinner merely to aid digestion.' 'An dinna ye take a glass o' whiskey toddy every night before gang to bed?' 'Yes, to be sure, I take a little toddy at night to help me to sleep!' 'Well,' continued the parishioner, 'that's jist fourteen glasses a week, and sixty every month. I only get paid off once a month, and then if I'd take sixty, it would make me dead drunk for a week;—now ye see the only difference is, ye time it better than I do.'

THE WORK OF NEWSPAPERS.

A writer for the N. Y. Daily Tribune says: Nobody who has not been behind the scenes can know how much labor goes to the making up of the newspaper that is served to you with your coffee at breakfast. It is easy reading, and you never suspect that it was work getting it all and putting it together. There is the latest intelligence from all parts of the world; the doings of Congress of the day before, brought by lightning; the latest advices from Mexico, by lightning and express; the events of the day before at Cincinnati, St. Louis, Charleston, Detroit, Boston, and almost everywhere else; the contents of all the country newspapers, and the doings in your own city, worked over, condensed, boiled down, and arranged for your pleasure and instruction. How many hands and heads have expended themselves in filling up the broad page over which your eye wanders! From early morning till long after midnight, they toiled to prepare that mass of editorials and news; and while you were sleeping soundest the presses were rattling, as, under the direction of workmen pale with nightly vigils, they struck off the edition. The whole operations of a daily paper include many laborers—printers, pressmen, editors, reporters, clerks, &c. Most of these workmen have a tolerably busy life of it, beginning early and working fast and late. We translate the following account of the existence of one of these toilers from the French Courier. The subject of the sketch is an employé of the French press, where they arrange matters somewhat differently from our American fashion:

"To-day I have been a journalist collector of news for sixteen years. I have not been ill a single day, and, excepting on the five great festivals of the year, I have not failed to make up and distribute my correspondence to the journals of Paris and the departments every day.

As my working year is thus 360 days, to-day makes 5,760 days that I have worked on the daily press. Consequently I have made up 5,760 budgets of news. As each budget contained, on the average, 20 facts or different pieces of news, it follows that I have sent into the world 115,200 different pieces of news.

Every day, to collect and distribute this news, I have traveled on the average 10 leagues, which amounts to 3,600 leagues a year, and in sixteen years to 57,600 leagues. The circuit of the terrestrial globe being about 9,000 leagues, it follows that in 16 years, to find my 115,200 pieces of news, I have traveled as much as six and one-third times the circuit of the globe.

I affirm, on my honor, that I have never suffered the least attack of that cruel malady called the gout. From this I conclude that those citizens who shall like me, travel ten leagues a day, will not have to suffer any farther from that terrible malady. Finally, to sum up the results of this five-fiold occupation of traveler, observer, editor, printer, and distributor, on the average I have gained 1,800 francs a year, without ever doing injury to any party, except it may be to the fallen Government, which for 16 years, less 2 months, I have attacked with all my little force, without truce or respite. Consequently, through the publishers and editors of the journals, I have made 28,800 francs, of which there remain today only 12f. 50c. [about $2 25,] which I hope will carry me through to the 30th of the present month."

M. CREMIEUX, THE ISRAELITE.

One of the ablest members of the Provi-Provisional Government of France, is the celebrated Jewish advocate, M. Cremieux. He was a member, in company with Isambert, of the great Anti-Slavery Convention held iu London in 1840. In his speech in that Convention, he vindicated the Jews from the charge of slavery, and cited the noble examples of the Essenes, who first declared slavery to be a crime. "In this assembly of Christians," said he, "I, a Jew, demand the complete abolition of servitude. My enthusiasm is equal to yours. Abolish slavery, proclaim equality; it is a noble and glorious mission. The glory of this mission belongs to two great nations, long divided by war, now uniting in the cause of the world's civilization. The words of England and France will be heard by the world. How sublimely have they been re-echod already from that very Republic of America where so many private interests oppose the emancipation of the blacks? How many generous hearts are there beating only for the sacred interests of humanity! See their representatives in this hall, uniting with France and England. Yes! we shall attain the object of our wishes. The holy alliance—the united will of France and England proclaiming the abolition of human slavery, who can resist? This is the happiest day of my existence; I shall dwell with delight on the recollection that I have been permitted to give utterance to my sentiments in an assembly like the present; and from this moment my life will acquire in my eyes more consistency and more real importance."

SALARIES OF THE ROYAL FAMILY OF ENGLAND.

The following are the annual sums allowed from the public money to her Majesty, the different branches of the royal family, and for the support of the royal household, or officers of State:—The Queen, her Majesty's privy purse, besides Buckingham Palace, St. James's Palace, Windsor Castle, and the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, £68,000; salaries of the great officers of the royal household and officers of State, and of the establishments of the various departments of the household, including allowances to retired and superannuated old servants in those departments, £131,280; expenses of the household in the departments of the Lord Chamberlain, Lord Steward, Master of the Horse, and Mistress of the Robes, £172,500; royal bounties and charities, and special service, &c., £23,000; pensions, £8,500; unappropriated money, £8,040; total, £470,000. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, consort to her Majesty, being his privy purse for secret services and other offices, £40,000; Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, now King of Hanover, with Kew Palace, £21,000; his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, £6,000; Princess Augusta Caroline, his sister, married June 24, 1844, to his Royal Highness Frederick William, Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, £5,000; her Royal Highness Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, relict of the late Duke of Gloucester, £13,000; her Royal Highness Princess Sophia, with Greenwich Palace and Park, £13,000; the trustees of his Majesty Leopold, King of the Belgians, as widower of her late Royal Highness Princess Charlotte, daughter of George the IV. with Claremont Palace, £50,000; her Majesty Adelaide, the Queen Dowager, relict of King William IV., beside the Royal Manor and Palace Hampton Court, the Park and domains of Bushy, and also Marlborough House in Pall Mall, two parks and three royal palaces, £100,000; her Royal Highness the Dutchess of Kent, mother of her Majesty, with Frogmore Lodge, Windsor, £32,000; the Duchess of Inverness, relict of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, £10,000 per annum, with Kensington Palace.

PREACHING AN EASY BUSINESS.

A minister had a deacon in his congregation who was rather disposed to undervalue the duties discharged by his minister. 'What an easy life our minister has! He has little else to do besides preaching! And preaching is a very easy thing to do! In fact, any one could preach that tried!'

These, and such like remarks, having often come to the minister's ears, he called on the deacon one Saturday, and thus addressed him,

'Well, deacon, they tell me that you think that preaching is so very easy.'

'Yes, so it seems to me!'

'Would you have any objections to try tomorrow?'

'None, in the world!'

Accordingly the next day the congregation was surprised to behold the deacon occupying the pulpit. And all anticipated a rich treat from one who regarded preaching as a very easy performance. But sadly were they disappointed. A very small trial convinced the deacon of his mistake. After bungling and stumbling for a short time, he abruptly finished his discourse with the following honest and eloquent peroration:—

'Well, my friends, I thought until now, that preaching was a very easy thing! All I have to say is, that if any of you think so, just come up and try it!'

GEORGE AND HIS LITTLE SISTER.

A little boy asked his mother to let him lead his little sister out on the green grass. She had just begun to run alone, and could not step over anything that lay in the way. His mother told him he might lead out the little girl, but chargchim not to let her fall. I found them at play very happy in the field.

I said, 'You seem very happy, George. Is this your sister?'

'Yes, sir.'

'Can she walk alone?'

'Yes sir, on smooth ground.'

'And how did she get over these stones, which lie between us and the bouse?'

'O sir, mother charged me to be careful that she did not fall, and so I put my hands under her arms, and lifted her up when she came to a stone, so that she need not hit her little foot against it.'

'That is right, George; and I want to tell you one thing. You see now how to understand that beautiful text, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. God charges his angels to lead and lift good people over difficulties, just as you have lifted little Anne over these stones. Do you understand it now.'

'O yes, sir, and I shall never forget it while I live.'

Can one child thus take care of another, and cannot God take care of those who put their trust in him? Surely he can; and there is not a child who may read this story, over whom he is not ready to give his holy angels charge.

ELEGANT STARVATION.

A thoughtless young gentleman of good family, although he had spent every shilling, and worn out every trace of credit, lived with a devoted partner of his poverty, in a splendid villa near the Regent's Park. Jewels, books, wearing apparel, and every description of moveable, had long disappeared from this exquisite residence, to supply the common necessaries of life. 'Yesterday,' our hero boasted to a confidential friend, towards the end of this ruin, 'we supped off a pair of ear-rings. That case of champagne in the coal-cellar is the production of some thirty very dry volumes of the Encyclopædia Britannica. We have dined during the past week off my dress coat; and this very day, had it not been for my polished boots, we should have been obliged to breakfast without Balognas.'

Of course these fearful privations increased till, some time after, they reached a climax. One day the hopeful economist returned home after dinner time, in a state of famishing hunger, and entreated his lovely housekeeper to order dinner—'Dinner,' she repeated; 'there is not a scrap in the house, nor an article left to procure one with.' 'Surely,' exclaimed the other, slapping his forehead in despair, 'something can be snatched from the wreck! I have it—we can yet avert from our countenances the horrid stare of starvation. 'Tis a desperate act but it must be done.' 'What?' inquired the lady anxiously. 'What?—why, fry the gold fish, and roast the canary!'

FRANKLIN'S TOAST.—Long after Washington's victories over the French and English had made his name familiar to all Europe, Dr. Franklin had chanced to dine with the English and French ambassadors, when, as nearly as we can recollect the words, the following toasts were drunk. By the British ambassador:—"England—the sun whose bright beams enlighten and fructify the remotest corners of the earth." The French ambassador, glowing with national pride, but too polite to dispute the previous toast, drunk: "France—the moon, whose mild, steady, and cheering rays are the delight of all nations; consoling them in darkness, and making their dreariness beautiful." Dr. Franklin then arose, and with his usual dignified simplicity, said: "George Washington—the Joshua, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still; and they obeyed him."

STRAWBERRIES AND PEACHES.—In the report of Mr. Burke, of the patent office, the peach crop of Delaware, the most important peach-growing State in the Union, is set down at 300,000 baskets; value, $120,000. In sixteen days 4,572 bushels of strawberries were sold in New York, 514 in one day; 80,000 baskets, equal to 833 bushels, weighing 25 tons, were brought in one day over the Erie Railroad. Whole number of bushels sold in New York, equal to 502,840, being an increase of 212,000, or 24 per cent., over last year; value, $2,000,000 in a season! Cincinnati is next to New York, the great strawberry market of the United States. The grape-vine flourishes beautifully in Cincinnati, but it would appear that Texas is the true wine country of our Union.

RAISING PINE APPLES BY STEAM.—The Franklin Institute Journal furnishes the following, translated from a French journal: A manufacturer who has a steam engine which discharges much waste steam, conceived the idea of using it to raise pine apples. The steam was introduced under the root of the plants, and the heat and moisture united, acted so powerfully that the pine apples soon ripened; while the body of the plant, being exposed all day to the open air, assumes a healthy and agreeable taste, which renders the fruit far superior to those which have been raised in hot houses.

VARIETY.

A high wheel locomotive has been built in England for the Namur and Liege railway, which is thought to be a great improvement as well as curiosity. It runs on six wheels, the driving wheel being 6 feet in diameter, the cylinder 16 inches, length of stroke 20, number of tubs 182, 11 feet in length; surface of the same 927 feet. On a level it has gone 75 miles an hour; and with a train weighing 50 tons, 51 miles. The boiler is within two foot nine inches of the rails, and the driving wheels are placed at the foot plate end of the boiler. The engine is very steady and quite free from vibration.

One hogshead of blood each hour passes through the human lungs to be purified by contact with air. To effect that purification, one hundred and two gallons of pure air are required for each hour. How important then are those essentials, free circulation and pure air. The young ought to exercise much in the open air.

Women ought to measure from 27 to 29 inches round the waist, says the Home Journal, but most females do not permit themselves to grow beyond 24. Thousands are laced to 22—some of them less than 20, and thus by whalebone, wood, and steel, the waist is reduced to half its proper size.

It is stated that in Ceylon, elephants are employed in ploughing new grounds for the cultivation of coffee, pepper, etc. One of these animals when well trained, it is said, will do the work of twenty oxen; consequently, more labor is performed in a given time, and the period is hastened for putting in the crops. The price of an elephant, in Ceylon, varies from $50 to $75.

It is said that in the midst of the rush of people into the palace of the Tuilleries when they were all so much excited, that on entering the saloon of the Queen, they found a piano, and that they forced a young man to sit down and play for them, and they all went to dancing the polka. This is so French that we can believe it without any trouble.

Somebody down East advertisis for 'Two apprentices to learn the art and mystery of Cordwaining.' A lady who read it inquired of us what was meant by Cordwaining. We informed her that shoemaking was so termed by some people. 'Is that it?' said she—'I think it would be less of a mystery if they would call it Cordwaxing.'

We learn from the Somerville (Tenn.) Reporter, that a terrible tornado has passed over that county. Not less than 100,000 panes of glass were broken in that county alone. Houses, timber, and fences were prostrated in all directions, and horses and cattle killed. The crops were injured severely. The town of Lagrange suffered dreadfully.

The Provisional Government of Paris appointed a committee to ascertain the number of persons killed in the late Revolution, in order to afford relief to their families. It was found that nearly all who had died, from whatever cause, during the three days, were enrolled as dead patriots, and buried at the expense of government; and their widows and children now claim to be adopted by the State!

The following has been found an easy and successful way to raise early cucumbers. Place small pieces of dead turf, as large as the cucumber hill, upon them; when the stems are two or three inches long, the pieces of turf are removed, plants and all, to rich garden soil, and they will advance rapidly in growth, and produce fruit two or three weeks earlier than those on open ground.

Some of the daguerreotypists who have sent specimens of their pictures to the exhibition of the Society of Arts, in London, have actually caught a sun-beam, and transferred a representation of it to their metal plates. A bank of of cloud drifting in a high wind, is also rendered clearly.

There are twenty-three millions of acres of waste land in France, on which the government intend to establish agricultural works for the employment of the people; a wise resolution deserving to be followed out in this country.

It is proposed to insulate magnetic telegraph wires by means of gutta percha, and bury them in the ground, by which, a great many of the accidents to which the telegraph is now liable, would be avoided.

The British Government have resolved upon sending out properly qualified schoolmasters and schoolmistresses to the colonies in different parts of the world, to conduct the public schools established there for the natives.

A new fruit has been introduced at Charleston, S. C., from Japan. It is an evergreen, and bears flowers of a delightful almond-like fragrance, twice a year. The fruit is now ripe.

Opinion is the chief thing which does good or harm in the world. It is our false opinion of things which leads us to ruin.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

Other experienced Teachers are employed in the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25,		and ending	Dec. 1
Second	"	"	Dec. 15,	" March 22
Third	"	"	April 5,	" July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

HAFED'S DREAM.

At the foot of one of those gigantic mountains, in Asia, which lift up their heads so far above the clouds that the eye of man never saw their summits, stood a beautiful cottage facing the east. The mountain stream leaped and murmured on the north; the verdant plain, where the bright-eyed gazelle sported, lay spread out in front; the garden and the olive-yard, filled with every flower and every fruit which an Oriental sun could pencil and ripen, lay on the south; while back on the west, rose the everlasting mountain. Here were walks, and shades, and fruits, such as were found no where else. The sun shone upon no spot more luxuriant; the moonbeams struggled to enter no place more delightful; and here the serpent's hiss was never heard.

This cottage was the home of Hafed, the aged and the prosperous. He reared his cottage; he adorned this spot; and here, for more than fourscore years, he had lived and studied. During all this time, the sun had never forgotten to visit him daily; the harvest had never failed, the pestilence had never destroyed, and the mountain stream had never dried up. The wife of his youth still lived to cheer and bless him, and his son and daughter were such as not to be found in that province. No youth could rein the horse, hurl the javelin, chase the lion, or delight the social circle, like his son. No daughter of kings could be found so beautiful and perfect as was his daughter, with an eye so bright and joyous, and a form so symmetrical, as hers.

But who can ensure earthly happiness? In one short week, Hafed was stripped of his joys.

His wife went to see a new white peacock, which it was said a neighbor, who lived a mile off in the ravine, had just brought home. She took a cold, and a quick fever followed; and on her return, Hafed saw that she must die. He gazed long, and said impatiently, 'Cover her, cover the only woman that I ever loved!'

The son and daughter both returned from the burial of their mother fatigued and sick. The nurse gave them, as she thought, a simple medicine. In a few hours, it was found to be poison. Hafed saw that they must die, for the laws of nature are fixed, and poison kills. He buried them in one wide, deep grave, and it seemed as if, in that grave, he had buried his reason and his religion. He tore his gray hair, he cursed the light of day, and wished the moon turned into blood, and above all, he blasphemed his God, declaring the laws which he had established all wrong, useless, and worse than none. He wished the world were governed by chance; but as this was a hopeless wish, he wished that at his death he might go to a world where there was no God to fix unalterable laws. He arraigned the wisdom of God in his government over this world, declaring that his plans were weak and worse than none, and that it would be far better to have no God in the universe!

In the centre of Hafed's garden stood a large, beautiful palm-tree. Under it was Hafed sitting the second evening after closing the grave over his children The seat on which he sat had been reared by his son. On the leaf of the tree which lay before him, were some exquisite verses written by the pencil of his daughter. Before him lay the beautiful country covered with green, sprinkled here and there, as far as the eye could reach, with the habitations of men, and upon this great landscape the shadows of the mighty mountains were now setting. In the east, the moon was just pushing up her modest face, and the gold of day was softening in the silver of night. While Hafed looked on all this, grief began to swell in his throat; his tongue murmured; his heart was full of hard thoughts of God, which nearly amounted to blasphemy.

As the night deepened, Hafed, as he then thought, fell asleep with a heavy heart. When he supposed he awoke, it was in a new spot. The mountain, the landscape, the home, were all gone. All was new.

As he stood wondering where he was, he saw a creature approaching him, which, at first, he mistook for a baboon; but on its coming near, he discovered that it was a creature somewhat resembling a man, but every way malformed, ill-shaped, and monstrous.

He came up and walked around Hafed, as he would around a superior being, exclaiming, 'Beautiful, beautiful creature!'

'Shame, shame on thee!' said Hafed; 'dost thou treat a stranger thus with insults? Leave off thy jests, and tell me what I am, and how I came here!'

'I do not know how you came here; but here you are in the world; which we call Chance World, because every thing happens here by chance.'

'Ah! is it so? This must be delightful! This is just the world for me. Oh! had I always lived here, my beautiful children would not have died under a foolish and inexorable law! Come, show me this world, for I long to see it. But have ye really no God, nor any one to make laws and govern you as he sees fit?'

'I don't know what you mean by God; we have nothing of the kind here—nothing but chance; but go with me, and you will understand all about it.'

As they proceeded, Hafed began to notice that every thing looked queer and odd. Some of the grass was green, some red, some white, some new, and some dying; some grew with the top downward; and on the whole, the sight was very painful. He stopped to examine an orchard; here chance had been at work. On a fine-looking apple-tree, he saw no fruit but large coarse cucumbers, A small peach-tree was breaking down under its load of gourds. Some of the trees were growing with their tops downwards, and the roots branching out in the air. Here and there were great holes dug, by which some body had tried to get down twenty or thirty feet, in order to get the fruit. The guide told Hafed that there was no certainty about these trees; and you could never tell what fruit a tree would happen to bear. The tree which this year bears cucumbers, may bear potatoes next year, and perhaps you would have to dig twenty feet for every potato you obtained.

They soon met another of the 'chance men.' His legs were very unequal in length, one had no knee, and the other had no ancle. His ears were set upon his shoulders, and around his head was a thick black bandage. He came groping his way, and Hafed at once asked him how long since he had lost his sight.

'I have not lost it,' said he, 'but when I was born, my eye-balls happened to be turned in instead of out, and the back parts being outward, are very painful in the light, and so I put on a covering.'

'Well, but canst thou not see any thing? Methinks thou mayest see strange things within.'

'True, but the difficulty is to get any light in there. I have contrived various ways to do so,—have had it poured in my ears and nose; but all will not do. Yet I am as well off as others. My brother has one good eye on the top of his head; but he only looks directly up with it to the clouds; and the sun almost puts it out. He shuts it most of the time during the day, but it happens to be one of those eyes that will not stay shut, and so when he sleeps the flies trouble him badly. I have a sister who has nineteen eyes in her head; but they are a vexation. She sees eighteen things too many. Even now she cannot realize that she has not nineteen fathers and as many mothers. She goes to bed, and falls on the floor at least nineteen times before she gets in. She goes to drink, and sees nineteen cups, and knows not which is the real cup. But so it happened, and she is as well off as most in this "chance world." But, after all, it's a glorious world, I do assure you.'

'Wonderful,' said Hafed.

As they proceeded a little farther they met a young lady.

'That young lady,' said the guide, 'is the greatest beauty in all these parts. All our young men are bewitched by her; and there have been no less than twenty duels on her account already. You will be amazed at seeing a form so perfect.'

As they met, Hafed stared more fully than is usually considered polite among the Orientals. The beauty had not a face altogether unlike a human face, excepting that the mouth was under the chin, the eyes looked separate ways, and the color of the hair was a mixture of red, light-blue, white, and yellow. One foot had the heel forward, and one arm was altogether wanting.

'Wonderful, wonderful, truly,' cried Hafed, 'twenty duels! But I hope they were not all killed, were they?'

Here the beauty began to ogle and mince in her steps more enchantingly.

'Killed!' said the guide; 'you seem to know nothing about us. They all met and fought together; but as every thing here goes by chance, it is not often we can get our powder to burn. In this case, only one got his gun off at all, and that did not happen to go off till night when he was going to bed, when it wounded his hand, which has been bleeding ever since.'

'Ever since! How long ago was this? She did not look as if it could have been to-day.'

'Oh, it was two years ago.'

'Two years ago! and why don't ye seek the leech, and have the poor boy saved from bleeding to death—even though he was a fool—for more reasons than one?'

'Ah, you don't understand it. Every thing goes by chance here; and there is only a chance that a man who is wounded will ever be healed. This is one of those cases in which he will never be healed.'

'I don't understand it, truly,' said Hafed.

They stopped to look at some 'chance cattle,' in a yard. Some had but three legs; some had the head on the wrong part of the body; some were covered with wool, under which they were sweltering in a climate always tropical. Some were half horse and half ox. One cow had a young dwarf of a camel following her as his mother. Young elephants were there with the flocks of sheep; horses with claws like a lion, and geese clamping round the yard with hoofs like horses. It was all the work of chance.

'This,' said the guide, 'is a choice collection of cattle. You never saw the like before.'

'That is true—truth itself,' cried Hafed.

'Ah, but the owner has been at almost infinite pains and expense to collect them. I don't believe there was another such a collection any where in all this "chance world."'

'I hope not,' said Hafed.

Just as they were leaving the premises, the owner came out, to admire, and show, and talk over his treasures. He wanted to gaze at Hafed; but his head happened to be near the ground between his feet, so that he had to get upon a wall before he could get a fair view of the stranger.

'Don't you think I am a happy man,' said he to Hafed, 'in having so many and such perfect animals. Alas, even in this happy and perfect world, there are always drawbacks. That fine looking cow yonder happens to give nothing but warm water for milk; and her calf, poor thing, died the first week. Some of them have good looking eyes, but from some defect, are stone blind. Some cannot live in the light, and few of them can hear. No two eat the same food, and it is a great labor to take care of them. I sometimes feel as if I had almost as lief be a poor man.'

'I think I should rather,' said Hafed.

While they were talking, in an instant they were in midnight darkness. The sun was gone, and Hafed could not for some time see his guide.

'What has happened?' said Hafed.

'Oh, nothing uncommon,' said the guide. 'The sun happened to go down now. There is no regular time for him to shine; but he goes and comes just as it happens, and leaves as suddenly as you see.'

'As I do n't see,' said Hafed; 'but I hope he will come back at an appointed time, at any rate.'

'That, sir, will be just as it happens, sometimes he's gone for months, and sometimes for weeks, and sometimes for a few minutes. Just as it happens. We may not see him again for months, but perhaps he may come soon.'

'But how do you talk about months and days, when you have no such things?'

'I will soon tell you about that. We measure time here by the yard!'

'By the yard?'

'Yes; we call that time which the most perfect men among us take in walking a yard, to be the sixtieth part of an hour. These hours we reckon into days, and these days into years. To be sure we are not very exact, because some men walk so much faster than others. But this is just as their legs happen to be long or short.'

As the guide was proceeding, to the inexpressible joy of all, the sun at once broke out. The light was so sudden, that Hafed thought at first he must be struck with lightning, and actually put his hands up to his eyes, to see if they were safe. He then clapped his hands over his eyes, till he could gradually bear the light. There was a splendor about the sun which he had never before seen; and it was intolerably hot. The air seemed like a furnace.

'Ah!' said the owner of the cattle, 'we must now scorch for it. My poor wool ox must die at once! Bad luck to us! The sun has come back much nearer than he was before. But we hope he will happen to come back farther off the next time.'

The sun was now pouring down his heat so intensely, that they were glad to go into the house for shelter,—a miserable looking place indeed. Hafed could not but compare it with his own beautiful cottage. Some of the timbers were rotten; for the tree was not, as it happened, the same thing in all its parts. Some of the boards happened to be like paper, and the nails tore out, and those were loose and coming off. They had to do their cooking out under the burning sun; for when the smoke once got into the house, there was no getting it out, unless it happened to go, which was not very often.

They invited Hafed to eat. On sitting down at the table, he noticed that each one had a different kind of food, and that no two could eat out of the same dish. He was told that it so happened, that the food which one could eat, was poison to another, and what was agreeable to one, was nauseating to another. Selecting the food which looked most inviting, Hafed attempted to eat. What was his surprise when he found that his hands did not happen to be under the control of his will, and, instead of carrying the food to his mouth, these active servants put it into his right ear! On examining, he found it was so with all the rest, and by imitating the company, and twisting his head over his right shoulder, and placing his mouth where his ear was, he managed to eat. In amazement, he asked how this happened.

'Ah!' said they, laughing at his ignorance of the world, 'we have no fixed laws here. All is chance. Sometimes we have one or more limbs for a short time, which are not under the control of our will. It is just as it happens. So when we drink, we find it always true, that "Some shed it on their shoulder,

Some shed it on their thigh;
And he that does not hit his mouth,
Is sure to hit his eye"'

'I suppose that to be coffee,' said Hafed, 'and I will thank you for a cup.'

It was handed him. He had been troubled with a tooth-ache for some hours, and how did he quail, when, on filling his mouth, he found it was ice, in little pieces about as large as pigeon-shot.

'Do you call ice-water coffee, here?' said Hafed, pressing his hand upon the cheek where the tooth was now dancing with pain.

'That is just as it happens. We put water on the fire, and sometimes it heats it, and sometimes it freezes it. How can it be otherwise, when we have here no fixed laws of any kind? It is all chance work.'

Hafed rose from the table in anguish of spirit. He remembered the world where he had lived, and all that was past. He had desired to live in a world where there was no God—where all was governed by chance, so far as there was anything that looked like government. Here he was, and here he must live. He threw himself on a bed and recalled the past—the beautiful world in which he had once lived—his ingratitude—his murmurings, and his blasphemy against the wisdom of God. He wept like infancy. He would have prayed, and even began a prayer; but then he recollected there was no God here—nothing to direct events—nothing but chance. He shed many and bitter tears of repentance. At last he wept himself asleep.

When Hafed again awoke, he was sitting under his palm-tree in his own beautiful garden. It was morning. At the appointed moment the glorious sun rose up in the east; the fields were all green and fresh; the trees were all right end upwards, and covered with blossoms; the beautiful deer were bounding in gladness over the lawn, and the songsters in the trees, which in plumage and sweetness might have vied with those that sung in Eden, were uttering their morning song.

Hafed arose, recalled the ugly dream, and then wept for joy. Was he again in a world where chance does not reign? He looked up and then turned to the God of heaven and earth —the God of laws and order. He gave glory to him, and confessed that his ways, to us unsearchable, are full of wisdom. He was a new man. Tears indeed fell at the graves of his family; but he now lived to do good to men, and to make others happy. He called a young and worthy couple, distant relatives, to fill his house. His home again smiled, and peace and contentment came back, and were his abiding guests.

Hafed would never venture to affirm whether this was a dream or a reality. On the whole he was inclined to think it real, and that there is some where a 'chance world;' but he always shook his head, and declared that, so far from wishing to live there, nothing gave him greater cause of gratitude as he daily knelt in prayer, than the fact that he lived in a world where God ruled—and ruled by laws fixed, wise, and merciful.

THE REWARD.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Who, looking backward from his manhood's prime,
Sees not the spectre of his mis-spent time;
And, through the shade
Of funeral cypress planted thick behind,
Hears no reproachful whisper on the wind
From his loved dead?

Who bears no trace of passion's evil force?
Who shuns thy sting, O terrible remorse?
Who would not cast
Half of his future from him, but to win
Wakeless oblivion for the wrong and sin
Of the sealed past?

Alas the evil which we fain would shun,
We do, and leave the wished for good undone;
Our strength to-day
Is but to-morrow's weakness prone to fall:
Poor, blind, unprofitable servants all,
Are we alway.

Yet who, thus looking backward o'er his years,
Feels not his eyelids wet with grateful tears,
If he hath been
Permitted, weak and sinful as he was,
To cheer and aid in some ennobling cause,
His fellow men?

If he hath hidden the outcast, or let in
A ray of sunshine to the cell of sin;
If he hath lent
Strength to the weak; and, in an hour of need,
Over the suffering, mildness of his creed,
Or hue, hath bent—

He hath not lived in vain: and, while he gives
The praise to him in whom he moves and lives,
With thankful heart,
He gazes backward and with hope before,
Knowing that from his works he never more
Can henceforth part.

THE LAST DAYS OF HOWARD.

On the 4th of July, 1789, Mr. Howard, accompanied by a single servant, quitted England on his last philanthropic journey. He passed through Holland, part of Germany, Prussia, and several cities of Russia, examining the state of the hospitals; and about the end of the year had reached Cherson, a new settlement of the Russian Empress at the mouth of the Dnieper. This was destined to be the closing scene of his labors. Visiting, according to one account, the Russian hospital of the place, according to another, a young lady, whose friends were anxious that he should prescribe for her, as he had done successfully in many similar cases, he caught a malignant fever, which, after an illness of twelve days, carried him off on the 20th of January, 1790, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. On his death-bed he showed the same calm and Christian spirit which had distinguished him through life. To Admiral Priestman, who resided at Cherson, and who visited him during his illness, and endeavored to amuse and cheer him by his remarks, thinking to divert his thoughts, he said, "Priestman, you style this a dull conversation, and endeavor to divert my mind from dwelling on death; but I entertain very different sentiments. Death has no terrors for me; it is an event I always look to with cheerfulness, if not with pleasure; and be assured the subject is more grateful to me than any other. I am well aware that I have but a short time to live; my mode of life has rendered it impossible that I should get rid of this fever. I have no method of lowering my nourishment, and therefore I must die. It is such jolly fellows as you, Priestman, that get over these fevers." Then alluding to the subject of his funeral, he continued—"There is a spot near the village of Dauphigny; this would suit me nicely. You know it well, for I have often said that I should like to be buried there; and let me beg of you, as you value your old friend, not to suffer any pomp to be used at my funeral; nor any monument, nor monumental inscription whatever, to mark where I am laid; but lay me quietly in the earth, place a sun-dial over my grave, and let me be forgotten." These directions were in spirit; though not strictly complied with; and on the 25th of January, 1790, the body of Howard was buried in the spot which he had chosen near the village of Dauphigny, a little distance from Cherson. The authorities and the inhabitants of the place testified their respect for him by attending his remains to the grave. Instead of the sun-dial, a small brick pyramid was erected on the spot. In Cardington church, according to his directions, a plain slip of marble was erected by his wife's tomb, bearing this inscription:—"John Howard; died at Cherson, in Russian Tartary, January 20th, 1790. Aged 64. Christ is my hope." A more stately monument was soon afterwards erected to his memory, in St. Paul's Cathedral.

TOUCHING ANECDOTE.

At a Teachers' Convention in Springfield, Mr. Sweetzer, in an eloquent speech, illustrated the force of example by the following striking anecdote:—

A painter, while journeying, accidently fell in with a most beautiful child, and was so enraptured with its countenance that he immediately resolved to paint it, and carried his determination into execution. Hanging the painting in his studio, he made it his guardian angel, and when he was desponding, or angry, sought encouragement and calmness in gazing into its beautiful face. He thought that if he could ever meet with its counterpart, he would paint that also. Years passed away, and the painter succeeded in finding no one so infernally ugly-looking as to satisfy his idea of an opposite to his darling picture; but by chance while visiting a prison, after having almost given up in despair, he saw a young man stretched upon the floor of his cell in a perfect paroxysm of rage. This struck him as his desideratum, and he lost no time in transferring the face to canvass, and placing it side by side with his ideal of purity, innocence, and beauty. And who, think you, was the original of his last painting? The same that when a child, had furnished him with his long-cherished and beautiful picture, "the innocent, happy babe. The change had been wrought by the teachings he had been subjected to, and the examples set before him." "Let us," said Mr. Sweetzer, "take warning from this lesson; and do what we all can to rescue angels from becoming fiends.

HOPE AND MEMORY.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

A little babe lay in its cradle, and Hope came and kissed it. When its nurse gave it a cake, Hope promised another to-morrow; and when its young sister brought a flower, over which it clapped its hands and crowed, Hope told of brighter ones, which it should gather for itself.

The babe grew to a child, and another friend came and kissed it. Her name was Memory.

She said, 'Look behind thee, and tell me what thou seest.'

The child answered, 'I see a little book.'

And Memory said, 'I will teach the how to get honey from the book, that shall be sweet to thee when thou art old.'

The child become a youth. Once, when he went to his bed, Hope and Memory stood by the pillow.

Hope sang a melodious song, and said—'Follow me, and every morning thou shalt wake with a smile as sweet as the merry lay I sung thee!'

But Memory said, 'Hope, is there any need that we should contend? He shall be mine as well as thine. And we will be to him as sisters all his life long.'

So he kissed Hope and Memory, and was beloved of them both. While he slept peacefully, they sat silently by his side, weaving rainbow tissues into dreams. When he woke, they came, with the lark, to bid him good morning, and he gave a hand to each.

He became a man. Every day, Hope guided him for his labor, and every night he supped with Memory, at the table of Knowledge.

But, at length, age found him, and turned his temples gray. To his eye, the world seemed altered. Memory sat by his elbow-chair, like an old and tried friend. He looked at her seriously and said, 'Hast thou not lost something that I entrusted to thee?'

And she answered, 'I fear so; for the lock of my casket is worn. Sometimes I am weary, and sleep, and then Time purloins my key. But the gems thou didst give me when life was new —I can account for all—see, how bright they are.'

While they thus sadly conversed, Hope put forth a wing that she had worn, folded under her garment, and tried its strength in a heavenward flight.

The old man lay down to die, and when his soul went forth from the body, the angels took it. And Memory walked with it through the open gate of heaven. But hope laid down at its threshold, and gently expired, as a rose giveth out its last odors. Her parting sigh was like the music of a seraph's harp. She breathed it into the bosom of a glorious form, and said:

'Immortal Happiness! I bring thee a soul that I have led through the world. It is now thine. Jesus hath redeemed it.' [Mirror.

HORRORS OF HEATHENISM.

My little readers, did you ever think of the blessing of the Christian religion? Read the following account of Idol worship in a heathen land. That father, who so firmly stood by, and witnessed the death of his boy, loved him as much as your father loves you. He was taught by his religion that it was his duty to destroy his child in this awful manner.

Some scenes in the heathen world are so unholy and shocking as to be unfit to be fully related to the young in our favored land. And yet is is proper that they should know something of the sorrows and sufferings of poor heathen children. A Hindoo was seen leading a fine little boy into a splendid temple. The eyes of the boy beamed with delight at what he saw around him. He looked at the idol, with its rubies, and diamonds, and pearls. He saw the flowers and other offerings laid around, and all he looked at seemed to make him smile with pleasure. Fondly did he think that his father had brought him there to make him happy; but how sadly was he mistaken! In his father's hands were two arrows; and these he put into the hands of an attendant on the priests.

The boy was smiling; and while he smiled, one of the arrows was thrust into his side. He shrieked aloud, and looked to his father for help; but his father listened not to his piteous cry, and in a moment the second arrow was forced into his side. A cord was now tied to the ends, and on the front of this cord was placed a small pan, containing fire, and then the little fellow, with his blood streaming down his sides, was made to walk up and down before the idol. It was supposed that his blood was an acceptable offering to the goddess Kalee.

We will only give one more sad story, though we might give hundreds, and that will be about a custom found among the Friendly Islanders in the South Seas. When a member of the family is very ill, and there is a fear that he will die, another member of the family, generally one of the juniors, suffers one of his little fingers to be cut off. It is taken off at the second joint, with a chisel, and is then carried to the temple as an offering to the idol, that health may be restored to the afflicted. It is stated by the missionaries, that the king and queen of the Friendly Islands, and all who have grown up as heathens, have lost either one or both of their little fingers through this cruel rite.

EDITORIAL CHIT-CHAT.

DeRuyter, N. Y., June 9, 6 o'clock, A. M.

On the evening of second-day, June 5th, we left New York in company with brethren Lucius Crandall and Nicholas Rogers, to attend the meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association, at Lincklaen, Chenango Co., N. Y. The passage of 160 miles up the Hudson River to Albany, is now so comfortable a thing, that scarcely any body thinks of noticing or commenting upon it. Still there are circumstances connected with it which would justify pretty full notes by a traveler. The improvement in steamboat accommodations has probably been as rapid and extensive on this river as on any other in the world. If a countryman who passed up or down in a first-class boat of ten years ago, should now take passage on board the unrivaled steamer Isaac Newton, he would be astonished at the change which has taken place. Instead of a boat two hundred feet long, with pent-up cabins, and rows of narrow shelves on which to sleep, he would find a real "floating palace," nearly three hundred and fifty feet long, with capacious cabins, saloons, and state-rooms, more elegantly fitted up than those of the best hotels, and about as quiet. The constant rumbling and jogging of the machinery is scarcely heard or felt, and one may easily forget that he is passing over the water at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and believe himself comfortably settled for the night in some retired and richly-furnished public-house. Nor is it simply in these outward things that the steamer rivals the hotel. In the courteous and gentlemanly bearing of the officers, and the promptness and attendance of waiters, it equals what can be found in any other place. Under such circumstances, a passage up the Hudson is rather to be desired, than dreaded, and many take it with no other object than to enjoy themselves.

Albany continues to be about as much of a nuisance to travelers as it was years ago—not on account of its location, or the character of its inhabitants in general—but on account of the miserable race of hackmen and carmen it supports. They have long been notorious for their lying "tricks upon travelers," of which we happened to witness some specimens in passing through the place. They are always ready when a steamboat arrives, and rush on board with the ferocity of a pack of wolves. If they chance to find an old lady in want of a carriage, or a person not accustomed to traveling who wants a cart, they pounce upon such a victim without the least apparent hesitancy or compunction, and make the most they can out of the job. If one could forget the wickedness and meanness of such business, it would be amusing to observe them. But considering the character of their transactions, they are more disgusting than amusing. For ourselves, we long ago determined to patronize them as little as possible. If every traveler would take the trouble to place his baggage for the railroad on board the regalar wagon stationed at the boats for the exclusive purpose of carrying it free, and would then walk to the depot, he would save himself a deal of trouble, and perhaps do something to rid the traveling public of a set of harpies.

The city of Schenectady, sixteen miles from Albany, has not improved much—perhaps it has declined—for many years past. Union College has no doubt done something to benefit the city. Still there has been but little business doing in comparison with the population, and wages have consequently been very low. We were glad to learn, however, that one or two large manufacturing establishments are now going up, which will give business to the people, and probably lead to the improvement of the city.

The railroad from Schenectady to Utica has recently been much improved by the laying of a new track, and it is now in fine order. The conductors of it are gentlemanly and accommodating. There is, however, a pretty general feeling of dissatisfaction with the high fare which they charge—three dollars being regarded as too much for a ride of less than eighty miles on a road doing so large and safe a business. The experiment was once tried of putting the fare at two dollars, and worked well. But the Directors afterwards raised it to the old price, and gave as a reason—not that the support of the road was inadequate—but that the other roads westward did not reduce their prices also! The reason may satisfy those who gave it, but it does not satisfy the patrons of the road. They have, however, no alternative at present, except those conveyances which are too slow for business men.

The railroad from Utica to Syracuse is receiving an important improvement in the shape of a new track, upon which large gangs of hands are now employed. We hear of but one cause of complaint on this road, and that is a want of care in taking charge of baggage. Two or three instances have occurred recently of baggage for Chittenango, (which is the depot for DeRuyter passengers to stop at,) being taken out before reaching its destination, although properly deposited with the baggage man. True, the lost is generally found. But most persons feel indignant at being delayed and disappointed on account of the carelessness of those whose business it is to attend to the matter. The only remedy is to take as much care as possible of your own baggage.

From Chittenango to DeRuyter, you go by stage, twenty-three miles, arriving there in about twenty-eight hours from New York.

The DeRuyter Institute, we rejoice to hear, is now in a prosperous condition. It has about sixty students in attendance, which is considerable more than the average number for this, the busiest, season of the year.

The Central Association has been in session two days. But it has not yet completed its business by a good deal, and we must defer an account of it until another post. G. B. U.

THE CONDITION OF SWITZERLAND.

Chambers' Edingburg Journal says, the common supposition that Switzerland is the freest country of Europe is a very erroneous one. About two-thirds of the Swiss being Protestants, and the remaining one-third Catholics; and the Protestant and Catholic cantons, as the recent civil war has shown, hate each other as the hostile clans in the Highlands hated each other two hundred years ago. Besides, the neat-trimmed flower-garden and stuccoed cottage of the industrious artisan of Zurich is but a few hours' climbing from the lofty hill country of Schweitz, where the mountaineer leads a half-vagabond existence, tending his numerous goats among storms and mist, while his children run ragged and barefooted along the road, begging from travelers. Between people so variously situated there can be little sympathy. A consequence of this national disintergation has been, that the rights of citizenship possessed in one canton have always been good for nothing in another. The citizen of Geneva, who was driven to settle in the Valais, was allowed toleration; but neither he nor his posterity could, by any length of residence, become denizens of their adopted country. A Roman Catholic at Lucerne, who turned Protestant, lost all his property, and was liable to banishment; a Protestant at Berne turning Roman Catholic, was punished in like manner. Thus, in process of time, it came to pass that all over Switzerland there grew up a distinct body of men, the descendants of individuals who had lost their civil rights in their respective cantons, either in consequence of change of religion, or of misdemeanors for which they were sentenced to banishment, or illegal marriages, or lastly, as foreigners settled in Switzerland. The stigma thus cast upon the fathers, descended upon the children to the last generation. They formed a separate class celled Heimathlosen—literally the homeless—people to whom the law allowed nothing—involuntary outlaws. They exist at the present moment in steadily-increasing numbers; and, as injustice always re-acts on itself, the parties so degraded form an organized body of mendicants, hucksters, pilferers, and often robbers, like the gypsies of other countries, but much more numerous, compact, and formidable to the society which has cast them out. Some years ago, these Heimathlosen were become so troublesome, that their state was forced upon the attention of the Swiss diet, which instituted inquiries accordingly, the result of which showed there were thousands who had neither a fixed trade or a permanent place of abode. When they ventured into the towns, they assumed, for the time, the characters of thread-twisters, match-sellers, bird-catchers, and menders of pots and kettles. Whenever they might, they lived by choice in the woods and mountains, supporting themselves by all kinds of thievery. At night, they creep into caves, or sleep round a fire in the open air; and this through the depth of winter. Marriage is unknown among them; none of those examined could tell their own age, and very few knew who were their fathers and mothers. As soon as the children can walk, they are sent into the towns to beg and steal, and bring their plunder at night to the elder vagrants, who remain meantime encamped in the forests. They have still a voluntary government. Wherever, and whenever discovered, they are liable to be imprisoned without cause assigned; and formerly, when the prisons were over-crowded, many were executed without even the formality of a trial. They are now, as soon as seized, escorted by troops to the boundaries of the canton, and thrust into the next, by which they are expelled in like manner, unless they can meantime escape. The report recommended various plans for absorbing this unwholesome population, which have been frequently since discussed; but nothing has been done, and the troubled state of the country renders any improvement now less likely than ever.

Editorial Changes.—We see it stated that Rev. Abel Stevens, editor of Zion's Herald, has been elected by the Methodist General Conference, now in session at Pittsburg, editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, for the next four years. Mr. Stevens subsequently resigned, and Rev. Dr. Peck was elected in his place. Rev. Prof. McClintock, of Dickinson College, has been chosen for the same term editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review. Rev. Matthew Simpson was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate. Rev. Wm. Hosmer, was elected editor of the Northern Christian Advocate. Rev. Wm. Hunter was re-elected editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate. We cannot think that the manner in which our Methodist brethren control and direct their periodicals and their press, is very favorable to editorial independence. An organ owned by a General Conference, and controlled by it, must give the 'certain sound,' which it may prescribe.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.—NO. 1.

The Christian ministry is a divine institution. Christ Jesus called Saul of Tarsus and "sent him unto the Gentiles," "to take out of them a people for his name," and gave him authority to ordain elders in every city where there should be gathered an assembly of Christian believers. By the same authority, Paul gave a like commission to Timothy, and to Titus, and other Christian teachers, who have already been approved as such, by the churches to which they belonged. Divine wisdom is conspicuously manifested in the appointment of an order of men whose occupation it is to study the divine word, to explain and enforce the doctrines and duties of religion, and to promote in all possible ways the spiritual welfare of mankind. No sacred institution is marked by more skillful adaptation to its end, or dictated by a more profound knowledge of our nature, than that of preaching. Without such an institution, Christianity would be deprived of one principal element of power—of a vital organ. Regarded as an instrument by which men may be taught the truth, or made to feel it, it is equally important.

As to the first, the superiority of oral instruction over every other mode of imparting it is universally allowed. It arrests the attention more effectually; it admits of more easy and familiar illustration, and of repetitions, which, in a book, the teacher would fail to perceive necessary, or would think tedious; it is associated with the tones, the looks, and the gestures of him who utters it, with the circumstances under which it is delivered, with the very place of meeting, and the assembly itself; and for these reasons is more strongly riveted on the memory. But this institution is of equal importance as an instrument of exciting adequate emotion. The persuasive power of the living voice, farther aided by the eye, the countenance, and the gesture of the speaker, is admitted by all; and thus truths which appear comparatively cold on the page of a book, seem animated as with new life when heard from the lips. Nor does the efficacy of this instrument end even here. He who devised it well knew all the susceptibilities of our social nature, and hence the institutions of public worship generally. He who has commanded us not to "forsake the assembling of ourselves together," well knew that combined and simultaneous action, and the influence of social sympathy, tend to excite and deepen emotion; and when such assembling is abandoned, it may safely be affirmed that the spirit of religion will decline. This law of emotion, which attends more or less all acts of public worship, affects, in a peculiar manner, the office of preaching. The projective and reflex current of sympathy, as it circulates from heart to heart, intensifies the emotions both of speakers and hearers, who act and re-act reciprocally upon each other. The persuasive efficiency of the living voice, is great as compared with that of a book, even when it is addressed to an individual, but receives a still greater addition, when addressed to a multitude. Robert Hall says, "Strong emotion is contagious." Whately says, "Every one is aware of the infectious nature of any emotion in a large assembly. It may be compared to the increase of sound by a number of echoes; or of light by a number of mirrors; or to the blaze of a heap of fire-brands, each of which would speedily have gone out if kindled separately, but which, when thrown together, help to kindle each other." To the power of the living ministry, every one's experience bears witness who has attended it. S. D.

Liberia.—The Commercial Advertiser, citing from its late files of Liberia papers, says:—"The Luminary speaks of a very general and strong desire on the part of the native residents, the Congoes especially, for instruction. They throng the Sunday schools and manifest astonishing eagerness in the pursuit of knowledge. Unfortunately, their wants cannot be supplied, not for the lack of teachers, or for want of school houses, but because the colonists have very few primary books. The editor makes an earnest appeal for aid, and asks that any individuals or families having such books will surrender them to meet the emergency. Help from abroad, especially from the United States, is earnestly solicited."

Desolations of Rum in Africa.—At a recent monthly meeting in the American Tract House, for the public communication of mission intelligence, Rev. J. L. Wilson, from Western Africa, stated the appalling fact that rum, introduced by traders from America, England, and France, was probably doing much more to depopulate and afflict that country, than even the slave trade, with all the bloody skirmishes in its train. It was a leading article of trade with nearly all the vessels, especially from this country, visiting the region. And as one tribe after another, on the coast, sunk down under its influence; others from the interior came in to occupy their places.

Amusements of the Insane.—At the Utica Lunatic Asylum, of which Dr. Brigham is the efficient and humane Superintendent, the patients are every year allowed an "Asylum Fair," to which the unfortunate beings always look forward with all the pleasure imaginable. These things are eminently promotive of the finer feelings of their natures, and serve an admirable purpose in diverting their minds from the morbid associations of monomania. The time for holding these fairs has been changed from winter to spring, and there was one held this year on the 7th inst. It is stated that the number of curiosities this year was much larger than ever before. The completion of new buildings has furnished rooms for workshops to the men, from which they turn out a vast number of neat and useful articles, often manufactured from cast-away bones and rubbish which it would be thought impossible to render of any use. The exhibition cannot fail to be a source of pleasure and profit.

REFLECTIONS.

Often, in my rambles to catch the first rays of golden light or to watch the fading tints at the close of day, I have passed a giant rock rearing his ribbed sides from the ocean-wave. So often have I seen it that its image rests upon my memory like a picture. There is nothing about this rock peculiar to itself, that has left so deep an impression upon my mind; but from the position it occupies, I can but give it in my imagination a tongue, and draw from its venerable teachings a lesson for life—a lesson which I fain would make a part of my rule of action, a part of my existence. Hear it speak—"Here I stand, and long have stood. My fresh born brow caught the first rays of the wandering sunlight as he came fresh from the hand of his Creator. When the zephyr had scarcely learned to fan the wave, when the adventurous surf dashed its spray up my furrowed side and fell back to its mother ocean, I was here. The sea-fowl, in her first winged expedition, nestled among my jagged cliffs, and from my summit the new-fledged young took its winged way. The ebb and flow of countless tides have laved my chafed breast, the breaking ripple and the raging tempest have alike saluted me, but unmoved by all, I have firmly stood, my head lifted toward the throne of my Creator, and my foot firmly fixed in its resting place; I have said to the fierce tempest, rage on; to the seducing zephyr's gentle hymning, I have said, I heed you not; but constant to my trust, the storm-tossed mariner has ever found in this deep harbor which I protect, a safe retreat from ocean storms and hidden reefs; this light-house on my summit faithfully points the way to the benighted seaman, and all within my influence are made happy by my unyielding perseverance at my post. Learn from me this lesson—stand firmly to thy trust. Say to the storm of time, dash on, to the alluring voice of pleasure, I heed you not; but hold up thy head, let thy spirit shine abroad to gladden and to cheer, keep thy foot firmly fixed upon the Rock of Ages, and look toward heaven." †

The Mariner's Family Industrial Society.—The Fourth Annual Report of this Society contains much that is interesting. This Society was organized for the purpose of placing in the hands of the destitute female relative of seamen, the means of labor and of enabling them to relieve themselves by their own industry from the sufferings of poverty. During the past year there have been in the employment of the Society 131 females taken from this class. They have made 9,150 garments, and have received the sum of $2,225 48, as wages. This is a most interesting fact. Especially it is so when we regard not merely the temporary relief of hunger and cold which it produces, but the moral elevation of character in the poor and distressed by making them active agents in their own physical comfort and happiness. In addition to the above, the Report contains an account of the persevering and successful labors of this Society to obtain by Legislative action, an appropriation of funds to erect a home for destitute and aged female relatives of seamen, under the direction of the Trustees of the Seamen's Fund and Retreat, and also to obtain the surplus funds of the Retreat, for the relief of the same class. For this purpose the Trustees appropriated during the last Winter, the sum of $550.

Union of Roman Catholics and Protestants.—In Germany (as appears from European papers) the cause of religious liberty is especially advanced by the political revolution. At Vienna the abolition of the differences of creed in respect of political rights was one of the popular rally cries. Thus, about four-score notables of the city of Augsburg, half Roman Catholics and half Protestants, having met to establish a common understanding respecting the communal elections and administration, resolved to put an end to religious quarrels by an equal division of functions for the future—a decision which was afterward officially confirmed.

Conversion of a Jew.—The Jewish Herald relates the following circumstance of the conversion of a literary Jew to Christianity:—

"Being met by a number of his associates for mutual improvement, he read the 13th chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. It was listened to with great delight; and again he read it, dwelling with reiterated emphasis on the words, 'is not puffed up—is not puffed up,' and then advancing to the table, he said, 'He who wrote this could not be an imposter. As the Lord liveth, I am Christ's.' Not long after, he avowed himself a Christian, and is now as eminent for piety, as he is for his professional skill as a physician. So a living exemplification of the same precious chapter has often done more to win the heart to Christ and truth than all logic."

Return of Missionaries.—Intelligence has been received that Mr. and Mrs. Jencks are on their way to this country on account of the dangerous illness of Mrs. J.

Reformation in Virginia.—We learn that the late session of the Virginia Episcopal Convention adopted an amendment to their constitution, "making it the duty of the diocese of Virginia, to exclude from the communion-table all members of the Church who were addicted to gaming and horse-racing, who should attend public balls, theatrical exhibitions, ballet dancing, and the exhibition of the model artists." We think they might well add slave-holding to the list.

Advice to a Student.—When the Rev. C. Buck, author of the "Theological Dictionary," was a student, the Rev. John Ryland, Senior, of Northampton, gave him the following items of advice:—

1. Do not buy too many books, for that will hurt your pocket.

2. Do not sit up late at night to study, for that will hurt your constitution.

2. Do not go a courting, for that will hurt your mind.

New Society.—A Society has been formed in Paris, under the title of "La Societe pour l'application du Christianisme aux Questions Sociales," which is to embrace the following objects:—

1. The application of the principles of Christianity to social questions.

2. The assertion of the right of conscience and of private judgement in all cases in which they may require to be protected against the absorbant tendencies of the State.

3. The non-payment of ministers of religion by the State.

The Jews in Europe.—The Jewish Emancipation bill had its third reading in the House of Commons of England, on Thursday evening, the 4th of May. Under present circumstances it can hardly fail to pass the House of Lords, now not strong enough to oppose the popular will. At the same time it is painful to witness that the popular feeling in Hungary, Baden, Bohemia, and Prussian Poland, is exceedingly adverse to the Jews. In all these districts popular outbreaks have taken place, in which the Jews were either threatened or badly treated. The following extract of a letter, dated London, April 3, we copy from the "Occident, and American Jewish Advocate":—

"I see by the papers, that the Israelites of Paris have petitioned the Provisional Government to abolish the present Consistory, as it is elected by 111 persons, when the Jewish population exceeds 6,000. I presume you have seen the synopsis of the Constitution offered by the Emperor of Austria to his subjects, in which the Israelites are accorded equal rights. I heard that some disturbances had occurred in Posen, during which the Israelites had been treated with barbarity; one child had been murdered by bleeding it to death, and other horrible atrocities perpetrated. I see by the papers of the day, that according 'to an ancient prophecy, bound up with the superstitions of the people of Posen, that when Easter Sunday falls upon St. George's day, a great miracle will ensue, which will fill the world with lamentation and woe; and afterwards with joy.' This event occurs this year, and it has caused such a sensation among the Jews, that many of them have quitted the city, to avoid the expected miracle. No doubt anticipating a recurrence of the atrocities of last week."

Attendance on the Prayer-Meeting.—The following remarks, from the Congregational Journal, we think, commend themselves to the consideration of Christians—especially those who are disposed to excuse themselves for non-attendance on the prayer-meeting on every trivial occasion, by supposing that it is of little consequence whether they attend:—

Does it ever occur to you, my Christian brother, that your attendance on the prayer-meeting will greatly encourage your minister, and that your absence will dishearten him! Such, we know from experience, is the fact—and it is a fact of too much importance for you to overlook. He is the servant of the church, and whatever stimulates and encourages him, exerts a most favorable influence on the church and congregation. He will preach better—better perform all his pastoral duties—be more spiritual and instructive, for he will feel that his efforts are appreciated—that he is not laboring in vain and spending his strength for naught. It is in no small degree owing to this influence that the preaching during a revival of religion is more direct, spiritual, and searching than at other times. It requires more grace than is ordinarily possessed by a minister of Christ for him not to feel his heart sick within him, when he sees, every week at the prayer-meeting, the most conclusive evidence that many of his church feel but little, if any interest in the object for which he is laboring. He studies hard to make necessary preparations—leaves all other business, however pressing, goes through cold, and heat, and storm—in health, and often out of health, and finds—what does he find?—a comparatively small number present, while very many who ought and might have been there are about their usual business. No one but a minister can know the trials connected with this subject. Many we are aware do not think of his feelings, or consider the influence of the conduct on his usefulness. Others still may think that he need not trouble himself about it. If he does not feel troubled, grieved, and afflicted, he is not fit to be a minister. He sees in such developments an index of the character of those for whose souls he watches. He sees that they are disregarding their covenant vows—casting off their Christian armor, exposing themselves to the temptations of the world and the evils of the adversary—that they are dishonoring the cause of Christ and exerting an influence destructive to the souls of men.

Is not one of the causes of the low state of religion in the church to be found in the melancholy fact that the prayer-meeting is forsaken? Is not this one reason why people become disaffected with their minister and wish for a change? Think of these things and be found at the next prayer-meeting—and never again absent yourself unnecessarily.

General Intelligence.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Acadia arrived at Halifax on Friday last, bringing European dates to the 27th of May. Lyons is entirely under a mob law, and there is apprehension that the tranquility of Paris would not be carried out in the departments, particularly where there are large assemblages of workingmen who are taught to believe that the revolution was made for their special benefit, and who do not rely upon their own efforts for support, but imagine that the poor and indolent can live on the earnings of the rich and enterprising. Such views, if carried out by mob law, will restore monarchy and tyranny. There are other provinces in France which are in disorder. The grand national fete took place in Paris according to arrangement. There is an indication of clashing in jurisdiction between the executive and legistative branches of government. Lamartine, it is rumored, talks of resigning. It is to be hoped he will not, for he seems to be one of the most collected, and eminent among those who brought about the revolution. The government has decreed that no part of the family of the late king shall be permitted to return to France.

There is no appearance of peace in the north of Europe. The Schleswig quarrel remains unsettled. The German Parliament had assembled at Frankfort, and organized. Considerable hope of favorable results have grown out of this movement.

The Emperor of Austria and family have attempted to leave the country. They got alarmed and fled; but the consternation and danger was so great, arising from their absence, that they were persuaded to return.

The war still rages in Italy. Lombardy is filled with troops. The combined Neapolitan and Sardinian squadrons have arrived at Venice.

Negociations for peace have been opened between Denmark and Prussia, but how they will succeed it is impossible to conjecture. The appearance of affairs improves much for the Danes.

In Spain, an intrigue has led to the expulsion of Mr. Bulwer, the British Ambassador. The particulars are unknown.

The affairs of Ireland are in a shocking condition. The conviction of John Mitchell, the Irish patriot, is announced.

A dreadful riot, with loss of life, has taken place at Seville.

An Indian mail had arrived, bringing dates from Calcutta to the 9th, Madras to the 12th, and Bombay to the 15th of April, and from Hong Kong to the 30th of March. The Rajah of Suttara was dead, and the territory now reverts to the East India Company for want of heirs. An affray had occurred at Whampoa, (China,) between some Americans and Chinese, which was, however, hushed up. The eleven criminals who were seized for aiding in the December murders, had received their sentence of punishment. Letters received per this mail state that the Asiatic cholera had appeared at Constantinople; and in the Journal des Debats, it was notified that the pestilence had reäppeared at Moscow.

Tragedy in Louisiana.—The Concordia (La.) Intelligencer gives the following details of a tragical affair which recently took place at Point Coupée:—

Two gentlemen, Elijah Adams and Rowland Robertson, met in a ball-room, and to the astonishment of all those present who were aware that they had allowed a dispute about property to interfere with their feelings of friendship for each other, they linked arms and walked together to an unoccupied corner of the apartment. Scarcely had they reached the desired position where their conversation might be strictly private, when Robertson was seen to strike Adams a violent blow in the face. Adams had scarcely felt the blow ere with a revolver he shot Robertson through the body. The effect may be imagined. Confusion, consternation, shrieks, and the most melancholy excitement, swallowed up, with the power of magic, all the happiness of the scene The bleeding and life-yielding form of Robertson, in the tragedy, was now the only remaining feature in the festival.

The senses of the whole people of the parish were stunned with the intelligence. The two men who had given such a fearful finale to this occasion of festivity were well related, and of equal personal respectibility. They had been brothers-in-law! Adams was a widower, having been the husband of Robertson's deceased sister. The unfortunate Robertson, at the time of the catastrophe, had scarcely realized the passing away of the honey-moon, and his young and unsuspecting bride was mingling happily in the life of the ball-room, when the report of death in the room adjacent staggered the senses of all. Robertson expired on the succeeding evening. Adams surrendered himself in the open Court on Saturday morning, and was admitted to bail in the sum of $5,000.

Murder.—The Delhi (N. Y.) Gazette of June 8, says that a Mrs. Beckwith, about 80 years of age, was killed in Franklin on Saturday afternoon last. It is said that she and her husband, who is about 85, have been in the habit of drinking to excess, and on that day, or the one previous, had brought home some whisky, which they divided. During Saturday afternoon the old man was gone out an hour or two, and he says that while he was gone the old woman hid his whisky—that they had a quarrel, and he struck her. There were five pretty severe wounds on her head, apparently inflicted by some instrument with sharp corners, although none could be found except the whisky jug. A coroner's inquest was held on Monday afternoon, which rendered a verdict that she came to her death by wounds inflicted by him.

Heroic Conduct of a Young Lady.—The Albany Knickerbocker of June 8, says: A little child's life was saved yesterday almost miraculously. It was left in a wagon in Broadway, while its careless parents went next door to do some shopping. During their absence something frightened the team, and away they went down the street like a gale of wind. Just as they passed Herkimer-st. a young lady of our acquaintance saw the danger approaching, and in an instant prepared to rescue the little fellow. Throwing her hat and shawl on the sidewalk, she made a spring for the tail of the wagon just as it was darting by her, and, as good luck would have it, caught it firmly, the momentum of the wagon jerking her inside of the box. She immediately clasped the child in her arms, and, seizing a favorable moment, sprang to the ground, without injury either to herself or the little foundling.

Hudson River Railroad.—The Poughkeepsie Journal says, that the work on this road is now progressing more rapidly than any other work of the kind in this country. From New York all the way up to this place, a distance of 76 miles, the work of grading is going on with great force and at such a rate that it is expected to have the whole in operation by the 1st of July, 1849. From the County line near Break Neck Hill, the grading is to be finished to New York, a distance of sixty miles, by the 1st of October next, and to this place by the 1st of June next year. But without waiting for the work to be finished up as far as this, it is to be pushed forward above to Hudson and Albany, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. The Fishkill Standard states that on Tuesday last the first ground was broken on the section of the Hudson River Railroad, extending from Plumb Point to the upper dock of the Fishkill landing. This is an important section, and is in the hands of Messrs. Wright, Mallory & Co., who have several sections below, and also the Tunnel at Break Neck Hill.

Late from Oregon.—By the arrival of Major Meek, advices have been received from Oregon to the 21st of May. Four powerful tribes of Indians had commenced a bloody war against the white settlers. In January, four battles were fought, in all of which, except one, the whites maintained their ground. Five hundred whites fought two thousand Indians a whole day, when the latter retreated. None of the former were killed, but large numbers were wounded. On the 29th of November a most horrid massacre was perpetrated by the Cayuse Indians at the Presbyterian Missions, at Wai Ilalpa in Wallah, Wallah Valley. Dr. Whitman, wife, and eighteen others were killed, and sixty or seventy persons taken prisoners. The houses of the missionaries were afterwards burned. Through the agency of Peter Skeen Ogden, chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company, the prisoners were ransomed and restored. Major Meek is on his way to Washington, with despatches for the Government, asking immediate aid.

Arrest of the Supposed Murderer of Mrs. Cooper.—Conrad Victor, the German suspected of the murder at Parkton, on the 28th ult., was arrested on Saturday within a few miles of that place. He was brought to the city and is now in jail. The evidence, though entirely circumstantial, bears strongly against him, according to present circumstances. Several articles, the umbrella, shoes, snuff-box, &c., which have been indentified as those of the deceased, have been either found upon his person or traced to him. Marks of blood was found upon his clothing. When questioned on the subject he admitted that the shoes were sold by him to an individual in Parkton, but accounts for their being in his possession by stating that they had been obtained from a store in this city. Victor has not long been out of the penitentiary, where he was sent for stealing a horse.

Disaster at Niagara Falls—Chippewa (Canada,) June 2.—The boat Duke of York, Paul Parker, owner, bound from Black Rock to Grand River, reached as far as the mouth of Chippewa Creek this morning, where she came in contact with a raft, and broke the tow line, and drifted down the river with four men on board, as far as the first rapids. A young man named Samuel Smith started with a small boat, and reached her about three quarters of a mile above the Falls, and succeeded in saving the four men. The boat, however, went over the Falls. The young man Smith deserves great credit for his heroic conduct. A boat with four men in her started ahead of him, but returned, being afraid to proceed.

The Crops.—The Richmond Whig says, from all quarters of the surrounding country, we hear very flattering accounts of the crops of corn and wheat, especially the latter. The harvest is about to commence; indeed, we presume, in some places it has already commenced. It was feared in the beginning of last week, that a hot sun, succeeding the heavy rains, would produce the rust, one of the most fatal enemies with which the wheat crop is destined to contend. Such fears, however, very happily proved vain. The weather cleared off cool, with a steady breeze, and soon dried the wheat. It has continued so ever since; at the time we write (Wednesday, 7th) it resembles very much some of the cooler days in September.

From the West Indies—Martinique—Massacre by the Negroes.—By the Great Western, at this port, we have startling intelligence from the island of Martinique. On the 22d of May, the slaves had risen and massacred about 100 of the white inhabitants, including women and children, and also burnt and destroyed their property to a great amount. The Governor of the Island and a French man-of-war lying in the harbor at the time, did not interfere nor call on the soldiery to stay the insurrection. The last Packet states that the Island was more tranquil, but all business was suspended. At Guadalupe all was quiet.

Bloodshed in the Fejee Islands.—The whaling schooner Alfred arrived at Sydney, New South Wales, on the 21st of October, from the Fejee Islands, Sept. 10; a short time prior to which a severe battle had thken place between the chiefs of Meben and Rewa, in which the latter was defeated, but escaped with a portion of his adherents. All the inhabitants of the defeated tribe were burnt by their opponents. The number slain on both sides amounted to six hundred, the bodies of whom still remained exposed there. Happily the scene of the warfare occurred at some distance from their location.

Galvanic Spectacles.—Mr. J. S. Paine, optician, of Worcester, Mass., has invented something new in the way of spectacles. He has constructed that part of the bows holding the glasses, and the bridge of two metals, viz: silver and zinc—and he is confident of having thus achieved an important improvement by an uninterrupted flow of electricity, which he believes invigorates the eyes and actually relieves them from a world of small physical annoyances, independently of waning vision. By touching the tip of the tongue on the nose-piece, an unmistakable sensation is produced, and a flash of light is instantly perceptible. Mr. Paine thinks that he feels a cool current constantly passing by the orbs while the glasses are worn. Like a genuine Yankee, he secures a patent of course, and if the discovery equals his expectations, the millions of spectacle wearers of all countries will soon begin to pay tribute to New England ingenuity. The subject is one that should command the attention of physicians, since a new province for exploration is exposed to view.

Further from Mexico.—The U. S. steamer Virginia arrived at New Orleans from Vera Cruz, on the 7th inst., bringing later intelligence from Mexico, and a bearer of dispatches by way of Mazatlan, on his way to Washington. A Mexican guard was being formed at the Capital, to take possession on the withdrawal of the American army. The wife of Paredes asks $10,000 from the American authorities for damages done to the property of her husband while occupied by our forces.

SUMMARY.

The following list of new counterfeits is from Thompson's Bank Note Reporter:—5's on the Chesapeake Bank; 2's on the Bank of Delaware; 3's on the Fairfield County Bank; 10's on the Mechanic's Bank of Burlington, N. J.: 2's on the Bank of Burlington, Vt.; 5's on the Bank of Caledonia, Danville, Vt.; 2's on the City Bank of New Haven; 5's on the Connecticut River Banking Co.; 10's on the National Bank Providence; 5's on the Union Bank, Dover, N. J.; 3's on the Bank of Corning; 2's on the Farmers Bank of Bucks Co., Pa.; 5's on the Warwick Bank, R. I.; 1's on the City Bank, New Haven; 6's on the Merchants' Bank, Ellery; 1's on the Bank of Delaware—letter A, vig. locomotive and cars—seems to be an alteration; 10's on the Washington County Bank, Md.

On Saturday afternoon about 3 o'clock, while a blacksmith named Edward Wisely and his sister Margaret Wisely, a girl 17 years of age, were engaged in making fireworks, in a room in the rear of Patrick Reilly's porter house, known by the name of O'Connell Hall, No. 136 Mulberry-st., a keg of powder became ignited and exploded, blowing down the partitions of two rooms and the side wall into a yard, and so severely injuring the persons who were engaged in the manufacture that they were taken to the City Hospital in a very dangerous state, where the girl died in a few hours afterward.

Died, on the 4th inst., Matthew Gregory in the 91st year of his age. He was one of the men of the "better days of the Republic." He entered the army in Connecticut as a non-commissioned officer, and served during the whole of the war. He participated in all the sufferings of the army at Valley Forge. Before the close of the war, he received a Lieutenant's commission; and was in Hamilton's brigade at the capture of Cornwallis. He was one of the last, if not the very last, surviving members of the Society of the Cincinnati.

The Poughkeepsie Telegraph says, that by the bursting of the boiler of the steamboat Norwich, one man was badly scalded, another slightly, and a third had his arm broken; no one killed, as ascertained at the time. The damage done to the boat and machinery will probably amount to $8,000 or $10,000. No definite cause has been assigned for the accident, farther than the probability that there was a deficiency of water in the boiler.

The passengers by the cars from Washington Saturday evening, brought a report that a duel was fought at Bladensburg yesterday, between Lieut. Gillet a son of Mr. Gillet, Auditor in the Treasury Department, and a young man named Dallas, a son of the late Com. Dallas. They fired three times, when Dallas fell, it is reported, mortally wounded. The cause of the duel we learn, was an alleged insult by young Dallas offered to a lady.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune is informed that the official annunciation of Peace will not be made until our troops have all reached the frontier. This will probably keep the Court of Inquiry at Frederick in session until Gen. Pillow's case is disposed of, and probably long enough to permit the trial of Gen. Scott on charges preferred by Gen. Pillow.

We learn from the Pottsville Emporium, that Mr. Edward Kearns, a highly respectable citizen of Schuylkill county, was recently robbed of $1,027, while on board of a canal boat, commanded by Capt. Elliot, on the Pennsylvania Canal, about three miles above Harrisburg. Mr. Kearns, who has a large contract on the Pennsylvania Railroad, near Lewistown, had just drawn from the company, at the Harrisburg Bank, about $1,700, which he carried in two separate pockets in his coat.

Two-dollar counterfeit bills on the Bank of Delaware have made their appearance. It has for a vignette an eagle on a rock, with a steamboat in the distance. On the right end an Indian with a bow in his hand, and on the left, a ship under sail. It is letter A, No. 4,090, dated Aug. 4, 1847, and signed H. Latimer, President; S. Floyd, Cashier. The bill is badly lithographed on flimsy paper.

An American in Paris writes, that Louis Blanc, although over thirty years of age, has the figure and general appearance of a boy of fifteen. He has to mount a stool when he addresses the Assembly. As an evidence of his loss of popularity, it said that when he last mounted the tribune, the ushers, who usually supplied him with a stool, neglected this little attention.

A little boy, three years of age, youngest son of Mr. Russel Hill, of Williamsburg, Mass., was drowned in a mill-pond near his father's house, Friday afternoon. About nine years since, Mr. Hill lost another interesting son, who was drowned in the same stream.

The steamboats Wave, the St. Louis Lake, and the Lake of the Woods, have recently been employed in the Osage River as high as Osceola. They took up and brought down full freights, and demonstrated very satisfactorily that, with a small expenditure of money, that river can be made navigable for several months in the year. The Wave went up on three feet water, and touched the bottom only once. A rise followed, and the other boats experienced no difficulty whatever in making their way.

The Charleston Mercury of June 2, says: In our recent travels through the counties of Randolph, Guilford, and Montgomery, we have observed that the wheat crop is very promising. A more flattering prospect could not be desired, and, judging from present appearances, it may be put down as almost certain that the crop will be far beyond an average one.

D. D. Spencer, editor of the Ithaca Chronicle, and one of the Board of Prison Inspectors says that the laying aside of the 'cat,' in the punishment of convicts, has been attended with happy results. Contracts have been let at an advance of 25 to 30 per cent. on old prices—showing that contractors find their hands more faithful under the new order of things than when subject to the lash.

Charles Astor Bristed, one of Mr. Astor's grand-children and heirs, has remitted to Washington City nine hundred dollars, to be expended in the redemption from slavery of the fugitives of the Pearl. The donation was entirely voluntary and unsolicted, and was made by him immediately upon learning that the slaves were to be sold.

The schooner Sea, of 208 tons burthen, Capt. Glidden, from Thomaston, of and for New Orleans, loaded with 1600 casks of lime, went ashore on Munroe's Island in a squall on the 31st ult. After getting ashore she keeled over, took fire and was burnt. The vessel was insured $1000.

The Boston Transcript of the 10th says, this forenoon a mutiny occurred on board the brig Ponce, lying in the stream, outward bound. Captain Sturgis, of the revenue cutter Hamilton, proceeded on board, persuaded two of the mutineers to return to duty, and brought two of them in irons to the city.

The Annapolis (Md.) Free Press says: "We learn from the farmers in the country that the cool air of the last few days has dissipated the fears that were entertained of the existence of rust in the wheat. The crop looks exceedingly promising and a handsome harvest is anticipated."

Hon. Joshua H. Ward, Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Essex Co., Mass., died at his residence in Salem, Mass., on Sunday evening. He was the youngest Judge on the Bench, being only about 35 years of age.

In Gloucester, Mass., there was a heavy frost on the 1st inst., and at 6 o'clock it snowed quite fast. In Newburyport, also, there was a little "flurry" of snow, and the mercury sank to 39.

Some sound beams formed of the wood of the mulberry tree, have been found in the ruins of Nineveh, where they are supposed to have been placed at least seven hundred years before Christ.

A writer in the N. Y. Journal of Commerce recommends that the Government should have gold coins of $50 and $100. They are much wanted in counting out large sums—particularly at the Custom House.

A slip from the St. John, N. B., Courier office, dated June 6, published in the Portland Advertiser, states that the British brig Commerce, from Galway, April 26, for St. John, N. B., was lost near Mahon, N. S., last week. Nine of the passengers and one of the crew were drowned.

The National Whig Convention, which convened at Philadelphia last week, nominated as their candidate for the Presidency Zachary Taylor, of Louisiana, and Millard Fillmore, of New York for Vice President.

On the 23d of April last, Lieut. W. F. Lynch, of the U. States Navy, commanding the exploring expedition to the Dead Sea, was afloat on that sea, with his boats launched, the weather mild, and all his party safe and well.

The County Commissioners of Philadelphia state that that county has paid for damages, occasioned by riots and church-burning in 1844, $261,495 09—and several suits for damages are still pending.

The public debt of the city of New York on the 5th inst., is officially stated to be $11,911,076. Nearly the whole of the debt has been incurred in introducing the Croton water into the city.

DIED,

At Sangerfield, N. Y., June 1, Harriet Williams, daughter of Solomon Williams, aged 40 years. Sister Williams embraced the Sabbath about 17 years ago, and united with the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield, of which she remained an acceptable member till death. She manifested a perfect resignation to the will of God during her sickness, which was protracted and distressing, and died in the triumph of faith.

In Berlin, N. Y., on the 28th ult., Mr. John Vars, in the 60th year of his age.

REPUBLICATION OF

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW,
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW,
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW,
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW,
AND
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

PRICES FOR 1848, (IF SUBSCRIBED FOR EARLY.)

For any one of the four Reviews,	3 00	per annum.
For any two, "	5 00	"
For any three, "	7 00	"
For all four of the Reviews,	8 00	"
For Blackwood's Magazine,	3 00	"
For Blackwood and three Reviews,	9 00	"
For Blackwood and the four Reviews,	10 00	"

Payments to be made in all cases in advance.

CLUBBING.

Four copies of any or all of the above works will be sent to one address on payment of the regular subscription for three—the fourth copy being gratis.

EARLY COPIES.

A late arrangement with the British publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, secures to us early sheets of that work, by which we shall be able to place the entire number in the hands of subscribers before any portion of it can be reprinted in any of the American journals. For this and other advantages secured to our subscribers, we pay so large a consideration, that we may be compelled to raise the price of the Magazine. Therefore we repeat, 'subscribe early while the price is low.

Remittances and communications should be always addressed, post-paid or franked, to the publishers,

KEEP COOL.

From Mr. Dix's Poem before the Mercantile Library Association, Boston.

Keep cool! the secret of success of life
Lies not in haste, excitement, bustle, strife,
This 'bolting dinners' hurrying to and fro;
Keeping up one continued constant go;
Taking your pleasure jaunts at railroad speed,
And never stopping aught to see or head
This going to China to have a chat,
Taking but one clean dicky in your hat,
These are the features of the times, I own,
That give to modern life its zest and tone,
But do they bring us real genuine joy,
True happiness, unmixed with base alloy?

Keep cool! don't strive for sudden wealth too fast,
Fortunes quick made are seldom known to last—
Like wat'ry bubbles in the air revolves,
A breath but makes them and a breath dissolves;
Write letters if you've time to waste,
But don't, I pray, subscribe yourself 'in haste'—
Men have been known their hopes in life to kill,
By heedless scratching of someway word quill.

* * * * *

Be wise, discreet, of dangers take good heed,
Be cautious, and you cannot but succeed,
Shun all rash acts—let moderation mark
Each enterprise on which you may embark;
And from your mind ne'er let there be effaced.
The old, yet sterling proverb—'Haste makes waste.'

A FELON'S REMORSE.

It is a sad mistake, that is almost universally made, to believe that criminals who have become inured to vice and transgressions of the law, are totally void of sensibility and remorse. Although pride, obstinacy, and daring hardihood may conceal from observation, the workings of that inward monitor called conscience, there has never existed the felon, deeply as he may have been steeped in crime, who has not felt its prickings, and in a greater or less degree, succumbed to its warnings and its power.

A powerful illustration of this fact, came under our own observation, a few years since. A man, whom we shall designate by the name of Thomas Burke, was arrested for a burglary in breaking into a dwelling house with intent to steal. He was caught in the act. He had obtained access to the building, and had even penetrated as far as the sleeping room of the master of the house, who awoke and arrested him before he could effect his escape. Burke was tried, convicted, and adjudged by the court to imprisonment in the State Prison, to hard labor, for the term of twenty years. Before his removal to the State Prison, the prisoner sent for us, stating that he desired a personal interview before he was removed forever from the scenes of of this world's pleasures, and we accordingly visited him in his lonely cell. It has been our lot to confer with criminals of every age, and never did we witness such a picture of abject despair and remorse, as this young man presented. He was seated on his pallet—his eyes were sunken, his face pale and attenuated, and his whole appearance betokened the most fearful mental torture. He arose upon our entrance, and said, "this is most kind of you, sir! I desired much to see you, and yet I feared that you would not listen to the request of so worthless and miserable a wretch as I am. I am about to leave the world forever, for I am convinced that I shall not survive my imprisonment, and God grant that I may not! What have I to live for? My life has been one varied catalogue of crime; from the time I attained the age of twenty years to the very day of my arrest. I lived by plunder and robbery. Should I live beyond the term of my sentence, what would life be worth to me? I should be shunned, and justly so, by all whose esteem is worth possessing, and cast off as wearing the felon's brand. I might desire to live if I could atone for past offences, but I cannot. I wished to see you, sir, to make a request of you, which I am sure will not be denied, and in order to do so, I must relate to you my history; please be seated, sir, and I will briefly detail the prominent events of my life."

I complied with his request, and he resumed:

"I was born in the town of ——, in the interior of this State; my father was a physician, and a more worthy man never breathed. My mother—my sainted mother!—how dare I profane her name with my polluted lips! My mother idolized me, and my sister, who was ten years my junior, loved me—how, how tenderly. Oh, how I loved that child; her name was Ida, sir, and I never, even in the midst of my abandoned associates, mentioned that name but with the most devoted affection. But to proceed, my father died when I was about eighteen years old; my mother followed but a few months after, and I was compelled to look after employment, as my parents were deeply involved at the time of their death. My sister was taken into a family of our aunt, who had ever hated me, and who forbid me to present myself at her residence. Taking a tender leave of my sister, sir, I came to this city and soon became acquainted with some abandoned young men, who led me into all sorts of excesses, and step by step induced me into the various gradations of crime, until I became an expert and daring 'cracksman,' which you know, sir, is the slang term for burglar.

"I will not detain you by a history of the offences I have committed, but I simply say that during the last twelve years I have committed, in connection with others, upwards of thirty burglaries, and numberless larcenies, the consequence of all of which I have escaped up to this time. And I should not have been now the inmate of this cell had not Providence, in his mysteries workings, stopped me almost miraculously in the very act of crime. As you already know sir, I was arrested in the bed chamber of Mr. Perkins, whose house I had entered. I obtained access through the hall door by the aid of my 'nippers,' and by the same means opened the door of his sleeping apartment. I had obtained information from one of his servants, that he generally had a large sum of money in the drawer of his dressing table, and I was cautiously making my way to that for the purpose of obtaining the booty—to reach which I had to pass the bed of a child—a young girl of about six years, and as my eye fell upon her face, the strong resemblance to my sister sent a chill of horror to my very soul. I stood spell-bound gazing upon the child, and as I gazed the happy hours of my own childhood, my sister's merry prattle, her sweet caress—my mother's passionate tenderness, and my father's doting fondness, came to my mind with electric force, and heart-stricken by the recollections which crowded to my brain, I forgot my purpose of plunder and my position, and exclaimed frantically, my dearest mother! my darling Ida! I awoke by my cries, Mr. Perkins, the owner of the house, who leaped from his bed and seized me; I stood powerless and helpless as an infant, for I could not have resisted, so spell-bound was I by the power created by that sweet child. I made, I could make, no replies to his question as to my purpose in that chamber, but submitted to be taken to the station house. I have been tried and convicted, and must suffer the penalty of crime, but to the hour of my death never shall I forget that face; it will be the subject of my dreams by night, and the sole object of my thoughts by day; and I trust in God that this vision of my wronged, neglected sister, will be the means of bringing me to repent of all my crimes and enormities. My sister still lives in ——. I could die happy if I could see her once more, and my request is that you will write to her for I cannot, tell her my present condition, and my real feelings tell her that contrition for the past and a desire to see her and obtain her forgiveness are the predominent, the only feelings, that move me; and beg that she will visit me at the State Prison. Promise me this sir, and also that you will procure her a permit to enter the prison, and you will remove a load of care from one who, though covered with crime, is at least brought to tell the loathsomeness of his condition, and who really and truly mourns his depravity of mind and heart."

We promised compliance with his wishes, and fulfilled our promise, and have no doubt but that the walls of the State Prison confines at this hour as humble and contrite a penitent as ever survived his crime. Conscience will speak, and the blackest villain does at some time feel the keen pangs of remorse tearing at his very heart strings.

GAMBLING, IN FOUR SCENES.

SCENE FIRST.

A genteel coffee house, whose human screen conceals a line of Grenadier bottles, and hides respectable blushes from impertinent eyes. There is a quiet little room opening out of the bar, and here sit four jovial youths. The cards are out, the wines are in. The fourth is a reluctant hand; he does not love the drink, nor approve the game. He anticipates and fears the result of both. Why is he here? He is a whole souled fellow, and is afraid to seem ashamed of any fashionable gaiety. He will sip his wine on the importunity of a friend newly come to town, and is too polite to spoil that friend's pleasure, by refusing a part in the game. They sit, shuffle, deal; the night wears on, the clock telling no tale of passing hours; the prudent liquor fiend has made it safely dumb. The night is getting cold; its dark air grows fresher; the east is grey; the drinking, and gaming, and hilarious laughter are over, and the youths wending homeward. What says conscience! No matter what it says;—they did not hear, and we will not. Whatever was said, it was very shortly answered thus: "This has not been gambling; all were gentlemen; there was no cheating, simply, a convival meeting. No stakes, except the bills incident to the entertainment. If any body blames a young man for a little innocent exhilaration on a special occasion, he is a superstitious old bigot, let him croak." "Such a garnished name" is made the text to justify the whole round of gambling. Let us then look at

SCENE SECOND.

In a room so silent that there is no sound except the shrill cock crowing of the morning, the forgotten candles burning dimly, over the long and lengthened wick, sit four men. Carved marble could not be more motionless, save their hands. Pale, watchful, though weary, their eyes pierce the cards, or furtively read each other's faces. Hours have passed over them thus. At length they rise without words; some with a satisfaction that only makes their faces brightly haggard, scrape off the piles of money; others, dark, sullen, silent, fierce, move slowly away from their lost money. The darkest and fiercest of the four is the young friend who first sat down to make out a game. He will never sit down so innocently again. What says he to his conscience now? "I have a right to gamble; I have a right to be damned too, if I choose; whose business is it?"

SCENE THIRD.

Years have passed on. He has seen his youth ruined, at the first with expostulation, then with only silent regret; the consenting to take part of the spoils he has himself decoyed, duped, and stripped them without mercy. Go with me into the dilapidated house not far from the landing at New Orleans. Look into that dirty room. Around a broken table, sitting upon boxes, kegs, or rickety chairs, see a filthy crew dealing cards smouched with tobacco, grease, and liquor. One has a pirate face, burnished and burnt with brandy, a lock of grizzly, matted hair, half covering his villain eyes, which glare out like a wild beast's from a thicket. Close by him wheezes a white-faced, dropsical, wretch, vermin-covered and stenchful. A scoundrel Spaniard and a burly negro, (the jollies of the four,) complete the group. They have spectators, drunken sailors, and ogling, thieving, drinking women, who should have died long ago, when all that was womanly died. Here, hour draws on hour, sometimes with brutal laughter, sometimes with threat, and oath, and uproar. The last few stolen dollars lost, temper too, each charges the other with cheating, and high words ensue, and blows, and the whole gang burst out of the door, beating, biting, scratching, and rolling over in the dust. The worst, the fiercest, the most drunken of the four, is our friend who began by making up the game.

SCENE FOURTH.

Upon this bright day, stand with me if you would be sick of humanity, and look over that multitude of men kindly gathered to see a murderer hung. At last a guarded cart drags on a thrice guarded wretch. At the gallows ladder his courage fails. His coward feet refuse to ascend—dragged up, he is supported by bustling officials—his brain reels, his eyes swim, while the mock minister utters a final prayer by his leaden ear. The prayer is said, the noose is fixed, the signal is given—a shudder runs through the crowd as he swings free. After a moment, his convulsed limbs stretch down and hang heavily and still;—and he who began to gamble to make out a game, and ended in stabbing an enraged victim whom he had fleeced, has here played his last game—himself the stake. [Rev. H. W. Beecher.

METHOD OF ASCERTAINING THE WEIGHT OF CATTLE WHILE LIVING.

This is of the utmost utility for all those who are not experienced judges by eye; and by the following directions the weight can be ascertained within a mere trifle. Take a string, put it round the breast, standing square, just behind the shoulder blade, measure on a foot rule the feet and inches the animal is in circumference; this is called the girth; then, with the string, measure from the bone of the tail which plumbs the line with the hinder part of the buttock; direct the line along the back to the fore part of the shoulder-blade; take the dimensions on the foot-rule as before, which is the length, and work the figures in the following manner: girth of the bullock, six feet four inches; length, five feet three inches; which multiplied together, make 31 square superficial feet; and that multiplied by twenty-three (the number of pounds allowed to each superficial foot of cattle measuring less than seven and more than five in girth,) making 713 pounds; and allowing 14 pounds to the stone, is 50 stones, 13 pounds, where the animal measures less than nine and more than 7 in girth, thirty-one is the number of pounds to each superficial foot. Again, suppose a pig or any small beast should measure two feet in girth, and two along the back, which, multiplied together, make four square feet; that multiplied by 11, the number of pounds allowed for each square foot of cattle measuring less than three feet in girth, makes 44 pounds;—which, divided by fourteen, to bring it to stones, is three stone two pounds. Again, suppose a calf, a sheep, &c., should measure 4 feet 6 inches in girth, and 3 feet 9 inches in length, which, multiplied together, makes 16 1-2 square feet; that multiplied by 16, the number of pounds allowed to all cattle measuring less than five feet, and more than three in girth, makes 264 pounds; which, divided by 13 to bring it to stones, is 18 stones 12 pounds. The dimensions of the girth and length of black cattle, sheep, calves, or hogs, may be as exactly taken this way as it is at all necessary for any computation or any valuation of stock, and will answer exactly to the four quarters, sinking the offal, and which every man, who can get even a bit of chalk, can easily perform. A deduction must be made for a half fatted beast of one stone in every twenty, from that of a fat one; and for a cow that has had calves, one stone must be allowed, and another for not being properly fat. [Chamber's Information for the People.

FREAKS OF FORTUNE.

Some twenty-five years ago, a young man and his wife opened a little eating house in this city, near Fulton Market. By industry and good management they amassed a handsome fortune, bought several lots of ground, and with the aid of more capital, for which they mortgaged their property, they built a magnificent hotel of white marble, six stories high fronting on three streets. But the interest on the mortgage provided a canker worm, eating into the profits of their splendid establishment; and in a few years the mortgage was foreclosed, the building and lots sold for less than their value (less than the amount of the mortgage,) and the man and his wife, now grown old, were turned out of house and home. With a little help from his son the old man again commenced the world in a small eating house, but became again unfortunate; the old lady then open a private boarding house; the son went to another city and established a hotel, and the family by their untiring industry, succeeded in maintaining a respectable position in society, although in a state of wealth immeasurable below their former station. Some months ago, the old man heard of the death of a wealthy relation in England, who had left him a fortune of eight hundred thousand dollars. He went to England, administered to the estate, and secured the property. He is now richer than he ever was before. In this brief narrative our readers will probably have recognized Mr. Holt and his estimable consort. "Holt's Hotel," it is said will again appear, in gilt letters upon the splendid building fronting on Water, Fulton, and Pearl streets. Mr. Johnson and his lady, the present popular hosts, will no doubt cheerfully make way for the amiable old couple. Mr. Holt, we understand desires to purchase the building to bequeath it to his faithful son, who stood by him manfully in his reverses.

WATER.

"All hail to pure cold water,
That bright rich gem from Heaven;
And praise to the Creator,
For such a blessing given!
And since it comes in fullness,
We'll prize it still the more;
For life, and health and gladness,
It speeds the wide earth o'er."

What is there in nature so beautiful as water? In the form of genial spring showers, that fertilize and render fructiferous the earth—in the opening flower-beds—in rivulets—in spring streams—in cascades—and in the delicate teardrop that moistens the cheek of woman, how beautiful is this agent, every where so abundant—pure, simple water!

The earth becomes dry and parched; flowers cease to put forth their blossoms; the trees yield no fruit; the grass withers, and the plain becomes dusty. At length, after many days, the clouds begin to gather; the lambs are heard bleating on the hills; the cows gambol, and the fowls prepare their feathers. The showers, all fresh and genial, descend, and nature, as with one uplifted voice, praise that Being who sends the rain.

We have in water, abundance, simplicity, purity, feebleness, not less than terrific power; awfulness, grandeur, sublimity; beauty, the purest of all beverages, and the best of all means for healing the sick. Who can be sufficiently thankful for this, one of the best of Heaven's gifts—PURE COLD WATER.

PLEASURE OF PAYING DEBTS.—What a pleasure it is to pay one's debts! It seems to flow from a combination of circumstances. In the first place, it removes that uneasiness which a true spirit feels from dependence and obligation. It affords pleasure to the creditor, and therefore gratifies our social affection. It promotes that future confidence which is so very interesting to an honest mind; it opens a prospect of being readily supplied with what we want on future occasions; it leaves a consciousness of our own virtue; and it is a measure we know to be right, both in point of justice and sound economy. Finally, it is the main support of simple reputation.

VARIETY.

Rev. S. W. Coggshall writes to Zion's Herald, that in Tisbury, Massachusetts, containing 1740 inhabitant, 1,000 of whom are comprised in this village, we are not only without a place in which intoxicating liquor can be obtained, but we are also without a gambling house, without a billiard room, without a bowling alley, and without a house of ill-fame; and also, as a necessary consequence, we are without an almshouse—it not being needed—and but two families, to our knowledge, ever required aid from their neighbors.

Miss Mary Mitchel, of Nantucket, discoverer of the Comet which bears her name, was unanimously elected an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, at their last general meeting. We believe that this is the first time such an honor has been conferred on any lady in this country; and a similar honor has been conferred on but two ladies in Europe. Miss Caroline Herschel, the sister and assistant of the late Sir William Herschel, in his astronomical labors, and Mrs. Somerville, the commentator on La Place, were some years ago elected honorary members of the Astronomical Society of London.

Some time since a sailor on one of our wharves was swearing most boisterously, when one of the Society of Friends passing along accosted him very pleasantly, and said:—"Swear away, friend, swear away, till thee gets all that bad stuff out of thee, for thee can never go to Heaven with that stuff in thy heart." The sailor, with a look of astonishment and shame, bowed to the honest Quaker and retired.

There can be no doubt but that many a child has been sacrificed in early youth to the pride of parents, who, delighted with the intellectual activity of their children, have striven to make them prodigies of learning. But in these cases of early and undue employment of the brain, inflamation of the hemispherical ganglion, or of the lining membrane of the ventricles, with serious effusion, has usually been the cause of a fatal issue or of subsequent mental imbecility.

The Pittsburg Gazette of Friday, 2d inst., learns by telegraph from Memphis that the steamer Clarksville was burnt near Ozark's Island, on the 27th ult., and that the captain and crew, eight or ten in number, and thirty deck passengers were lost. With great difficulty the cabin passengers were all saved. There is some room to doubt this story.

When on his dying bed, Saladin commanded that a sheet be borne before him to his grave on the point of a spear, and these words proclaimed: "These are the glorious spoils which Saladin carries with him! Of all the victories and triumphs—of all his riches and the realms he possessed—nothing now remains but his winding sheet."

Santa Anna's wife is particularly beautiful, and fascinating in manner. She is his second choice and is now entering her twentieth year, though looking much younger. His daughter by the first marriage differs in every particular from her step-mother, She is neither handsome in person nor interesting for accomplishments. Her age is fourteen.

The Gardener's Chronicle says that common salt may be scattered on the surface of the ground at the rate of 300 lbs. per acre, with perfect safety, as far as vegetables are concerned; but it is a dangerous substance to apply to fruit trees.

A very delicate dish is procured by placing a glass bottle over an asparagus head just as it breaks the ground. The plant rapidly fills the bottle, which is then broken and a large head, tender, delicate, and compact as a cauliflower, is secured.

An ambitious man is the greatest enemy to himself of any in the world beside: for he torments himself with hopes, desires, and cares, which he might avoid if he would remit the height of his thoughts and live quietly.

A man who had been ill, on being asked by a gentleman whether he had taken any remedy? replied, "No, I ain't taken any remedy, but I have taken lots of physic!"

In addition to the delightful influence music has upon the character, it has also a marked effect in suppressing pulmonary complaints. Dr. Rush used to say, that the reason why the Germans never died of consumption was, they were always singing.

Our inquiries into immortality are, alas! too often made in the time of mourning and sorrowful bereavement, and therefore our views are not sufficiently bright and cheering. We never walk upon the graves save with crape upon our faces!

Good nature is one of the sweetest gifts of Providence. Like the pure sunshine. it gladdens, enlivens, and cheers. In the midst of hate, revenge, sorrow, and despair, how glorious are its effects.

The human body is of nearly the same temperature under similar circumstances, in winter as in summer, in polar and in tropic climes. The extremities will of course be colder, but not the internal parts of the body.

A lawyer, on his death bed, willed all his property to the lunatic asylum, saying as a reason for so doing, that he wished his property to return to the same liberal class of people who patronized him.

Salt brine is said to be the best wash for stiff joints in horses. It is also good for hard hoofs as it attracts moisture and thus keeps the hoof soft. It can easily be tried by any farmer.

Science must combine with practice to make a good farmer. If you separate science from agriculture, you rob a nation of its principal jewels.

Whenever we drink too deep of pleasure, we find a sediment at the bottom, which pollutes and embitters what we relish at first.

A miser having heard a very eloquent charity sermon, exclaimed—"This sermon so strongly proves the duty of alms, that I have almost a mind to beg."

A person advertised, "a boy wanted." Some one left at his door an infant in a band box with this inscription, "How will this answer?"

No man is so poor but he can have a liberal spirit; and no man is so rich but he can have a mean one.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.
